Though I am satisfied that my notes to the Minister of Exterior Relations have been truly represented to you, yet as, in the immense variety of important objects that occupy your time and attention, they may have escaped your memory, I cannot justify myself to my Government without making every effort to bring them under your view; since I consider the object of them as too closely connected with that harmony which cannot be indifferent to two countries whose physical and political relations enable them to be mutually serviceable to each other. And I find that it has not been unusual, upon great occasions, for the ministers of foreign Powers to address themselves directly to you. This I prefer to do by letter, rather than by personal conference; as well because I considered it as more saving of your time, as because I feared that my imperfect knowledge of the French language would have prevented me from expressing myself with the clearness I might wish.

I pass over, citizen First Consul, a variety of circumstances of minor importance, and which, without being useful to France, serve to distress the commerce and the mercantile citizens of the United States, which have, at different times, been represented to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and others of your ministers, without having hitherto met with the attention they merited. I presume, when a negotiation shall be set on foot for the arrangements on great points, these smaller ones will meet with little difficulty.

The claims of the American citizens against the Government of France, are so well founded that no administration that ever prevailed in France has refused to recognize them; and even after the debts of the citizens of France were reduced by the law of 24 Frimaire, year 6, the Government declared that those due to foreigners were not comprised in the regulation: for this obvious reason, doubtless, that they were not to be benefited by the revolution, and that those only would be justly charged with the expenses to whom the advantages were to result; and they accordingly reported, that a large sum should be applied to the discharge of the demands of foreigners; who were only deprived of the benefit of the report by the change that was afterwards effected in the constitution. In this report, France pursued the example of good faith set by the United States of America, who, in the fiscal arrangements, which necessity compelled them to adopt, respected the rights of foreigners, and paid their contracts, with the most scrupulous exactitude, in specie, while their own citizens were compelled to acquiesce in those arrangements which the general interest of their country (in whose prosperity they were benefited) rendered necessary.

If, sir, the validity of claims could be tested either by the advantages received by the debtor, or the loss sustained by the creditor, none can stand upon stronger ground than those of American citizens against France. They are chiefly founded upon contracts, for articles of the first necessity, furnished when they were most needed, and when the want of them would have plunged France in the utmost distress. They were furnished, too, at the greatest risk to the proprietor, and to so little comparative advantage to the furnisher, that those who, either from political motives, or from juster combination, carried similar commodities to Britain or neutral ports, have been enriched, while those whose enthusiasm in the cause of France led them to seek her harbors will, if strictly paid their capital and interest, be barely snatched from ruin. It was this predilection, too, in favor of France, that furnished Britain with a pretence to commit those depredations on our commerce, by which it so materially suffered, but which, indeed, ever attentive to the preservation of her interest in the United States, she is, of late, very amply compensating by full payment of principal, interest, and damages, for any illegal capture made during the war; while compensation for those which fell under that description in France have, in a great measure, been given up by the late convention; and that due for the remaining few, which ought to have been satisfied by that treaty, have been eluded by some very extraordinary decisions of the Council of Prizes, or by that delay which all the claims of American citizens have hitherto met with.

But, citizen First Consul, it is not now necessary to state the justice of American claims: this has been solemnly recognized by a treaty which expressly stipulates for their payment, and distinguishes the claims of American citizens from those of every other nation. This treaty had been carried into effect in the United States, the Government of which, not allowing themselves to doubt the good faith of France, paid into the hands of the agent of France, and upon his application, a very considerable sum of money, even before it could be strictly claimed under the treaty, and at the moment when her own citizens were entitled to a considerable balance from France: listening, in this transaction, only to those sentiments of good will which influence the conduct of the present Government of the United States towards France, and to her wish to aid her military operations.

There may be cases, citizen First Consul, in which the necessities of a nation may compel her to leave the obligations of a treaty unfulfilled; but, after the flattering picture which is daily exhibited of the prosperity of France, I trust that no such necessity exists here; but, were it otherwise, I am persuaded that you will think that the nation who pleads her necessities for the breach of her treaties cannot, with honor, avail herself of advantages to be drawn from those treaties.

France would never have permitted her minister to claim a payment under the treaty, if she had not determined also, on her part, to pay all that was due from her in virtue of it.

Your signature, citizen First Consul, the attention you manifested to remove ambiguities, by the form under which you were pleased to ratify it give a peculiar weight to the treaty, because they show that it was naturally examined by you, and not passed over in the hurry of other business. But, sir, the receiving money under it is such a consummation of the act, as would make it criminal in me to doubt your ultimate intention to fulfil it.

If, sir, justice, if good faith, and those considerations of magnanimity which influence great nations, urge the immediate fulfilment of the treaty, the wisdom of the provision which stipulates for the discharge of the debt is evinced by its being more consistent even with the pecuniary interest of France to make the fullest payment under it, than it would have been to have cancelled the debt by the treaty. How early, and how happily, soever the war may terminate in the islands, it will take many years before this capital is restored, and the waste of war repaired.

During the whole of this period very considerable supplies must be obtained from the United States. Let them stand at the moderate sum of twenty millions annually. This must be paid either in specie shipped from France, or by credits obtained in the United States. The interest of money, as applied to any improvement in agriculture or manufactures in France, is at least worth eight per cent.; the loss upon the French coin shipped to the United States, is not less than two and one-half per cent., the risk or insurance two and one-half, the time the money must be unemployed before it is shipped in its transit and in America, will average about six months; which makes, at the rate of eight per cent. interest, four per cent.: these different sums make the loss upon the shipment of money to America not less than nine per cent. This, upon twenty millions, is one million eight hundred thousand, whereas, the American debt, principal and interest, computing it at twenty millions, if funded, would only require one million to discharge the interest; and in case this debt was funded, it would be unnecessary to ship any money: for, in that case, the credit of France would be so firmly established, that money might be obtained in any part of America for Government bills, at the current rate of exchange, which is generally in favor of the commercial nations of Europe, but would, in no event, amount to more than three per cent.; upon which, supposing the bills were drawn at sixty days, France would receive an actual profit to more than this amount in the use of money in America, many months before it became payable in France.

But this consideration, citizen First Consul, is trifling when compared to the advantage France would derive from keeping her money at home, where it is so much needed to invigorate her commerce and manufactures, and from the facilities that payments made here to American merchants would afford, in the extension of their commerce with France; notwithstanding the loss that the American creditor would sustain by receiving stock instead of money, after so many years of delay, yet, accommodating themselves to the circumstances of the nation, they would readily acquiesce in accepting that species of payment, if none more advantageous can be conveniently offered by the Government. Nor can I, citizen First Consul, see but one possible objection to placing the American debt upon the five per cent. stock; the trifling interest can certainly be no consideration, unless the Government should apprehend a depression of the stock by the quantity of American debt that their necessities may induce them to throw into the market. But, sir, this may be easily guarded against, if some plan should be adopted, which, having a reference to Louisiana, may render the United States debtors to France for a greater amount than what is due to their citizens; in which case, I am prepared to enter into stipulations for such provisions as will prevent any possible depression of the French funds. Or if, citizen First Consul, you should not think it proper to treat upon the affairs of Louisiana, as having any reference to this object, still it will be easy (by compelling the American creditors to subscribe, in the name of some trustee that shall be appointed by their minister,) to prevent any sale of the stock they hold, under a limited price, or within a limited time.

The next object that has awakened the sensibilities of the United States is, the change that is about to take place in the situation of Louisiana, heightened, as they are, by the silence which the Governments of France and Spain have observed, and still observe, with respect to their treaty, and the rights that the United States claim, and have long exercised, at New Orleans. I have pressed the minister to some pointed declaration on the subject of our right of depot at New Orleans, on the limits as settled with Spain, and on the navigation of the Mississippi; for though it necessarily follows that those rights cannot be injured by a change of jurisdiction, yet it would have been highly satisfactory to the United States to have received some such assurances upon these subjects as would have shown that the treaty between them and Spain was clearly understood, and served to overawe such of the officers of Government as, emboldened by their distance from the sovereign, might act from their own impressions. A recent event, citizen First Consul, has demonstrated the extreme sensibility of the United States on this subject. The Intendant of New Orleans having thought it proper to withdraw the right of depot, secured to the citizens of the United States by the treaty of Madrid, a spirit of resentment has been manifested from one end of the Union to the other, and nothing but the interposition of the Spanish minister, the disavowal of the act by the Governor of New Orleans, and the extreme solicitude of the American Government to avoid every thing which might have a tendency to interrupt the harmony which at present so happily subsists between the United States and every Power in Europe, could have prevented an immediate recurrence to arms; nor am I now without apprehensions that, if nothing is done to calm their anxiety before the season for bringing down the produce of the country occurs, the Government will be compelled to follow the impulse of the people. Under these circumstances, citizen First Consul, it cannot appear improper, prizing, as I do, the connexion between our respective countries, to press for some such explicit and early declaration on the subject of our rights as will serve to calm the anxiety of the United States. Should the agents of France, who are to take possession of the colony, continue the regulations in the face of the treaty which they may find established by the Spanish Intendant, a fatal blow will be struck at the future peace and harmony of both countries. That I may not intrude too far upon your patience, I will merely take the liberty to transport such loose hints as you may possibly think might be improved into some arrangements, alike useful to France and the United States, should you deem it proper to appoint some person to treat with me on this subject. But, in the mean time, as the moments are precious, and the United States will suffer extremely in their commerce, if the officers of France, who are directed to take possession, should not be explicitly instructed to respect the right of navigation and depot claimed by the United States, I must earnestly solicit some treaty, explanatory of the terms on which France has received the cession of Louisiana from Spain, and recognizing the rights of the United States. Should you, citizen First Consul, voluntarily add, as an expression of your good will, provisionally, in case the cession of the Floridas should be completed, a grant to the United States of the free passage through the rivers Mobile and Pensacola, together with a right of depot at their mouths, you would, while you were serving the commerce of France, confer an obligation on the United States that would greatly tend to strengthen the bands of friendship between the allied nations. For though the commerce of these rivers is, at present, very insignificant, yet, at some future period, when the country settles, it may become more important; and, in the mean time, the cession would derive considerable value from the evidence it would afford to the United States of your friendly disposition.

That France will never derive any advantages from the colonization of New Orleans and the Floridas, is fairly to be presumed, from their having been possessed, for more than a century past, by three different nations. While the other colonies of these nations were increasing rapidly, these have always remained weak and languid, and an expensive burthen to the possessor. Even at this moment, with all the advantages that New Orleans has derived from foreign capital, and an accession of inhabitants from the United States, which has brought its free population to about seven thousand souls, the whole of the inhabitants east of the Mississippi does not more than double that number; and those, too, are, for the most part, poor and miserable; and there are physical reasons that must for ever render them inadequate to their own support, in the hands of any European nation. They are, however, important to the United States, because they contain the mouths of some of their rivers, which must make them the source of continual disputes. The interest that the United States attach, citizen First Consul, to your friendship, and the alliance of France, is the principal cause of their anxiety to procure your consent to their accession of that country, and of the sacrifices that they are willing to make to attain it. They consider it as the only possible ground of collision between nations whom so many other interests unite. I cannot, then, citizen First Consul, but express my doubt of any advantage to be derived to France from the retaining of that country in its whole extent; and I think I could show that her true interest would lead her to make such cessions out of them to the United States, as would at once afford supplies to her islands, without draining the money of France, and rivet the friendship of the United States, by removing all ground of jealousy relative to a country of little value in itself, and which will be perpetually exposed to the attacks of her natural enemy, as well from Canada as by sea.

Should this idea not be so fortunate as to meet your approbation, there are still a variety of views in which, by a partial cession, permanent commercial advantages may be acquired: but it would be to intrude too much upon your time to detail them here; deeming them more proper subjects for discussion, if you should think it proper to render them the objects of a treaty.

Permit me, citizen First Consul, before I conclude, to mention a circumstance which embraces the interest both of France and the United States, and that of humanity. The savages on the east side of the Mississippi are numerous and brave; considerable sums of money are annually expended by Spain in purchasing their friendship. Should these supplies be withheld, through neglect or misapplication, a universal massacre of all the planters will ensue. Their detached situation renders it impossible to protect them. I am the more emboldened in making this observation, from the interest the United States have in turning your attention to this object; since, should this melancholy event take place, malignity, or those whose negligence or infidelity may have occasioned it, will not fail to impute t to the intrigues of the United States.

I pray you, citizen First Consul, to pardon the length of this letter, which you will have the goodness to attribute to my extreme anxiety to remove all causes of dispute between France and the country I represent, and to my conviction that some early and effectual arrangements are necessary to prevent those that already exist from growing to an alarming height. No evil can possibly arise from empowering the minister, or such other person as you shall please, to treat with me on the subject of New Orleans; since even the appointment itself will have a conciliatory appearance, and you, citizen First Consul, will govern the negotiation, in which, I trust, nothing will be proposed, on my part, that will not be equally beneficial to both France and the United States.

I have the honor, citizen First Consul, to remain, with the most profound respect and the highest consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT L. LIVINGSTON.

The Secretary of State to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

[GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS.]

GENTLEMEN: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 2, 1803.

You will herewith receive a commission and letters of credence, one of you as minister plenipotentiary, the other as minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, to treat with the Government of the French republic on the subject of the Mississippi, and the territories eastward thereof, and without the limits of the United States. The object in view is to procure, by just and satisfactory arrangements, a cession to the United States of New Orleans and of West and East Florida, or as much thereof as the actual proprietor can be prevailed on to part with.

The French republic is understood to have become the proprietor, by a cession from Spain, in the year ——, of New Orleans, as part of Louisiana, if not of the Floridas also. If the Floridas should not have been then included in the cession, it is not improbable that they will have been since added to it.

It is foreseen that you may have considerable difficulty in overcoming the repugnance and the prejudices of the French Government against a transfer to the United States of so important a part of the acquisition. The apparent solicitude and exertions, amidst many embarrassing circumstances, to carry into effect the cession made to the French republic: the reserve so long used on this subject by the French Government, in its communications with the minister of the United States at Paris, and the declaration finally made by the French Minister of Foreign Relations, that it was meant to take possession before any overtures from the United States would be discussed, show the importance which is attached to the territories in question. On the other hand, as the United States have the strongest motives of interest, and of a pacific policy, to seek by just means the establishment of the Mississippi, down to its mouth, as their boundary, so there are considerations which urge on France a concurrence in so natural and so convenient an arrangement.

Notwithstanding the circumstances which have been thought to indicate, in the French Government, designs of unjust encroachment, and even direct hostility, on the United States, it is scarcely possible to reconcile a policy of that sort with any motives which can be presumed to sway either the Government or the nation. To say nothing of the assurances given both by the French minister at Paris, and by the Spanish minister at Madrid, that the cession by Spain to France was understood to carry with it all the conditions stipulated by the former to the United States, the manifest tendency of hostile measures against the United States to connect their councils and their colossal growth with the great and formidable rival of France, can neither escape her discernment, nor be disregarded by her prudence, and might alone be expected to produce very different views in the Government.

On the supposition that the French Government does not mean to force or to court war with the United States, but, on the contrary, that it sees the interest which France has in cultivating their neutrality and amity, the dangers to so desirable a relation between the two countries which lurk under a neighborhood modified as is that of Spain at present, must have great weight in recommending the change which you will have to propose. These dangers have been always sufficiently evident: and have, moreover, been repeatedly suggested by collisions between the stipulated rights or reasonable expectations of the United States and the Spanish jurisdiction at New Orleans. But they have been brought more strikingly into view by the late proceeding of the Intendant at that place. The sensibility and unanimity in our nation, which have appeared on this occasion, must convince France that friendship and peace with us must be precarious until the Mississippi shall be made the boundary between the United States and Louisiana; and consequently render the present moment favorable to the object with which you are charged.

The time chosen for the experiment is pointed out also by other important considerations. The instability of the peace of Europe, the attitude taken by Great Britain, the languishing state of the French finances, and the absolute necessity of either abandoning the West India Islands, or of sending thither large armaments at great expense, all contribute at the present crisis to prepare in the French Government a disposition to listen to an arrangement which will at once dry up one source of foreign controversy, and furnish some aid in struggling with internal embarrassments. It is to be added, that the overtures committed to you coincide in great measure with the ideas of the person through whom the letter of the President, of April 30, 1802, was conveyed to Mr. Livingston, and who is presumed to have gained some insight into the present sentiments of the French cabinet.

Among the considerations which have led the French Government into the project of regaining from Spain the province of Louisiana, and which you may find it necessary to meet in your discussions, the following suggest themselves as highly probable.

1st. A jealousy of the Atlantic States, as leaning to a coalition with Great Britain not consistent with neutrality and amity towards France, and a belief that, by holding the key to the commerce of the Mississippi, she will be able to command the interests and attachments of the Western portion of the United States, and thereby either control the Atlantic portion also, or, if that cannot be done, to seduce the former into a separate Government, and a close alliance with herself.

In each of these particulars, the calculation is founded in error.

It is not true that the Atlantic States lean towards any connexion with Great Britain inconsistent with their amicable relations to France. Their dispositions and their interests equally prescribe to them amity and impartiality to both of those nations. If a departure from this simple and salutary line of policy should take place, the causes of it will be found in the unjust or unfriendly conduct experienced from one or other of them. In general, it may be remarked, that there are as many points on which the interests and views of the United States and of Great Britain may not be thought to coincide, as can be discovered in relation to France. If less harmony and confidence should, therefore, prevail between France and the United States, than may be maintained between Great Britain and the United States, the difference will lie, not in the want of motives, drawn from the mutual advantage of the two nations, but in the want of favorable dispositions in the Governments of one or other of them. That the blame, in this respect, will not justly fall on the Government of the United States, is sufficiently demonstrated by the mission, and the objects with which you are now charged.

The French Government is not less mistaken, if it supposes that the Western part of the United States can be withdrawn from their present union with the Atlantic part into a separate Government, closely allied with France.

Our Western fellow-citizens are bound to the Union, not only by the ties of kindred and affection, which for a long time will derive strength from the stream of emigration peopling that region, but by two considerations which flow from clear and essential interests.

One of these considerations is, the passage through the Atlantic ports of the foreign merchandise consumed by the Western inhabitants, and the payments thence made to a treasury, in which they would lose their participation by erecting a separate Government. The bulky productions of the Western country may continue to pass down the Mississippi; but the difficulties of the ascending navigation of that river, however free it may be made, will cause the imports for consumption to pass through the Atlantic States. This is the course through which they are now received; nor will the impost to which they will be subject change the course, even if the passage up the Mississippi should be duty free. It will not equal the difference in the freight through the latter channels. It is true that mechanical and other improvements in the navigation of the Mississippi may lessen the labor and expense of ascending the stream; but it is not the least probable, that savings of this sort will keep pace with the improvements in canals and roads, by which the present course of imports will be favored. Let it be added, that the loss of the contributions thus made to a foreign treasury would be accompanied with the necessity of providing, by less convenient revenues, for the expense of a separate Government, and of the defensive precautions required by the change of situation.

The other of these considerations results from the insecurity to which the trade from the Mississippi would be exposed by such a revolution in the western part of the United States. A connexion of the Western people, as a separate State, with France, implies a connexion between the Atlantic States and Great Britain. It is found, from long experience, that France and Great Britain are nearly half their time at war. The case would be the same with their allies. During nearly one-half the time, therefore, the trade of the Western country from the Mississippi would have no protection but that of France, and would suffer all the interruptions which nations having the command of the sea could inflict on it.

It will be the more impossible for France to draw the Western country under her influence, by conciliatory regulations of the trade through the Mississippi; because regulations which would be regarded by her as liberal, and claiming returns of gratitude, would be viewed on the other side as falling short of justice. If this should not be at first the case, it soon would be so. The Western people believe, as do their Atlantic brethren, that they have a natural and indefeasible right to trade freely through the Mississippi. They are conscious of their power to enforce this right against any nation whatever. With these ideas in their minds, it is evident that France will not be able to excite either a sense of favor, or of fear, that would establish an ascendancy over them. On the contrary, it is more than probable, that the different views of their respective rights would quickly lead to disappointments and disgusts on both sides, and thence to collisions and controversies fatal to the harmony of the two nations. To guard against these consequences is a primary motive with the United States in wishing the arrangement proposed. As France has equal reasons to guard against them, she ought to feel an equal motive to concur in the arrangement.

Secondly. The advancement of the commerce of France, by an establishment on the Mississippi, has, doubtless, great weight with the Government in espousing this project.

The commerce through the Mississippi will consist, first, of that of the United States; second, of that of the adjacent territories to be acquired by France.

The first is now, and must for ages continue, the principal commerce. As far as the faculties of France will enable her to share in it, the article to be proposed to her, on the part of the United States, on that subject, promises every advantage she can desire. It is a fair calculation that, under the proposed arrangement, her commercial opportunities would be extended rather than diminished; inasmuch as our present right of deposite gives her the same competitors as she would then have, and the effect of the more rapid settlement of the Western country, consequent on that arrangement, would proportionally augment the mass of commerce to be shared by her.

The other portion of commerce, with the exception of the island of New Orleans, and the contiguous ports of West Florida, depends on the territory westward of the Mississippi. With respect to this portion, it will be little affected by the cession desired by the United States. The footing proposed for her commerce, on the shore to be ceded, gives it every advantage she could reasonably wish, during a period within which she will be able to provide every requisite establishment on the right shore, which, according to the best information, possesses the same facilities for such establishments as are found on the island of New Orleans itself. These circumstances essentially distinguish the situation of the French commerce in the Mississippi, after a cession of New Orleans to the United States, from the situation of the commerce of the United States, without such a cession; their right of deposite being so much more circumscribed, and their territory on the Mississippi not reaching low enough for a commercial establishment on the shore, within their present limits.

There remains to be considered the commerce of the ports in the Floridas. With respect to this branch the advantages which will be secured to France by the proposed arrangement ought to be satisfactory. She will here also derive a greater share from the increase which will be given, by a more rapid settlement of a fertile territory, to the exports and imports through those ports, than she would obtain from any restrictive use she could make of those ports as her own property. But this is not all. The United States have a just claim to the use of the rivers which pass from their territories through the Floridas. They found their claim on like principles with those which supported their claim to the use of the Mississippi. If the length of these rivers be not in the same proportion with that of the Mississippi, the difference is balanced by the circumstance that both banks in the former case belong to the United States.

With a view to permanent harmony between the two nations, a cession of the Floridas is particularly to be desired, as obviating serious controversies that might otherwise grow even out of the regulations, however liberal in the opinion of France, which she may establish at the mouths of those rivers. One of the rivers, the Mobile, is said to be at present navigable for four hundred miles above the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and the navigation may no doubt be opened still further. On all of them, the country within the boundary of the United States, though otherwise between that and the sea, is fertile. Settlements on it are beginning; and the people have already called on the Government to procure the proper outlets to foreign markets. The President, accordingly, gave, some time ago, the proper instructions to the minister of the United States at Madrid. In fact, our free communication with the sea through those channels is so natural, so reasonable, and so essential, that, eventually, it must take place; and in prudence, therefore, ought to be amicably and effectually adjusted without delay.

Third. A further object with France may be, to form a colonial establishment having a convenient relation to her West India Islands, and forming an independent source of supplies for them.

This object ought to weigh but little against the cession we wish to obtain, for two reasons: first, because the country which the cession will leave in her hands on the right side of the Mississippi is capable of employing more than all the faculties she can spare for such an object, and of yielding all the supplies which she could expect or wish from such an establishment: second, because in times of general peace she will be sure of receiving whatever supplies her islands may want, from the United States, and even through the Mississippi, if more convenient to her; because, in time of peace with the United States, though of war with Great Britain, the same sources will be open to her, whilst her own would be interrupted; and because in case of war with the United States, which is not likely to happen without a concurrent war with Great Britain, (the only case in which she could need a distinct fund of supplies,) the entire command of the sea, and of the trade through the Mississippi, would be against her, and would cut off the source in question. She would consequently never need the aid of her new colony, but when she could make little or no use of it.

There may be other objects with France in the projected acquisition; but they are probably such as would be either satisfied by a reservation to herself of the country on the right side of the Mississippi, or are of too subordinate a character to prevail against the plan of adjustment we have in view, in case other difficulties in the way of it can be overcome. The principles and outlines of this plan are as follows, viz:

ARTICLE 1. France cedes to the United States forever the territory east of the river Mississippi, comprehending the two Floridas, the island of New Orleans, and the islands lying to the north and east of that channel of the said river, which is commonly called the South Paos, together with all such other islands as appertain to either West or East Florida; France reserving to herself all her territory on the west side of the Mississippi.

ART. 2. The boundary between the territory ceded and reserved by France, shall be a continuation of that already defined above the thirty-first degree of north latitude, viz: the middle of the channel or bed of the river through the said South Paos to the sea. The navigation of the river Mississippi in its whole breadth from its source to the ocean, and in all its passages to and from the same shall be equally free and common to citizens of the United States and of the French republic.

ART. 3. The vessels and citizens of the French republic may exercise commerce to and at such places on their respective shores below the said thirty-first degree of north latitude as may be allowed for that use by the parties to their respective citizens and vessels. And it is agreed that no other nation shall be allowed to exercise commerce to or at the same or any other place on either shore, below the said thirty-first degree of latitude. For the term of ten years, to be computed from the exchange of the ratifications hereof, the citizens, vessels, and merchandises of the United States, and of France, shall be subject to no other duties on their respective shores below the said thirty-first degree of latitude, than are imposed on their own citizens, vessels, and merchandises. No duty whatever shall, after the expiration of ten years, be laid on articles the growth or manufacture of the United States, or of the ceded territory, exported through the Mississippi in French vessels; so long as such articles so exported in vessels of the United States shall be exempt from duty: nor shall French vessels exporting such articles even afterwards be subject to pay a higher duty than vessels of the United States.

ART. 4. The citizens of France may, for the term of ten years, deposit their effects at New Orleans, and at such other places on the ceded shore of the Mississippi, as are allowed for the commerce of the United States, without paying any other duty than a fair price for the hire of stores.

ART. 5. In the ports and commerce of West and East Florida, France shall never be on a worse footing than the most favored nation; and for the term of ten years her vessels and merchandise shall be subject therein to no higher duties than are paid by those of the United States. Articles of the growth or manufacture of the United States, and of the ceded territory, exported in French vessels from any port in the West or East Florida, shall be exempt from duty as long as vessels of the United States shall enjoy this exemption.

ART. 6. The United States, in consideration of the cession of territory made by this treaty, shall pay to France —— millions of livres tournois, in the manner following, viz: They shall pay —— millions of livres tournois immediately on the exchange of the ratifications hereof: they shall assume, in such order of priority as the Government of the United States may approve, the payment of claims which have been or may be acknowledged by the French republic to be due to American citizens, or so much thereof as, with the payment to be made on the exchange of ratifications, will not exceed the sum of ——; and in case a balance should remain due after such payment and assumption, the same shall be paid at the end of one year from the final liquidation of the claim hereby assumed, which shall be payable in three equal annual payments, the first of which is to take place one year after the exchange of ratifications, or they shall bear interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the dates of such intended payments, until they shall be discharged. All the above-mentioned payments shall be made at the Treasury of the United States, and at the rate of one dollar and ten cents for every six livres tournois.

ART. 7. To incorporate the inhabitants of the hereby ceded territory with the citizens of the United States on an equal footing, being a provision which cannot now be made, it is to be expected, from the character and policy of the United States, that such incorporation will take place without unnecessary delay. In the mean time they shall be secure in their persons and property, and in the free enjoyment of their religion.

Observations on the plan.

1st. As the cession to be made by France in this case must rest on the cession made to her by Spain, it might be proper that Spain should be a party to the transaction. The objections, however, to delay, require that nothing more be asked on our part than either an exhibition and recital of the treaty between France and Spain, or an engagement on the part of France, that the accession of Spain will be given. Nor will it be advisable to insist even on this much, if attended with difficulty or delay, unless there be ground to suppose that Spain will contest the validity of the transaction.

2d. The plan takes for granted, also, that the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, is to lose none of its force in behalf of the former, by any transactions whatever between the latter and France. No change, it is evident, will be, or can be admitted to be produced in that treaty or in the arrangements carried into effect under it, further than it may be superseded by stipulations between the United States and France, who will stand in the place of Spain. It will not be amiss to insist on an express recognition of this by France as an effectual bar against pretexts of any sort, not compatible with the stipulations of Spain.

3d. The first of the articles proposed, in defining the cession, refers to the south pass of the Mississippi, and to the islands north and east of that channel. As this is the most navigable of the several channels, as well as the most direct course to the sea, it is expected that it will not be objected to. It is of the greater importance to make it the boundary, because several islands will be thereby acquired, one of which is said to command this channel, and to be already fortified. The article expressly includes also the islands appertaining to the Floridas. To this there can be no objection. The islands within six leagues of the shore are the subject of a British proclamation in the year 1763, subsequent to the cession of the Floridas to Great Britain by France, which is not known to have ever been called in question by either France or Spain.

The second article requires no particular observations.

Article three is one whose import may be expected to undergo the severest scutiny. The modification to be desired is that which, whilst it provides for the interests of the United States, will be acceptable to France, and will give no just ground of complaint and the least of discontent to Great Britain.

The present form of the article ought, and probably will be, satisfactory to France: first, because it secures to her all the commercial advantages in the river which she can well desire; secondly, because it leaves her free to contest the mere navigation of the river by Great Britain, without the consent of France.

The article, also, in its present form, violates no right of Great Britain, nor can she reasonably expect of the United States that they will contend, beyond their obligation, for her interest, at the expense of their own. As far as Great Britain can claim the use of the river under her treaties with us, or by virtue of contiguous territory, the silence of the article on that subject leaves the claim unaffected. As far again as she is entitled, under the treaty of 1794, to the use of our bank of the Mississippi above the thirty-first degree of north latitude, her title will be equally entire. The article stipulates against her only in its exclusion of her commerce from the bank to be ceded below our present limits. To this she cannot of right object. First, because the territory not belonging to the United States at the date of our treaty with her is not included in its stipulations. Secondly, because the privileges to be enjoyed by France are for a consideration which Great Britain has not given and cannot give. Thirdly, because the exclusion in this case being a condition on which the territory will be ceded and accepted, the right to communicate the privilege to Great Britain will never have been vested in the United States. But although these reasons fully justify the article in its relation to Great Britain, it will be advisable, before it be proposed, to feel the pulse of the French Government with respect to a stipulation, that each of the parties may, without the consent of the other, admit whomsoever it pleases to navigate the river and trade with their respective shores on the same terms, as in other parts of France and the United States, and as far as the disposition of that Government will concur, to vary the proposition accordingly. It is not probable that this concurrence will be given: but the trial to obtain it will not only manifest a friendly regard to the wishes of Great Britain, and, if successful, furnish a future price for privileges within her grant, but is a just attention to the interests of our Western fellow citizens, whose commerce will not otherwise be on an equal footing with that of the Atlantic States.

Should France not only refuse any such change in the article, but insist on a recognition of her right to exclude all nations other than the United States from navigating the Mississippi, it may be observed to her that a positive stipulation to that effect might subject us to the charge of intermeddling with and prejudging questions existing merely between her and Great Britain; that the silence of the article is sufficient; that, as Great Britain never asserted a claim on this subject against Spain, it is not to be presumed that she will assert it against France, on her taking the place of Spain; that, if the claim should be asserted, the treaties between the United States and Great Britain will have no connexion with it, the United States having, in those treaties, given their separate consent only to the use of the river by Great Britain, leaving her to seek whatever other consent may be necessary.

If, notwithstanding such expostulations as these, France shall inflexibly insist on an express recognition to the above effect, it will be better to acquiesce in it, than to lose the opportunity of fixing an arrangement in other respects satisfactory; taking care to put the recognition into a form not inconsistent with our treaties with Great Britain, or with an explanatory article that may not improbably be desired by her.

In truth, it must be admitted, that France, holding one bank, may exclude from the use of the river any nation not more connected with it by territory than Great Britain is understood to be. As a river where both its banks are owned by one nation belongs exclusively to that nation, it is clear that, when the territory on one side is owned by one nation, and on the other side by another nation, the river belongs equally to both, in exclusion of all others. There are two modes by which an equal right may be exercised; the one by a negative in each on the use of the river by any other nation, except the joint proprietor: the other by allowing each to grant the use of the river to other nations, with the consent of the joint proprietor. The latter mode would be preferable to the United States. But if it be found absolutely inadmissible to France, the former must, in point of expediency, since it may in point of right, be admitted by the United States. Great Britain will have the less reason to be dissatisfied on this account, as she has never asserted against Spain a right of entering and navigating the Mississippi, nor has either she or the United States ever founded on the treaties between them a claim to the interposition of the other party in any respect, although the river has been constantly shut against Great Britain from the year 1783 to the present moment, and was not opened to the United States until 1795, the year of their treaty with Spain.

It is possible, also, that France may refuse to the United States the same commercial use of her stores, as she will require for herself on those ceded to the United States. In this case, it will be better to relinquish a reciprocity than to frustrate the negotiation. If the United States held in their own right the shore to be ceded to them, the commercial use of it allowed to France would render a reciprocal use of her shore by the United States an indispensable condition. But as France may, if she chooses, reserve to herself the commercial use of the ceded shore as a condition of the cession, the claim of the United States to the like use of her shore would not be supported by the principle of reciprocity, and may, therefore, without violating that principle, be waved in the transaction.

The article limits to ten years the equality of French citizens, vessels, and merchandises, with those of the United States: should a longer period be insisted on, it may be yielded. The limitation may even be struck out, if made essential by France; but a limitation in this case is so desirable, that it is to be particularly pressed, and the shorter the period the better.

Art. 4. The right of deposite, provided for in this article, will accommodate the commerce of France to and from her own side of the river, until an emporium shall be established on that side, which it is well known will admit of a convenient one. The right is limited to ten years, because such an establishment may within that period be formed by her; should a longer period be required, it may be allowed, especially as the use of such a deposite would probably fall within the general regulations of our commerce there. At the same time, as it will be better that it should rest on our own regulations than on a stipulation, it will be proper to insert a limitation of time, if France can be induced to acquiesce in it.

Art. 5. This article makes a reasonable provision for the commerce of France in the ports of West and East Florida. If the limitation to ten years of its being on the same footing with that of the United States should form an insuperable objection, the term may be enlarged; but it is much to be wished that the privilege may not in this case be made perpetual.

Art. 6. The pecuniary consideration to be offered for the territories in question is stated in the sixth article: you will of course favor the United States as much as possible, both in the amount and modifications of the payments. There is some reason to believe that the gross sum expressed in the article has occurred to the French Government, and is as much as will be finally insisted on: it is possible that less may be accepted, and the negotiation ought to be adapted to that supposition. Should a greater sum be made on ultimatum on the part of France, the President has made up his mind to go as far as fifty millions of livres tournois, rather than lose the main object. Every struggle, however, is to be made against such an augmentation of the price, that will consist with an ultimate acquiescence in it.

The payment to be made immediately on the exchange of ratifications is left blank; because it cannot be foreseen either what the gross sum or the assumed debts will be, or how far a reduction of the gross sum may be influenced by the anticipated payments provided for by the act of Congress herewith communicated, and by the authorization of the President and Secretary of the Treasury endorsed thereon. This provision has been made with a view to enable you to take advantage of the urgency of the French Government for money, which may be such as to overcome their repugnance to part with what we want, and to induce them to part with it on lower terms, in case a payment can be made before the exchange of ratifications. The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of State, of which a copy is herewith enclosed, will explain the manner in which this advance of the ten millions of livres, or so much thereof as may be necessary, will be raised most conveniently for the United States. It only remains here to point out the condition or event on which the advance may be made. It will be essential that the convention be ratified by the French Government before any such advance be made; and it may be further required, in addition to the stipulation to transfer possession of the ceded territory as soon as possible, that the orders for the purpose, from the competent source, may be actually and immediately put into your hands. It will be proper, also, to provide for the repayment of the advances, in the event of a refusal of the United States to ratify the convention.

It is apprehended that the French Government will feel no repugnance to our designating the classes of claims and debts, which, embracing more equitable considerations than the rest, we may believe entitled to a priority of payment. It is probable, therefore, that the clause of the sixth article, referring it to our discretion, may be safely insisted upon. We think the following classification such as ought to be adopted by ourselves:

First. Claims under the fourth article of the convention of September, 1800.

Secondly. Forced contracts or sales imposed upon our citizens by French authorities; and,

Thirdly. Voluntary contracts which have been suffered to remain unfulfilled by them.

Where our citizens have become creditors of the French Government in consequence of agencies or appointments derived from it, the United States are under no particular obligation to patronize their claims, and, therefore, no sacrifice of any sort, in their behalf, ought to be made in the arrangement. As far as this class of claimants can be embraced without embarrassing the negotiation, or influencing in any respect the demands or expectations of the French Government, it will not be improper to admit them into the provision. It is not probable, however, that such a deduction, from the sum ultimately to be received by the French Government, will be permitted, without some equivalent accommodation to its interests, at the expense of the United States.

The claims of Mr. Beaumarchais, and several other French individuals, on our Government, founded upon antiquated or irrelevant grounds, although they may be attempted to be included in this negotiation, have no connexion with it. The American Government is distinguished for its just regard to the rights of foreigners, and does not require those of individuals to become subjects of treaty in order to be admitted. Besides, their discussion involves a variety of minute topics, with which you may fairly declare yourselves to be unacquainted. Should it appear, however, in the course of the negotiation, that so much stress is laid on this point, that, without some accommodation, your success will be endangered, it will be allowable to bind the United States for the payment of one million of livres tournois to the representatives of Beaumarchais, heretofore deducted from his accounts against them; the French Government declaring the same never to have been advanced to him on account of the United States.

Article 7 is suggested by the respect due to the rights of the people inhabiting the ceded territory, and by the delay which may be found in constituting them a regular and integral portion of the Union. A full respect for their rights might require their consent to the act of cession; and if the French Government should be disposed to concur in any proper mode of obtaining it, the provision would be honorable to both nations. There is no doubt that the inhabitants would readily agree to the proposed transfer of their allegiance.

It is hoped that the idea of a guaranty of the country reserved to France may not be brought into the negotiation. Should France propose such a stipulation, it will be expedient to evade it, if possible, as more likely to be a source of disagreeable questions between the parties, concerning the actual casus fœderis, than of real advantage to France. It is not in the least probable that Louisiana, in the hands of that nation, will be attacked by any other, whilst it is in the relations to the United States on which the guaranty would be founded; whereas, nothing is more probable than some difference of opinion as to the circumstances and the degree of danger necessary to put the stipulations in force. There will be the less reason in the demand of such an article, as the United States would set little value on a guaranty of any part of their territory; and, consequently, there would be no just reciprocity in it. Should France, notwithstanding these considerations, make a guaranty an essential point, it will be better to accede to it than to abandon the object of the negotiation; mitigating the evil as much as possible, by requiring, for the casus fœderis, a great and manifest danger threatened to the territory guarantied, and by substituting for an indefinite succor, or even a definite succor, in military force, a fixed sum of money payable at the treasury of the United States. It is difficult to name the proper sum which is in no posture of the business to be exceeded, but it can scarcely be presumed that more than about —— dollars, to be paid annually during the existence of the danger, will be insisted on. Should it be unavoidable to stipulate troops in place of money, it will be prudent to settle the details with as much precision as possible, that there may be no room for controversy, either with France or with her enemy, on the fulfilment of the stipulation.

The instructions, thus far given, suppose that France may be willing to cede to the United States the whole of the island of New Orleans, and both the Floridas. As she may be inclined to dispose of a part or parts, and of such only, it is proper for you to know that the Floridas, together, are estimated at one-fourth the value of the whole island of New Orleans, and East Florida at one-half that of West Florida. In case of a partial cession, it is expected that the regulations of every other kind, so far as they are onerous to the United States, will be more favorably modified.

Should France refuse to cede the whole of the island, as large a portion as she can be prevailed on to part with may be accepted; should no considerable portion of it be attainable, it will still be of vast importance to get a jurisdiction over space enough for a large commercial town, and its appurtenances, on the bank of the river, and as little remote from the mouth of the river as may be. A right to choose the place would be better than a designation of it in the treaty. Should it be impossible to procure a complete jurisdiction over any convenient spot whatever, it will only remain to explain and improve the present right of deposite, by adding thereto the express privilege of holding real estate for commercial purposes, of providing hospitals, of having consuls residing there, and other agents who may be authorized to authenticate and deliver all documents requisite for vessels belonging to, and engaged in, the trade of the United States, to and from the place of deposite. The United States cannot remain satisfied, nor the Western people be kept patient, under the restrictions which the existing treaty with Spain authorizes.

Should a cession of the Floridas not be attainable, your attention will also be due to the establishment of suitable deposites at the mouths of the rivers passing from the United States through the Floridas, as well as of the free navigation of those rivers by citizens of the United States. What has been above suggested in relation to the Mississippi, and the deposites on its banks, is applicable to the other rivers; and additional hints relative to them all may be derived from the letter, of which a copy is enclosed, from the consul at New Orleans.

It has been long manifest that, whilst the injuries to the United States, so frequently occurring from the colonial officers scattered over our hemisphere and in our neighborhood, can only be repaired by a resort to their respective Governments in Europe, it will be impossible to guard against the most serious inconveniences. The late events at New Orleans strongly manifest the necessity of placing a power somewhere nearer to us capable of correcting and controlling the mischievous proceedings of such officers towards our citizens; without which, a few individuals, not always among the wisest or best of men, may at any time threaten the good understanding of the two nations. The distance between the United States and the old continent, and the mortifying delays of explanations and negotiations across the Atlantic on emergencies in our neighborhood, render such a provision indispensable; and it cannot be long before all the Governments of Europe, having American colonies, must see the necessity of making it. This object, therefore, will likewise claim your special attention.

It only remains to suggest, that, considering the possibility of some intermediate violences between citizens of the United States and the French or Spaniards, in consequence of the interruption of our right of deposite, and the probability that considerable damages will have been occasioned by that measure to citizens of the United States, it will be proper that indemnification in the latter case be provided for, and that in the former it shall not be taken on either side as a ground or pretext for hostilities.

These instructions, though as full as they could be conveniently made, will necessarily leave much to your discretion. For the proper exercise of it, the President relies on your information, your judgment, and your fidelity to the interests of your country.

JAMES MADISON.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 8, 1803.

SIR:

My last letter was of January 18. Yours since received are of the 6th and 28th of November.

Our latest authentic information from New Orleans is of January 20. At that date the edict of the Intendant against our right of deposite had not been revoked, although the letters to him and the Governor from the Spanish minister here had been previously received. And it appears that the first outrage had been followed by orders of the most rigid tenor against every hospitable intercourse between our citizens navigating the river and the Spanish inhabitants.

This continuation of the obstruction to our trade, and the approach of the season for carrying down the Mississippi the exports of the Western country, have had the natural effect of increasing the Western irritation, and emboldening the advocates for an immediate redress by arms. Among the papers enclosed, you will find the propositions moved in the Senate by Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania. They were debated at considerable length, and with much ardor, and, on the question, had eleven votes in their favor against fourteen. The resolutions moved by Mr. Breckenridge, and which have passed into a law, will, with the law itself, be also found among the enclosed papers.

These proceedings ought more and more to convince the Spanish Government that it must not only maintain good faith with the United States, but must add, to this pledge of peace, some provident and effectual arrangement, as heretofore urged, for controlling or correcting the wrongs of Spanish officers in America, without the necessity of crossing the Atlantic for the purpose. The same proceedings will show, at the same time, that, with proper dispositions and arrangements on the part of Spain, she may reckon with confidence on harmony and friendship with this country. Notwithstanding the deep stroke made at our rights and our interests, and the opportunity given for self redress, in a summary manner, a love of peace, a respect for the just usages of nations, and a reliance on the voluntary justice of the Spanish Government, have given a preference to remonstrance, as the first appeal on the occasion, and to negotiation as a source of adequate provisions for perpetuating the good understanding between the two nations; the measures taken on the proposition of Mr. Breckenridge being merely those of ordinary precaution, and precisely similar to those which accompanied the mission of Mr. Jay to Great Britain in 1794. Should the deposite, however, not be restored in time for the arrival of the spring craft, a new crisis will occur, which it is presumed that the Spanish Government will have been stimulated to prevent, by the very heavy claims of indemnification to which it would be otherwise fairly subjected. The Marquis de Casa Yrujo does not yet despair of receiving from New Orleans favorable answers to his letters; but the remedy seems now to be more reasonably expected from Madrid. If the attention of the Spanish Government should not have been sufficiently quickened by the first notice of the proceeding, from its own officers, we hope that the energy of your interpositions will have overcome its tardy habits, and have produced an instant despatch of the necessary orders.

Mr. Monroe was to sail from New York to Havre de Grace yesterday. He carries with him the instructions in which you are joined with him, as well as those which include Mr. Livingston.

The convention signed with Spain in August, though laid before the Senate at an early day, had no question taken on it till the close of the session. It was then postponed till the next session, which is to commence in November. More than a majority, but less than two-thirds, which the constitution requires, would have acquiesced in the instrument in its present form; trusting to the success of further negotiations for supplying its defects, particularly the omission of the claims founded on French irregularities. But it is understood that it would have been a mere acquiescence; no doubt being entertained that Spain is bound to satisfy the omitted as well as the included claims. In explaining, therefore, the course taken by the Senate, which mingles respect for the Spanish Government with a cautious regard to our own rights, you will avail yourself of the opportunity of pressing the reasonableness and the sound policy of remodelling the convention in such a manner as to do full justice. I need not repeat the observations heretofore made on the Spanish responsibility for the conduct of French citizens within Spanish jurisdiction; but it may be of use to refer you to the enclosed copy of a royal order, issued by the Spanish Government, in 1799, which will enable you to remind them of their own view of the subject at that time. In this document it is expressly declared that the French consular jurisdiction was not admitted, and that French consuls, in Spanish ports, were in the same condition as those of every other nation. After such a declaration against the authority of French consuls, the Spanish Government would be chargeable with no less disrespect to the French republic than to itself, in saying that Spain was not left at liberty to prevent an exercise of the usurped authority; and, if at liberty, she is indisputably answerable for the consequences of not preventing it.

With sentiments, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, ESQ.,

R. R. Livingston to James Madison, Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 11, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

I have a few days since written to you, transmitting a letter addressed to the First Consul: for though I had numerous notes and observations under his eye, in an informal way, yet I have reason to fear that what I wrote to the minister, particularly on the subject of the debt, had not reached him; besides that, I believed that he could not pass over a more direct address to him personally. I found, upon conversing with some of the ministers here, that they considered my direct address as improper, and likely to offend the minister, if not the consul. But our situation was such as to require something decisive; and as I daily found the dispositions of M. Talleyrand were friendly to our views, I promised the minister to write, and offered to submit my letter to him before I sent it. He was pleased with this mark of confidence, and promised not only to deliver it, but to support my application. When I showed him the letter he seemed to think that all relating to the debt was hopeless. I, however, could not abandon this important object, but immediately, upon sending it, took care to have that part of it supported by consul Le Brun, who has the principal direction of the affairs of finance, with whom I am upon a very friendly footing, and between whom and my friend Marbois there is a family connexion, strengthened by the marriage of their children. I have the pleasure to enclose you the answer to that letter; you will find in it such strong and such satisfactory assurances on the subject of the debt, as I think gives us the firmest prospects of its speedy payment. I have thought it necessary to communicate this to the Americans here, in order to prevent their parting with their claims at an insignificant price. I have, also, as I knew that this account would reach America by private conveyances, before you could communicate it, thought it proper to mention it generally to one of my friends, with directions to speak of it publicly, in order to prevent the creditors from suffering by the speculations of those who were in the secret.

I told you that M. Talleyrand had assured me that no sale would be heard of. You will find a passage in the note which was doubtless intended to convey that idea in very strong terms. As I know it to be the fixed determination of this Government to treat only in America, I have nothing more to do on this subject than to endeavor to get the right of depôt left upon the footing it was till your negotiations are concluded. This I shall endeavor to effect. If, upon the arrival of Mr. Monroe, he can suggest any thing better, I shall heartily concur with him. In treating with General Bernadotte, you will have every possible advantage. The nearer he views the object, the less he will value it. His dispositions are as friendly as possible to our Government and country; and his ideas relative to our connexion, and the little importance of Louisiana, exactly such as I would wish. My conversations with him on that subject were frequent and interesting; as well as with Mr. Adet, who is much in his confidence, and who thinks exactly as I do. The great object that he will be instructed to keep in view will be, I think, from what I learn here, to keep the British out of the river, and to secure as much as possible of the carrying trade to France. Dupont de Nemours has shown me a plan that he gave to consul Le Brun, of which I send you a copy. I have endeavored to convince those who may be consulted of its impracticability. The reasons are too obvious to make it necessary for me to state them to you. I have hinted at making the island of New Orleans an independent State, under the Government of Spain, France, and the United States, with a right of depôt to each, subject to a duty on imports of one and a half per cent. in lieu of storage, wharfage, &c., suggesting the advantages that France would derive from being the only manufacturing nation of the three. The advantages of this to our carrying trade (while it left our revenue untouched) are obvious. And in such a treaty, arrangements might be made extremely advantageous to the Western people. The new nation must always feel its dependence upon us, and, of course, respect our rights. I should not have thought it worth while to mention this, had it not been that I gave an unsigned and informal sketch of it to Joseph Bonaparte: it may possibly be given to General Bernadotte. If, as I begin to believe, they do not get the Floridas, they will put the less value on New Orleans.

Things every day look more towards a rupture between this country and Britain: and, though the politicians think otherwise, I believe a war not very distant. The stocks here have been sixty-five; they are now sixty-one. This, however, is an artificial operation; money being employed by the Government to keep them up. Their real price would be about fifty-seven.

I am, dear sir, with the highest consideration, your most obedient humble servant,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

[Enclosed in Mr. Livingston's despatch of March 11, 1803.]

M. Talleyrand to Mr. Livingston.

MONSIEUR:

PARIS, ce 19 Ventose, an 11.

Le Premier Consul, en me remettant le mémoire que vous lui avez présenté, m'a donné l'ordre de vous assurer qu'il avait pris en grande considération les objets que vous y traitez, et les diverses demandes que vous lui avez adressées.

Il s'est, en même temps, fait faire un rapport sur toutes les affaires qui ont tiré à ces demandes, et sur les clauses de la dernière convention entre la France et les Etats Unis, à lequel vous le référez. L'intention du Premier Consul (et il m'a chargé de vous le déclarer) est, que cette convention, dans toutes ses clauses, soit ponctuellement et scrupuleusement exécutée.

Les reflexions qui, dans vôtre mémoire, se rapportent aux difficultés de cette exécution par rapport à la France, ne s'appliquent, avec aucune espèce de fondement, ni aux dispositions du Gouvernement de la république, ni à la situation de ses finances. Le Premier Consul est persuadé, que les présomptions qui vous ont abusé sur ce point vous ont été inspirées par une inquiétude de bienveillance; mais ces présomptions ne s'accordent point avec les faits. Il n'y a point d'embarras de finances en France. Le Gouvernement Français a le moyen autant que la volonté d'être juste; et si trouva-t-il dans une position où l'acquit de ses engagemens serait pour lui une obligation pénible à remplir, il saurait s'élever au-dessus des difficultés, et satisfaire à tout ce qui serait légitimement réclamé.

Quant au fait des dettes Américaines, dont vous donnez l'evaluation dans le mémoire addressé au Premier Consul, je dois vous avouer qu'il est tout-à-fait nouveau pour nous, que, par aucune appréciation, elles puissent s'élever à la somme de vingt millions. Le Premier Consul me charge à vous demander un état exact, constant, complet, et vérifié, de ces dettes. La parfaite confiance que vous lui avez inspirée ne lui permet pas de douter que vous mettez dans l'examen des élémens qui doivent former cet état tout le discernement de vôtre esprit, et toute la franchise de vôtre caractère. Vous devez être persuadé, Monsieur, que, d'après un tel état, tout sera promptement et exactement soldé.

Quant à la deuxième question que vous avez traitée dans vôtre mémoire, ce qui est rélative à la Louisiane, le Premier Consul eut désiré que vous en eussiez fait l'objet d'un office distinct et isolé. Des affaires d'une aussi différente nature ne doivent point se rapprocher, et encore moins se confondre. Il est tout-à-fait contre les maximes du Gouvernement de la république de mêler ensemble les rapports importans et délicats de la politique avec des calculs de solde et des intérets d'argent.

Toutefois le Premier Consul, appréciant les motifs qui vous ont fait insister sur l'explication des nouveaux rapports qui peuvent exister entre les deux républiques, me charge de vous informer, que, prévenu de l'intérêt, prématuré, peut-être, mais au fond naturel et plausible, que les Etats Unis semblent mettre à cette discussion, il a pris le parti d'envoyer sur le champ un ministre plénipotentiaire en Amérique, pour qu'il put le plutôt possible lui faire un rapport, qui le mit en mesure de tout éclaircir avant de prendre sa détermination sur cet objet.

Du reste dans cette circonstance, comme dans toutes celles où il pourra se présenter un objet de discussion entre les deux Gouvernemens, le Premier Consul désire que je vous donne, sur ces dispositions, à l'égard des Etats Unis, les assurances les plus positives et les plus formelles que son attachement pour vôtre république, son estime et sa considération personelle pour le Premier Magistrat qui la gouverne, sont des sentimens nationaux, que, comme Français, et comme chef du peuple le plus constamment, le plus anciennement ami de la nation Américaine, il aime à professer, et dont il se fera toujours une douce obligation de vous donner des preuves.

En me félicitant d'être, dans ce moment, l'organe des sentimens du Premier Consul, permettez que je vous renouvelle, monsieur, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Son Excellence Mons. LIVINGSTON,
Ministre Plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Talleyrand to Mr. Livingston.

PARIS, Ventose, an 11, (February 19,) 1803.

SIR:

The First Consul, in placing in my hands the memoir which you have presented to him, has ordered me to assure you that he has taken into serious consideration the objects you have had in view, and the various demands which you have presented.

He has, at the same time, caused a report to be made on all the subjects which may arise in consequence of these demands, and on the clauses of the convention between France and the United States, to which you refer. It is the intention of the First Consul (and he has charged me to make it known to you) that this convention shall be executed, in every particular, with scrupulous exactness.

The reflections contained in your memoir, in relation to the difficulties which, on the part of France, may attend its execution, do not apply, with the least foundation, either to the dispositions of the Government of the French republic, or to the state of her finances. The First Consul is persuaded that the impressions by which you have on this point been misled, have been occasioned by your friendly solicitude; but these impressions are not supported by facts. No embarrassment exists in the finances of France. The French Government has the means as well as the inclination to be just: and if it should be placed in a position in which the discharge of its obligations would be attended with difficulties, it will know how to surmount these obstacles, and satisfy every claim that can be justly demanded.

As to the American debts, of which you have given an estimate, in the memoir addressed to the First Consul, I ought to apprize you that it is entirely new to us that they can be raised, by any valuation whatever, to the sum of twenty millions. The First Consul charges me to request of you an exact, full, certain, and verified statement of these debts. The perfect confidence with which you have inspired him will not permit him to doubt that in the examination of the particulars, which will form this statement, you will exercise your accustomed acuteness of mind and frankness of character. You may rest assured, sir, that, upon being furnished with such a statement, every claim will be promptly and fully discharged.

As to the second question in your memoir, which relates to Louisiana, the First Consul would have preferred its having been the subject of a separate note. Affairs so different in their nature ought to be kept as much as possible apart, and should certainly not be united. It is entirely opposed to the maxims of Government, adopted by the republic, to mingle important and delicate political relations with calculations of account and mere pecuniary interests.

The First Consul, always appreciating the motives which have induced you to insist on an explanation of the new relations which ought to exist between the two republics, has charged me to inform you, that, aware of the solicitude, perhaps premature, but, in reality, natural and plausible, which the United States have manifested in this discussion, has come to the determination to send immediately to the United States a minister plenipotentiary, who will communicate on every point the information necessary to a final decision.

Under these circumstances, as well as in all others presenting topics for discussion between the two Governments, the First Consul desires that you shall give, on the subject of his dispositions towards the United States, the most positive and formal assurances, that attachment for your republic, and esteem and personal consideration for its present Chief Magistrate, are national sentiments which, as a Frenchman, and as the chief of a people, the ancient and uniform friend of the American nation, he loves to profess, and of which he will always be under the pleasing obligation to furnish unequivocal proofs.

While I felicitate myself upon being, at this time, the medium by which these sentiments of the First Consul are expressed, allow me, sir, to renew the assurance of my high consideration.

CHARLES MAU. TALLEYRAND.

An extract of a note from Mr. Dupont de Nemours to the Consul Le Brun.

"Je vois plusieurs moyens de finir le débat, et je désire que ce soit, en nous procurant le commerce, à peu près exclusif de ces cinq Etats de l'ouest particulièrement interessés dans la question. Le premier, et le plus simple, me parait de déclarer la Nouvelle Orleans port franc pour les deux nations, Espagnole et Francaise, à l'entrée et à la sortie par l'embouchure du Mississippi, et pour les Etats Unis à l'entrée par le haut, et à la sortie par le bas du fleuve. La navigation démeurant libre aux trois nations dans tous son cours, sous la condition expresse que les Etats Unis exempteront de tout droit les marchandises Françaises ou Espagnoles entrant sur leur territoire par le Mississippi ou l'Ohio.

"De cette manière nous aurions conquis pour nos manufactures, nos étoffes, notre quincaillerie, nos verres à vitre, et à boire, et en bouteilles; le debit de nos vins, de nos vinaigres, de nos huiles, de nos fruits secs, tout les commerce de ces cinq Etats de l'ouest, et tout celui des nouveaux Etats qui se propagent si vite dans ce pays.

"Les produits des manufactures Anglaises n'y pouvant parvenir que par terre, et chargés en outre de 12 ou 15 per cent. de droites, seraient par le fait exclus de la concurrence. Ce serait frapper nos ennemis dans leur endroit sensible, et confirmer, avec avantage, l'amitié de nos amis. Ce serait nous assurer que l'intérieur de l'Amérique, depuis les Apalaches jusq'aux hautes montagnes, qui sont au dela des lacs, ne sera défriché ni peuplé qu'au profit de notre commerce."

[TRANSLATION.]

"I see many ways of terminating this contest, and I desire that, whatever it may be, while favoring our commerce, it may exclude as much as possible the commerce of the five States of the West which are most interested in this question. The first, and most simple, appears to be this: to declare New Orleans a free port for the two nations, France and Spain, whose commerce shall enter and depart through the delta of the Mississippi; and that the United States shall only enter from above, and depart by the same embouchure of the river. The navigation remaining free to the three nations throughout its whole course, on the express condition that the United States shall exempt from every species of duty French or Spanish merchandise entering their territory by the Mississippi or Ohio.

In this manner, we shall have conquered, for the benefit of our manufactures, our silks, ironmongery, and glass of every description, and for the consumption of our wines, vinegar, oil, and dried fruits, all the commerce of the five States of the West, as well as of the new States, which in this country multiply so rapidly.

"The products of the English manufactories not being admitted, except by land, and then burthened with a duty of twelve or fifteen per cent., will, in reality, be excluded from competition with those of France. Thus will our enemies be struck in the part most susceptible of injury, while the good will of our friends will be advantageously confirmed. This will give us the assurance that the interior of America, from the Alleghany on the one side, to the elevated mountains beyond the lakes on the other, will only be populated and supplied by means of the manufacturing industry, the agricultural prosperity, and the commercial riches of France."

Extract:—Robert R. Livingston to the President of the United States.

DEAR SIR: PARIS, March 12, 1803.

I have delayed replying to your friendly letter by Madame Brougniart, in the hope of having something important to communicate; but, in the mean time, have been so full in my letter to the Secretary of State that I have left myself little to say on the subject of my public affairs. I can only tell you, generally, that we have been gaining ground here for some time past; and although some propositions which I had an opportunity to make to Joseph Bonaparte to be submitted to the Consul's inspection were not agreed to, yet the matter and the manner left a favorable impression, and I meant to renew the subject on the same grounds.

My letter to the First Consul, which you will find couched in pretty strong terms, and such as are not usual here, and, so far as it related to the claims, repugnant to the minister's sentiments, has been attended with happy effects, as you will find by the answer transmitted herewith to the Secretary of State. I think it impossible, after this, for him to go back; and I have accordingly given information to the American creditors of the state of their affairs that they may not be speculated upon.

With respect to a negotiation for Louisiana, I think nothing will be effected here. I have done every thing I can, through the Spanish ambassador, to obstruct the bargain for the Floridas, and I have great hope that it will not be soon concluded. The ambassador tells me that the Consul often complains to him of the delay that business meets with: and, while Spain keeps the Floridas, Louisiana will be considered here as an object of little moment, as they are absolutely without ports in the Gulf, and so far facilitate your negotiations with General Bernadotte. I have had many interesting conversations with him, and have nothing to complain of. Remember, however, neither to wound his pride nor that of his nation; both being extremely irritable.

Mr. Madison has never told me whether he has received two little essays, calculated, the one to raise our importance in the views of this Government as a naval Power; and the other to disgust them with Louisiana, preparatory to our future negotiations. They were both read with considerable attention by the First Consul, having had them translated for that purpose.

I broke off this part of my letter to attend Madame Bonaparte's drawing-room, where a circumstance happened of sufficient importance to merit your attention. * * * * * * After the First Consul had gone the circuit of one room, he turned to me, and made some of the common inquiries usual on these occasions. He afterwards returned, and entered into a further conversation. When he quitted me, he passed most of the other ministers merely with a bow, went up to Lord Whitworth, and, after the first civilities, said: "I find, my lord, your nation want war again." L. W. "No, sir, we are very desirous of peace." First Consul: "You have just finished a war of fifteen years." L. W. "It is true, sir, and that war was fifteen years too long." Consul: "But you want another war of fifteen years." L. W. "Pardon me, sir, we are very desirous of peace." Consul: "I must either have Malta or war." L. W. "I am not prepared, sir, to speak on that subject; and I can only assure you, citizen First Consul, that we wish for peace." The prefect of the palace then came up to the Consul, and informed him that there were ladies in the next room, and asked him to go in. He made no reply, but, bowing hastily to the company, retired immediately to his cabinet, without entering the other room. Lord Whitworth came up to me, and repeated the conversation as I now give you. I asked Lord Whitworth whether there were any pending negotiations relative to Malta. He told me that there were; that the conduct of France having convinced them that they still had views upon Egypt, and the guaranties to which they were entitled, with respect to Malta, not having been executed, they thought they could not surrender it with safety. But what brought on the business to-day was, a message from the King of Great Britain to the Parliament on the 1st, which has just been received here, speaking with distrust of the armaments in the French ports, and, in fact, preparing them for war. This you will have sooner by the way of England, than this letter. It is, then, highly probable that a new rupture will take place, since it is hardly possible that the First Consul would commit himself so publicly, unless his determination had been taken. I am fearful that this may again throw some impediment in the way of our claims, which I believed in so prosperous a train. In other views it may serve us, and I shall give all my attention to avail myself of circumstances as they arise; in which I hope shortly to receive the assistance of Mr. Monroe.

I must pray you, sir, to furnish Mr. Madison with such an extract from this letter as ought to be on his file of correspondence with me; since the fear of losing the opportunity, and the necessity of the greater activity at this interesting moment, will deprive me of the pleasure of writing further to him by this conveyance.

I am, &c. ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 17, 1803.

SIR:

War seems more and more probable; indeed, it appears to me inevitable. Holland will be involved, and Spain and Portugal must obey the commands of France. The day after the King's message to Parliament was communicated to the French Government, Bonaparte delivered to Lord Whitworth a paper (a copy of which I have seen) stating:

1. That the expedition preparing in the Dutch ports was, as all the world knew, destined for America; but, in consequence of the message, that it had been recalled and would not proceed.
2. That if the armament announced in the message be not satisfactorily explained, or, if it take place, France would march twenty thousand men into Holland.
3. That the forces debarked in the ports of Holland would be reinforced, and assembled on the coast of Flanders.
4. That the French army will be immediately put on a war establishment.
5. That camps would be formed on the coast between Dunkirk and Boulogne.
6. That an army would enter Switzerland.
7. That an army would march into Italy, and occupy Tarento. And,
8. That England must not expect, under the cover of an armament, to avoid the execution of the treaty of Amiens.

The greatest activity continues to prevail in the military and naval departments. It is understood that the squadrons in the West and East Indies and in the Mediterranean will not immediately require reinforcement, and that a respectable fleet will soon appear in the channel and on the coast of Ireland. The regular army on foot in Great Britain (exclusive of the forces in Ireland, Egypt, Malta, Gibraltar, and the colonies,) consists of twenty-seven thousand infantry, and twelve thousand cavalry; and will be reinforced immediately by thirty-seven thousand of the militia, which have been called out.

I do not hear of Mr. Monroe's arrival, though I learn from Mr. Livingston that he is daily expected in France. Mr. Merry is preparing to embark for the United States, and is pressed by his Government to be ready to leave England in the first week of April.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 18, 1803.

SIR:

I sent despatches a few days ago to Havre, in expectation of their going by a vessel which left that place for Philadelphia, but they arrived too late. Duplicates were sent to go by a vessel bound to New York. You will, therefore, I fear, have originals and duplicates by the same vessel. This compels me to send triplicates by this conveyance. You will see that, on the subject of New Orleans, the answer to my letter is very unsatisfactory. I, at first, intended to let the matter rest till Mr. Monroe arrived; but, on reflection, I dreaded the consequences of delay, if France should take possession, and continue the policy of Spain; and, as the moment was critical, and the time of Mr. Monroe's arrival uncertain, I sent in the enclosed note, and am doing all that I can to get a speedy and favorable answer.

On the subject of the debts, I have already met with a great deal of trouble in procuring the necessary information, and this is not to be wondered at. I hope to get through with it, strengthened as I am by the First Consul's engagement.

I cannot but wish, sir, that my fellow-citizens should not be led to believe, from Mr. Monroe's appointment, that I had been negligent of their interests, or too delicate on any of the great points entrusted to my care. I trust that a communication of my notes to some of them would show that I had gone as far as it was possible for me to go, and perhaps further than my instructions would justify.

We are here all in a bustle, not knowing whether we are to have war or peace. In England, they expect war certainly. Here they are very anxious to avoid it; and I, who have hitherto believed that a rupture would happen, begin, from some circumstances I heard last night, at consul Le Brun's, to believe the storm will pass over. But this is by no means certain; because it is possible that England will rise in her terms as France recedes. Peace will, in no event, last long. I frankly confess, that, though I believe a war would be extremely dangerous for Great Britain, yet I think her ruin inevitable if France continues ten years at peace.

MARCH 19.

Nothing decisive, as yet, on the subject of war or peace. The idea of peace seems to gain ground; and, in fact, war is so much dreaded by all the neighbors of France, that they will make every effort to maintain peace, lest they should be drawn into the vortex. I shall call this morning on the minister, in order to enforce upon him the subject of my note.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

[The following is the note referred to in Mr. Livingston's despatch of the 18th of March.]

Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to His Excellency the Minister for Exterior Relations of the French republic.

PARIS, March 16, 1803.

SIR:

I have received, with great sensibility, your note containing the First Consul's reply to that I had the honor to present to him on the subject of the American claims. The sentiments are such as would naturally be entertained by an enlightened statesman, who, after advancing his country to the highest pinnacle of military glory and national prospects, had determined to give permanency to that prosperity, by establishing it upon the firm basis of religion, good faith, justice, and national credit. On this subject, sir, I have no doubts; and I am satisfied that, when the claims are brought forward, they will, as you have the goodness to declare, be promptly and fully satisfied. But, sir, as this will form the subject of a future note, I shall beg leave to proceed to the consideration of a question in the highest degree interesting to the harmony of France and the United States, and which, I am sorry to say, is of a nature too pressing to admit of any delay.

The First Consul has done me the honor, through you, to inform me that he proposes to send a minister to the United States, to acquire such information as he may deem necessary previous to his taking any measures relative to the situation in which the acquisition of Louisiana will place France with respect to the United States. If, sir, the question related to the formation of a new treaty, I should find no objection to this measure. On the contrary, I should readily acquiesce in it, as that which would be best calculated to render the treaty mutually advantageous. But, sir, it is not a new treaty for which we now press, (though one mutually advantageous might be made,) but the recognition of an old one, by which the United States have acquired rights, that no change in the circumstances of the country obliges them to relinquish, and which they never will relinquish but with their political existence. By their treaty with Spain, their right to the navigation of the Mississippi is recognised, and a right of depôt granted, with a provision, on the part of the King of Spain, to revoke this right, if, within three years, he found it prejudicial to his interests; in which case, he is to assign another equivalent establishment. The King of Spain has never revoked that right; but, after having made the experiment of its effects upon his interests for three years, he has continued it. The United States have, by this continuance, acquired a permanent and irrevocable right to a depôt at New Orleans; nor can that right now be called in question, either by Spain or by any other nation to whom she may transfer her title. Even the assignment of another equivalent establishment cannot, at this day, be forced upon the United States, without their consent. The time allowed to Spain has passed, and she has preferred to have the depôt at New Orleans to placing it elsewhere; and I will venture to say, that, in so doing, she has acted wisely. For New Orleans derives its whole value from its being the market for American produce, and their principal port of entry; and, if this consideration was important to Spain, it is infinitely more so to France, the produce of whose agriculture and manufactures will then find a ready exchange for the raw materials of the United States. Under these circumstances, at the very moment that Spain is about to relinquish the possession of that country to France, she violates her treaty without any apparent interest, and leaves the country with a stain upon her character.

In what situation, sir, are we now placed? An armament is on the point of sailing for New Orleans; the port has been shut by the order of Spain; the French commandant will find it shut. Will he think himself authorized to open it? If not, it must remain shut till the envoy of France shall have arrived in America, and made the necessary inquiries, and transmitted the result of those inquiries to the First Consul. In the meanwhile, all the produce of five States is left to rot upon their hands. There is only one season in which the navigation of the Mississippi is practicable. This season must necessarily pass before the envoy of France can arrive and make his report. Is it supposable, sir, that the people of the United States will tranquilly wait the progress of negotiations when the ruin of themselves and their families will be attendant on the delay? Be assured, sir, that, even were it possible that the Government of the United States could be insensible of their sufferings, they would find it as easy to prevent the Mississippi from rolling its waters into the ocean, as to control the impulse of the people to do themselves justice. If, sir, in pursuance of the treaties that France has made with the Porte, she had established valuable comptoirs upon the Black Sea, and, subsequent to this, the Dardanelles were ceded to the Emperor, would France suffer him to shut up the passage, and ruin their merchants, till a new treaty had been negotiated for an object that she already possessed? Sir, I will venture to say, that, were a fleet to shut up the mouths of the Chesapeake, Delaware, and Hudson, it would create less sensation in the United States than the denial of the right of depôt at New Orleans has done. The people of the Western country were emigrants from the different States, in which they have left connexions deeply interested in their prosperity. This circumstance, combining with the just sense of national independence and national dignity, makes them extremely sensible to the injustice they have suffered. Nor is it without the utmost difficulty that they have been restrained from breaking out into acts of immediate hostility against Spain, by the prudent measures of Government, and by the hope that the mission of a minister, who will bring with him a conviction of their feelings on this subject, will procure them the most immediate and express recognition of their rights by France, in whose justice and good faith they hope to find a resource against the breach of faith by the officers of Spain. I cannot but flatter myself, sir, that the answer which the First Consul has been pleased to honor me with, has a reference only to such new treaties as it may be for the mutual interest of both countries early to negotiate. But that relative to the rights the United States already possess, in virtue of existing treaties with Spain, he is ready to afford me those explicit and formal assurances which are necessary to calm the emotions which have been so unwisely excited in the United States. I can never bring myself to believe, sir, that the First Consul will, by deferring for a moment the recognition of a right that admits of no discussion, break all those ties which bind the United States to France, obliterate the sense of past obligations, change every political relation that it has been, and still is, the earnest wish of the United States to preserve, and force them to connect their interests with those of a rival Power; and this, too, for an object of no real moment in itself. Louisiana is, and ever must be, from physical causes, a miserable country in the hands of a European Power. Nor can any principle of sound policy dictate to France (even if bound by no treaty) a change in the circumstances of New Orleans, that should exclude the citizens of the United States from that right of depôt to which alone it must be indebted for its prosperity. I feel a pleasure in declaring, sir, that the people and Government of the United States will receive the highest satisfaction from the assurances that the First Consul has empowered you to make to me of his attachment to them; and will reflect with pleasure on his having called to mind, that, amidst the changes that both nations have undergone, they have been mutually forward in tendering their alliance to each other. Nor will it be less flattering to the President to have acquired, as a magistrate and as a man, the esteem of a chief who has merited and obtained that of the world. But these occurrences add to my pain when I reflect on occurrences that may lay the foundation for future enmities; and I trust, sir, that they will serve as an apology for any thing that may appear harsh in this note. For, if ever there was a moment in which it becomes a minister to speak with freedom, it is when he feels that the dearest interests of his country are at stake, and has reason to hope that a knowledge of the truth may prevent the breach of relations between nations that esteem and respect each other, and the calamities that humanity may feel in such breach.

I pray your excellency to receive my thanks for the interesting manner in which you have made the communications of the First Consul, and my assurances of the highest consideration.

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

DEAR SIR: PARIS, March 24, 1803.

The question of war yet remains undetermined. My letters from Mr. King of the 18th leave me to believe, as well as my persuasion of the present system of politics in England, that war will come soon. Here there is an earnest and sincere desire to avoid it, as well in the Government as the people. I enclosed, in my last, a note to the minister. Some days after, I called on him. He told me that an answer was prepared, and that every thing should be arranged; and I have no doubt the answer contained all those assurances which I have been so long soliciting. Unfortunately, despatches arrived at that moment from Mr. Pichon, informing them that the appointment of Mr. Monroe had tranquillized every thing. Conceiving, then, that they might safely wait his arrival, they determined to see whether the storm would not blow over; in which case, they will treat to more advantage. They accordingly substituted, for the first note, which, as the minister told me, arranged every thing, the enclosed No. 1, which contains nothing. To this I put in the note No. 2, which I suppose will produce no effect if the war does not happen. Last night I received another note, No. 3, complaining of our supplying the blacks at St. Domingo: to this I returned the answer No. 4.

I have had a great deal of conversation with General Bernadotte, and communicated my two notes to him. I gave them to him to show to the gentleman I have mentioned, and endeavored to convince him that he was personally interested; that the specific declarations I require should be given before he goes out, which will be in a few days. Upon the whole, I think every thing is prepared for Mr. Monroe. I cannot but hope that something may be effected, though I fear Dupont de Nemours has given them, with the best intentions, ideas that we shall find it hard to eradicate, and impossible to yield to.

Florida is not yet ceded, nor, as I hope, very likely to be so. The armament in Holland, designed for Louisiana, is stopped for the present, in consequence of the state of things here.

I am, dear sir, with the highest consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

[Referred to in Mr. Livingston's despatch of March 24, 1803.]

No. 1.

M. Talleyrand to Mr. Livingston, dated

MONSIEUR: PARIS, 1 Germinal, an 11, (March 21, 1803.)

Je vois, avec plaisir, par les dernières lettres de la legation Française aux Etats Unis, que l'esprit de fermentation élévée dans ce pays au sujet de la Louisiane, a été ramenée par la sagesse de vôtre Gouvernement, et la juste confiance qu'il inspire, à cet état de calme qui est le seul propre aux discussions, et qui, dans les rapports de sentimens et d'intérêt existans entre les deux peuples, ne peut que les conduire à s'entendre sur de simples difficultés de circonstance, et à resserrer de plus en plus les liens de leur mutuelle union. Je dois vous avouer, monsieur, que, dans cet éclat qu'on a donné, il y a peu de temps aux affaires rélatives à la Louisiane; il a été difficile de reconnaître les anciens sentimens d'attachement et de confiance que la France a toujours ambitionné d'inspirer aux peuples des Etats Unis, et qui, depuis le premier moment de leur existence comme nation indépendante et souveraine, a toujours placé chez elle les rapports politiques de la France au-dessus de toute autre espèce de relations politiques.

Qu'a, donc, pu avoir de désagréable pour la nation Américaine, sous le rapport du commerce, et sous celui de la politique, le voisinage de la France? La république Française, a-t-elle jamais montré le désir d'arrêter la prospérité des Etats Unis, et porter atteinte à ce qu'elle a droit d'exercer d'influence, d'affaiblir ses moyens de sûreté, et de mettre obstacle aux progrès de son commerce? Vôtre Gouvernement, monsieur, doit être très persuadé que le Premier Consul porte à la nation Américaine la même affection dont la France a été de tout temps animée, et qu'il met au nombre des avantages que nous devons retirer de la possession de la Louisiane celui d'avoir à sa disposition de nouveaux moyens de convaincre le Gouvernement et le peuple des Etats Unis de ses bonnes et amicales dispositions à leur égard.

Je dois, Monsieur, pour le moment présent, me borner à vous faire cette déclaration, qui doit suffire aux inquiétudes que vous m'exprimez dans vos dernières lettres. Le sujet n'en est pas établi sur des informations assez étendues pour autoriser une explication détaillée. En m'annonçant, d'ailleurs, le départ prochain de M. Monroe, nommé ministre extraordinaire pour discuter cet objet, vous me donnez à conclure que vôtre Gouvernement désire que ce ministre soit attendu et écouté, parceque toute matière susceptible de contradiction soit complétement et définitivement discutée. En attendant, monsieur, le Premier Consul me charge d'assurer vôtre Gouvernement, que, bien qu'il ne pense pas que nôtre nouvelle position à la Louisiane puisse être un objet de solicitude, ni apporter le moindre dommage aux Etats Unis, il accueillera le ministre extraordinaire que Monsieur le Président lui envoye avec le plus grand plaisir, et qu'il espère que sa mission se terminera à la satisfaction des deux états.

Je profite, en même temps, monsieur, de cette occasion, pour vous renouveller l'assurance de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Talleyrand to Mr. Livingston.

SIR: PARIS, March 21, 1803.

I see, with pleasure, by the last letters from the French legation in the United States, that the excitement which had been raised on the subject of Louisiana has been allayed by the wisdom of your Government, and the just confidence which it inspires, to that state of tranquillity which is alone proper for discussion, and which, in the existing relations between the two nations, cannot fail to lead to suitable explanations on difficulties arising from contingent circumstances, and draw still closer the bands by which they are mutually united. I ought to acknowledge, sir, that, in the publicity recently given to the proceedings respecting Louisiana, it is difficult to recognise the ancient sentiments of attachment and confidence with which France has always been desirous to inspire the people of the United States, and by which, from the first moment of their existence as an independent and sovereign nation, she has been induced to consider her concerns with the United States as among the most important of her political relations.

On what account, then, either political or commercial, can the American nation view the proximity of France with so unfriendly an eye? Has the French republic ever evinced a desire to arrest the prosperity of the United States, assume an influence to which she had no right, weaken her means of safety or annoyance, or place an obstacle in the way of their expanding commerce? Your Government, sir, ought to be persuaded that the First Consul entertains for the American nation the same affection with which France has been at all times animated; and that, among the advantages which he expects to derive from the possession of Louisiana, he estimates the additional means which will be at his command, to convince the Government and people of the United States of his uniformly liberal and friendly sentiments.

I ought, sir, at the present time, to confine myself to this declaration, which alone should be sufficient to quiet the apprehensions expressed in your last letters. The subject itself does not rest on that accurate and extensive information which alone could authorize a more detailed explanation. In announcing to me, moreover, the speedy departure of Mr. Monroe, who has been appointed a minister extraordinary to discuss this matter, you give me reason to conclude that your Government desires that this minister should be received and heard; because every point susceptible of contradiction should be completely and definitively discussed. In the mean time, the First Consul charges me to assure your Government, that, although he does not think that his new position in relation to Louisiana ought to be the subject of just inquietude, or can occasion the least injury to the United States, he will yet receive with the greatest pleasure the minister extraordinary whom the President is about to send, and that he hopes his mission will terminate in a way to give mutual satisfaction to both nations.

At the same time, sir, I avail myself of this occasion to renew the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 2.

Robert R. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, 20 Ventose, an 11, (March 11, 1803.*)

SIR:

I acknowledge that I feel some mortification in finding that the note with which you honored me yesterday contains nothing more decisive upon the interesting subject that I have submitted to your consideration; and still more that you should think the sensibility that the inhabitants of the United States have manifested upon the change in the situation of Louisiana repugnant to the sentiments of friendship which the former conduct of France ought to inspire. I should be deficient, sir, in that frankness which has always made a basis of my communications with you, if I should conceal that the vicinity of a nation, whose political situation puts it out of her power to injure the United States, was less alarming than that of an active, powerful, and enterprising people, whom a variety of circumstances might lead, in the common course of events, to painful discussions: and you will, sir, readily admit that the profound secrecy that the Government of France has always observed in whatever related to Louisiana was ill calculated to allay those alarms. To this moment, the treaty to which they might have expected to be parties is concealed from them: and while explications are given to another Power upon the destination of the armaments in which the United States were most interested, not the most distant hint is afforded to the minister of the United States, nor is he informed, except through the medium of another court, of the present arrangement with respect to that armament.

Under these circumstances, sir, how painful soever it may be to manifest a distrust of a nation to whom they have formerly been indebted, and to whom, in return, they have manifested their gratitude, it would be to discover an ignorance of the change that was about to take place in their situation, and a blameable indifference to their most important interest, if they did not demand those securities to which they are entitled for the performance of engagements that France has assumed by putting herself in the place of Spain. I would earnestly hope, sir, that the information you have received from the legation of France in the United States, was more correct than that which induces me to fear that, seeing in your note a determination to postpone to the latest moment those arrangements which they will conceive need only to have been mentioned to have been taken, they will resort to those precautionary remedies which prudence justifies, and which their situation in the present state of Europe most peculiarly demands.

The United States, sir, have vested me with full powers to receive and make those arrangements; and, in the appointment of Mr. Monroe, jointly with me, as minister extraordinary to the First Consul, it was by no means their intention, considering the variety of accidents which may postpone or prevent his arrival, to defer receiving from the Government of France those explicit confirmations of the treaty of Madrid which must precede every arrangement which it might be thought proper hereafter to enter into.

A treaty, sir, is the work of time; and it can hardly be presumed that an ardent and intelligent people should wait the slow progress of negotiations for the attainment of objects that admit of no dispute, and see with indifference France strengthen herself in their vicinity, while she declines to acknowledge the validity of a treaty which, in their opinion, she has virtually adopted. It is not, sir, to negotiate for this acknowledgment that an additional minister is sent; for this, as I have before had the honor to inform your excellency, is not considered in the United States as susceptible of controversy: but it was with a view to such further arrangements as might be rendered necessary, in case (as was generally presumed) the Floridas should be added to the acquisitions of France. It was that he might be the bearer of the strong sentiments of the people upon the late measures of Spain, and show to France the inutility of these acquisitions, and the sentiments of distrust that they would naturally excite between her and the United States.

Having thus, sir, frankly stated the evils that may result to both countries from the indecision of France on a question that admits of no dispute, I can only lament the inefficacy of my representation, and hasten to submit your note to the inspection of my Government. From which, taken in connexion with the general politics of Europe and America, they will naturally draw their own conclusions. And I merely wish that the measures, which it is at their option to adopt, may be such as will not tend less to their future harmony with France than to their own security.

The President will receive great pleasure from your assurances of the attachment of the First Consul to the Government and people of the United States; and will felicitate himself upon having fixed upon one so perfectly acceptable to the First Consul in the person of his additional minister, as to ensure him the agreeable reception which you so politely promise him.

I avail myself, sir, of this occasion, to renew to you the assurances of my high consideration,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

His Excellency the Minister of Exterior Relations.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

London, April 2, 1803.

Sir:

Nothing further has occurred since the date of my last: no answer has yet been given to the note of the French ambassador, which declines all discussion respecting Malta. Lord Hawkesbury's answer will probably be delivered to-day; it will, without doubt, persist in the determination communicated in his first note, and may disclose new and additional reasons in its support. If, as is said to be the case, the First Consul has lately made an overture to Russia for a partition of the Turkish empire, the fact may be urged on this occasion, notwithstanding the refusal of Russia to listen to the proposal.

I still continue to believe the war unavoidable, in which England can have no expectation of a single ally. The system of Russia is pacific, with less attachment, however, to France than to England; Austria is not yet recovered from the blows by which she was driven from the contest; and Prussia will be inclined to adhere to her past policy. Although Denmark and Sweden have been much dissatisfied with England, France, contrary to her usual policy, has done nothing to secure their confidence; while England has been endeavoring to re-establish her ancient friendship with these States. For this purpose, she has given assurances that what is called the two Swedish convoys shall be restored or paid for: the first, which consisted of seventeen vessels, was condemned, and the envoy of Sweden has given in his claim of compensation, which amounts to sixty thousand pounds sterling; the claim for the second, consisting of twenty-one vessels, and which I think is not yet condemned, will be about ninety thousand pounds sterling. By cultivating the friendship of these Powers, England expects, with the good will of Russia, to keep the Baltic open against the efforts that France will again make to close it. Portugal will be compelled to exclude the English trade; and Spain, with all Italy, must obey the orders that shall be given them.

I have sought occasions both with ministers and other leading men since the discussions with France, to inculcate the disadvantage which England has heretofore brought upon herself by the system of warfare she has been accustomed to pursue, and which has been chiefly directed against the colonies of her enemy, which, after being acquired at the expense of much blood and treasure, in addition to the vexation of the commerce of neutral nations, have been commonly restored, enriched by English capital, at the conclusion of peace. Instead of a warfare liable to these objections, and which has moreover furnished an opportunity to France to appear as the friend and protector of neutral States, a system might be suggested that would not only avoid these disadvantages, but which would materially contribute to the future prosperity of Great Britain. No neutral commerce would be interrupted by it; on the contrary, it would serve to increase and extend it; and, when the object was once attained, no treaty of peace could restore things to their former state.

This conversation has been every where understood and well received; and it is my firm belief, if the war breaks out, that Great Britain will immediately attempt the emancipation and independence of South America.

In a late conversation with Mr. Addington, he observed to me, if the war happen, it would, perhaps, be one of their first steps to occupy New Orleans. I interrupted him by saying, I hoped the measure would be well weighed before it should be attempted; that, true it was, we could not see with indifference that country in the hands of France; but it was equally true, that it would be contrary to our views, and with much concern, that we should see it in the possession of England: we had no objection to Spain continuing to possess it; they were quiet neighbors, and we looked forward without impatience to events which, in the ordinary course of things, must, at no distant day, annex this country to the United States. Mr. Addington desired me to be assured that England would not accept the country, were all agreed to give it to her; that, were she to occupy it, it would not be to keep it, but to prevent another Power from obtaining it; and, in his opinion, this end would be best effected by its belonging to the United States. I expressed my acquiescence in the last part of his remark, but observed, that, if the country should be occupied by England it would be suspected to be in concert with the United States, and might involve us in misunderstandings with another Power, with which we desired to live in peace. He said, if you can obtain it, well, but if not, we ought to prevent its going into the hands of France; though, you may be assured, continued Mr. Addington, that nothing shall be done injurious to the interests of the United States. Here the conversation ended.

I have lately received your letter of January 29th; and as soon as Lord Hawkesbury shall have named a time to receive me, which I have requested him to do, I will explain to him, in conversation, the President's views relative to the Mississippi.

Considering the critical state of affairs, it is much to be wished that my successor may arrive before my departure. I shall delay taking my leave to the last moment; and should the posture of affairs, in my opinion, require it, I will risk the expense of detaining my vessel even beyond the time in which I have engaged to embark: in any event, I shall not leave London before the last week of the present month.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Robert R. Livingston to the Hon. James Madison, Secretary of State.

DEAR SIR: PARIS, April 11, 1803.

My notes will tell you how far I have officially pressed the Government on the subject of Louisiana. I have omitted no means, in conversation, of eradicating their prejudices in its favor; and I informed you that I had reason to think that I had been successful with all, unless it was the First Consul, to whom I addressed myself in the letter and essays that you have seen, and which were attentively read by him, as well as several informal notes to his brother. I had reason to think that he began to waver; but we had nothing to offer but money, and commercial advantages: of the latter, I did not think myself entitled to be liberal; and of the first, I found in them a certain degree of reluctance to treat, as derogatory to the dignity of the Government. The affair of New Orleans gave me two very important strings to touch: I endeavored to convince the Government that the United States would avail themselves of the breach of the treaty to possess themselves of New Orleans and the Floridas; that Britain would never suffer Spain to grant the Floridas to France, even were she so disposed, but would immediately seize upon them as soon as the transfer was made; that, without the Floridas, Louisiana would be indefensible, as it possesses not one port even for frigates; and I showed the effect of suffering that important country to fall into the hands of the British, both as it affected our country, and the naval force of all Europe. These reasons, with the probability of war, have had, I trust, the desired effect. M. Talleyrand asked me this day, when pressing the subject, whether we wished to have the whole of Louisiana. I told him no; that our wishes extended only to New Orleans and the Floridas; that the policy of France, however, should dictate (as I had shown in an official note) to give us the country abov the river Arkansas, in order to place a barrier between them and Canada. He said, that if they gave New Orleans the rest would be of little value; and that he would wish to know "what we would give for the whole." I told him it was a subject I had not thought of; but that I supposed we should not object to twenty millions, provided our citizens were paid. He told me that this was too low an offer; and that he would be glad if I would reflect upon it and tell him to-morrow. I told him that, as Mr. Monroe would be in town in two days, I would delay my further offer until I had the pleasure of introducing him. He added, that he did not speak from authority, but that the idea had struck him. I have reason, however, to think that this resolution was taken in council on Saturday. On Friday, I received Mr. Ross's motion: I immediately sent it to M. Talleyrand, with an informal note expressive of my fears that it would be carried into effect: and requesting that General Bernadotte might not go till something effectual was done. I also translated it, and gave it to General Bernadotte, and pressed upon him the necessity of asking express instructions, in case he should find the island in possession of the Americans. He went immediately to Joseph Bonaparte. These, I believe, were exciting causes to the train we are now in, and which I flatter myself we shall be able, on the arrival of Mr. Monroe, to pursue to effect. I think, from every appearance, that war is very near at hand; and, under these circumstances, I have endeavored to impress the Government that not a moment should be lost, lest Britain should anticipate us. I have used every exertion with the Spanish ambassador and Lord Whitworth, to prevent the transfer of the Floridas; and wrote to Mr. Graham, in Mr. Pinckney's absence, to give every attention to that object, and to avail himself of the coolness which subsisted between the French ambassador and the Prince of Peace. This has retarded the negotiation; and, unless they get Florida, I have convinced them Louisiana is worth little. I would rather have confined our views to smaller objects; and I think that, if we succeed, it would be good policy to exchange the west bank of the Mississippi with Spain for the Floridas, reserving New Orleans. Perhaps, however, I am too sanguine in my expectations: we will not, therefore, dispose of the skin till we have killed the bear.

I have written to Mr. King, pressing him to stay until a successor is appointed. The moment is so critical that we cannot justify being without a minister in England, and he is a very useful one.

I believe you may calculate that Britain will not give up Malta, and that France will not leave it in her hands by consent; and, of course, hostilities must commence, or Britain be kept, at immense expense, in her present warlike attitude, while France expends nothing. This she cannot submit to, and must, therefore, strike the first stroke, which this country wishes, in order to render the war more popular here. France has marched troops into Holland, and those of Victor are embarking, but I think will not sail, or, if they do, will be intercepted by England, who will probably think they are designed for the islands, which is very probable.

Mr. Monroe arrived on the 1st at Havre. I expect him here in two days at furthest from this date. His passage was twenty-nine days.

I shall see the minister again to-morrow, in order to sound him more fully before we offer any thing formal on Mr. Monroe's arrival.

I wished and proposed that General Bernadotte should wait until something was done, having formally notified the minister that Mr. Monroe had arrived. But I could not prevail upon him to make any alteration. He said that Mr. Bernadotte, having received his despatches, was to be considered by him as gone.

You will receive this by Mr. Petrie, his secretary, who waits here until to-morrow.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration,

Your most obedient humble servant,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

P. S. 12th. Orders are gone this day to stop the sailing of vessels from the French ports: war is inevitable: my conjecture as to their determination to sell is well founded; Mr. Monroe is just arrived here.

HON. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States.

DEAR SIR: PARIS, April 13, 1803, midnight.

I have just come from the Minister of the Treasury. Our conversation was so important, that I think it necessary to write it, while the impressions are strong upon my mind; and the rather, as I fear that I shall not have the time to copy and send this letter, if I defer it till morning.

By my letter of yesterday, you learned that the minister had asked me whether I would agree to purchase Louisiana, &c.; on the 12th, I called upon him to press this matter further. He then thought proper to declare that his proposition was only personal, but still requested me to make an offer; and, upon my declining to do so, as I expected Mr. Monroe the next day, he shrugged up his shoulders, and changed the conversation. Not willing, however, to lose si ht of it, I told him I had been long endeavoring to bring him to some point; but, unfortunately, without effect: that I wished merely to have the negotiation opened by any proposition on his part; and, with that view, had written him a note which contained that request, grounded upon my apprehension of the consequence of sending out General Bernadotte without enabling him to say a treaty was begun. He told me he would answer my note, but that he must do it evasively, because Louisiana was not theirs. I smiled at this assertion, and told him that I had seen the treaty recognising it; that I knew the Consul had appointed officers to govern the country; and that he had himself told me that General Victor was to take possession; that, in a note written by the express order of the First Consul, he had told me that General Bernadotte was to treat relative to it in the United States, &c. He still persisted that they had it in contemplation to obtain it, but had it not. I told him that I was very well pleased to understand this from him, because, if so, we should not commit ourselves with them in taking it from Spain, to whom, by his account, it still belonged; and that, as we had just cause of complaint against her, if Mr. Monroe concurred in opinion with me, we should negotiate no further on the subject, but advise our Government to take possession. He seemed alarmed at the boldness of the measure, and told me he would answer my note, but that it would be evasively. I told him I should receive with pleasure any communication from him, but that we were not disposed to trifle; that the times were critical, and though I did not know what instructions Mr. Monroe might bring, I was perfectly satisfied that they would require a precise and prompt notice; that I was very fearful, from the little progress I had made, that my Government would consider me as a very indolent negotiator. He laughed, and told me that he would give me a certificate that I was the most importunate he had yet met with.

There was something so extraordinary in all this, that I did not detail it to you till I found some clue to the labyrinth, which I have done, as you will find before I finish this letter; and the rather, as I was almost certain that I could rely upon the intelligence I had received of the resolution to dispose of this country.

This day Mr. Monroe passed with we in examining my papers; and while he and several other gentlemen were at dinner with me, I observed the Minister of the Treasury walking in my garden. I sent out Colonel Livingston to him; he told him he would return when we had dined. While we were taking coffee he came in; and, after being some time in the room, we strolled into the next room, when he told me he heard that I had been at his house two days before, when he was at St. Cloud; that he thought I might have something particular to say to him, and had taken the first opportunity to call on me. I saw that this was meant as an opening to one of those free conversations which I had frequently had with him. I accordingly began on the subject of the debt, and related to him the extraordinary conduct of the minister, &c. He told me that this led to something important, that had been cursorily mentioned to him at St. Cloud; but, as my house was full of company, he thought I had better call upon him any time before eleven that night. He went away, and, a little after, when Mr. Monroe took leave, I followed him. He told me that he wished me to repeat what I had said relative to M. Talleyrand's requesting a proposition from me as to the purchase of Louisiana. I did so; and concluded with the extreme absurdity of his evasions of that day, and stated the consequence of any delay on this subject, as it would enable Britain to take possession, who would readily relinquish it to us. He said that this proceeded upon a supposition of her making so successful a war as to be enabled to retain her conquests. I told him that it was probable that the same idea might suggest itself to the United States; in which case, it would be their interest to contribute to render her successful; and I asked whether it was prudent to throw us into her scale? This led to long discussions of no moment to repeat. We returned to the point: he said, that what I had told him led him to think that what the Consul had said to him on Sunday, at St. Cloud, (the day on which, as I told you, the determination had been taken to sell,) had more of earnest than he thought at the time; that the Consul had asked him what news from England? As he knew he read the papers attentively, he told him that he had seen in the London papers the proposition for raising fifty thousand men to take New Orleans. The Consul said he had seen it too, and had also seen that something was said about two millions of dollars being disposed among the people about him, to bribe them, &c.; and then left him. That afterwards, when walking in the garden, the Consul came again to him, and spoke to him about the troubles that were excited in America, and inquired how far I was satisfied with his last note. Here some civil things were introduced, for which I presume I am more indebted to the minister's politeness than to his veracity; so let them sleep. He (Marbois) then took occasion to mention his sorrow that any cause of difference should exist between our countries. The Consul told him, in reply, "Well, you have the charge of the Treasury; let them give you one hundred millions of Francs, and pay their own claims, and take the whole country." Seeing, by my looks, that I was surprised at so extravagant a demand, he added that he considered the demand as exorbitant, and had told the First Consul that the thing was impossible; that we had not the means of raising that. The Consul told him we might borrow it. I now plainly saw the whole business: first, the Consul was disposed to sell; next, he distrusted Talleyrand, on account of the business of the supposed intention to bribe, and meant to put the negotiation into the hands of Marbois, whose character for integrity is established. I told him that the United States were anxious to preserve peace with France; that, for that reason, they wished to remove them to the west side of the Mississippi; that we would be perfectly satisfied with New Orleans and the Floridas, and had no disposition to extend across the river; that, of course, we would not give any great sum for the purchase; that he was right in his idea of the extreme exorbitancy of the demand, which would not fall short of one hundred and twenty-five millions; that, however, we would be ready to purchase, provided the sum was reduced to reasonable limits. He then pressed me to name the sum. I told him that this was not worth while, because, as he only treated the inquiry as a matter of curiosity, any declarations of mine would have no effect. If a negotiation was to be opened, we should (Mr. Monroe and myself) make the offer after mature reflection. This compelled him to declare, that, though he was not authorized expressly to make the inquiry from me, yet, that, if I could mention any sum that came near the mark, that could be accepted, he would communicate it to the First Consul. I told him that we had no sort of authority to go to a sum that bore any proportion to what he mentioned; but that, as he himself considered the demand as too high, he would oblige me by telling me what he thought would be reasonable. He replied that, if we would name sixty millions, and take upon us the American claims, to the amount of twenty more, he would try how far this would be accepted. I told him that it was vain to ask any thing that was so greatly beyond our means; that true policy would dictate to the First Consul not to press such a demand; that he must know that it would render the present Government unpopular, and have a tendency, at the next election, to throw the power into the hands of men who were most hostile to a connexion with France; and that this would probably happen in the midst of a war. I asked him whether the few millions acquired at this expense would not be too dearly bought? He frankly confessed that he was of my sentiments; but that he feared the Consul would not relax. I asked him to press this argument upon him, together with the danger of seeing the country pass into the hands of Britain. I told him that he had seen the ardor of the Americans to take it by force, and the difficulty with which they were restrained by the prudence of the President; that he must easily see how much the hands of the war party would be strengthened, when they learned that France was upon the eve of a rupture with England. He admitted the weight of all this: "But," says he, "you know the temper of a youthful conqueror; every thing he does is rapid as lightning; we have only to speak to him as an opportunity presents itself, perhaps in a crowd, when he bears no contradiction. When I am alone with him, I can speak more freely, and he attends; but this opportunity seldom happens, and is always accidental. Try, then, if you cannot come up to my mark. Consider the extent of the country, the exclusive navigation of the river, and the importance of having no neighbors to dispute you, no war to dread." I told him that I considered all these as important considerations, but there was a point beyond which we could not go, and that fell far short of the sum he mentioned.

I asked him, in case of a purchase, whether they would stipulate that France would never possess the Floridas, and that she would aid us to procure them, and relinquish all right that she might have to them. He told me that she would go thus far. I added, that I would now say nothing more on the subject, but that I would converse with Mr. Monroe; and that I was sure to find him disposed to do every thing that was reasonable, or could be expected, to remove every cause of difference between the two countries. That, however, if any negotiation should go on, I would wish that the First Consul would depute somebody to treat with us, who had more leisure than the Minister for Foreign Affairs. I said this to see whether my conjectures relative to him were well founded. He told me that as the First Consul knew our personal friendship, he having several times had occasion to speak of me and my family, and the principles that we held, he believed that there would be no difficulty, when this negotiation was somewhat advanced, to have the management of it put into his hands. He earnestly pressed me to make some proposition that was so near the First Consul's as to admit his mentioning it to him. I told him that I would consult Mr. Monroe, but that neither he nor I could accede to his ideas on the subject. Thus, sir, you see a negotiation is fairly opened, and upon grounds which I confess I prefer to all other commercial privileges; and always to some a simple money transaction is infinitely preferable. As to the quantum, I have yet made up no opinion. The field opened to us is infinitely larger than our instructions contemplated; the revenue increasing, and the land more than adequate to sink the capital, should we even go the sum proposed by Marbois; nay, I persuade myself, that the whole sum may be raised by the sale of the territory west of the Mississippi, with the right of sovereignty, to some Power in Europe, whose vicinity we should not fear. I speak now without reflection, and without having seen Mr. Monroe, as it was midnight when I left the Treasury Office, and is now near three o'clock. It is so very important that you should be apprised that a negotiation is actually opened, even before Mr. Monroe has been presented, in order to calm the tumult which the news of war will renew, that I have lost no time in communicating it. We shall do all we can to cheapen the purchase; but my present sentiment is that we shall buy. Mr. Monroe will be presented to the minister to-morrow, when we shall press for as early an audience as possible from the First Consul. I think it will be necessary to put in some proposition to-morrow: the Consul goes in a few days to Brussels, and every moment is precious.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, April 17, 1803.

SIR:

Mr. Petrie having been detained, I have an opportunity to give you a relation of what has passed since my letter of the 13th. On the 14th I called upon Mr. Monroe, to present him to the minister, who had, upon my application, fixed three o'clock that day for his reception. Before we went we examined our commission, in which there are two circumstances with which I am not quite satisfied; one, indeed, of little moment, because it only respects me personally; and the other very important, as it may, if things should take a turn favorable to France, defeat all we may do, even at the moment of signing. The first is, that I have not the same rank in the commission with Mr. Monroe. It is important that I should be thought to stand as well with our Government as any other person. If so, my age, and the stations I have held, entitled me not to have had any person placed above me in the line I have filled. The second is, that the commission contains power only to treat for lands on the east side of the Mississippi. You will recollect that I have been long preparing this Government to yield us the country above the Arkansas, because I saw the effect of their holding and giving encouragement to settle it would draw off a prodigious population from our side of the river, and from such a connexion between the inhabitants of the Western country and these new settlers, who would be their relations and friends, as would be extremely dangerous. In my private negotiations with Joseph Bonaparte, I had urged every reason that I could think of to induce them to give us the country: and those reasons have had their effect. I am, therefore, surprised that our commission should have entirely lost sight of that object. Mr. Monroe, however, agrees with me that we will proceed as well as we can; and, as we left no copy of the commission, it may possibly escape unnoticed, though it will operate to our prejudice if our negotiation should not please at home. It is absolutely necessary, my dear sir, to repose confidence in ministers who are placed so far from the seat of Government. You will recollect that I have been absolutely without powers to the present moment; and that though I have hazarded many things upon a presumption that I should have them, none have been received till now, and now they are unfortunately too limited.

But to proceed. On waiting upon the minister, we found M. Marbois there, who told me that he had come to communicate to the minister what had passed between us, and that he greatly regretted the not being able to bring us to such an offer as he might mention to the First Consul. I told him that it was unnecessary to repeat what would compel us to limit our offers to a much more moderate sum, as I had already detailed them at large; and he knew they exceeded our means. We were very graciously received by the minister, whom I pressed to obtain as early a day as possible for the reception of Mr. Monroe, as time pressed, and we were anxious to conclude our business, for reasons arising out of the present disturbed state of America. He told me he would speak to the First Consul that night on the subject; and that he hoped some person would be appointed to treat with us, even before Mr. Monroe was presented. After a little general conversation, he took leave, in expectation that Mr. Monroe would be presented this day, (Sunday,) being a day of reception for the civil officers of the Government. The next day, Mr. Monroe and myself, after spending some time in consultation, determined to offer fifty millions, including our debts: we presumed it would be best only to mention forty in the first instance. This I accordingly did, in a conference I had on the 15th with M. Marbois. He expressed great sorrow that we could not go beyond that sum, because he was sure that it would not be accepted, and that perhaps the whole business would be defeated, which he the more feared, as he had just received a note from the minister, indicative of the Consul's not being quite pleased that he had so greatly lowered his original proposition. He said that he saw our situation, and he knew that there was a point beyond which we could not go with safety to ourselves or the President; but he wished us to advance to that point. He said that he would, if I wished, go that very day to St. Cloud, and let me know the result. I reminded him of the Consul's promise to pay the debt. I placed in the strongest light his personal obligation on this subject: and desired him to urge it as an additional reason to conclude an agreement which would facilitate the means of doing it. The next morning, which was yesterday, I again called to see him. He told me that he had been to St. Cloud; that the Consul received his proposition very coldly; and that I might consider the business as no longer in his hands, since he had given him no further powers; that he had urged the Consul's promise relative to the debt, which he admitted; but said, at the same time, he did not think it had exceeded three millions, though my letter expressly mentioned twenty. He expressed great sorrow upon the occasion; and advised me to press M. Talleyrand to present Mr. Monroe the next day, (that is, this day;) that he hoped that, if the Consul saw me, as he had a very particular esteem for me, he would renew the subject with me himself.

I went to Mr. Monroe, and carried him to the minister, who had not returned from St. Cloud; and afterwards went again, but could not see him. I dined with the Second Consul yesterday; and in the evening M. Marbois came in. I took him aside, and asked him if any thing further had passed: he said not; but, that as he was to go to St. Cloud the next day, it was possible that the Consul might touch upon the subject again; and that, if he did not, I might consider the plan as relinquished: and that, if I had any further proposition to make, it would be well to state it. I then told him, that on further conversation with Mr. Monroe, we had resolved to go to the greatest possible length, and that we would give fifty millions. He said he had very little hopes that any thing short of his propositions would succeed; but that he would make the best use of the arguments I had furnished him with, if an opportunity was offered; and if nothing was done the next day, I might conclude that the Consul had changed his sentiments: that, having given the kingdom of Etruria, whose revenues were twenty-five millions, in exchange for this country, it was natural that the First Consul should estimate it beyond its real value.

Thus we stand at present, resolving to rest a few days upon our oars; in the mean time, I shall press the payment of the debt, as an excitement to forward the other business.

No notice has been given of Mr. Monroe's reception; and I am not without my fears that he will not be received before the usual diplomatic day, which will not be till the 15th, and, before that time, the Consul will probably go upon his tour to Flanders. Mr. Monroe having been compelled, when here, to be well with the party then uppermost, and who are now detested by the present ruler, it will be some time before they know how to estimate his worth; and Talleyrand has, I find, imbibed personal prejudice against him, that will induce him to throw every possible obstruction in his way, that he can do consistently with their own views.

I shall attend to the other subjects of your letter at the first moment of leisure. At present, I think it would be improper to touch upon less important matter, which may either divert the attention or irritate.

I am sorry you have not thought it proper to attend to my request as to the Italian Republic. It has, I believe, been acknowledged by all the Powers of Europe except Great Britain. Compliments that cost nothing should, I think, always be paid, where you have points to carry.

Be so obliging, in answering my letters, as to notice any project I throw out; because it is not enough to have them passed over in silence, as that leaves me in doubt; whereas, the approbation or rejection of them precisely would inform me of your sentiments, and enable me to act accordingly.

I am, dear sir, with much esteem and respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 18, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

A month having elapsed since the departure of Mr. Monroe, it may be presumed that, by the time this reaches you, communications will have passed with the French Government, sufficiently explaining its views towards the United States, and preparing the way for the ulterior instructions which the President thinks proper should now be given.

In case a convention and arrangement with France should have resulted from the negotiations with which you are charged; or, in case such should not have been the result—but no doubt should be left that the French Government means to respect duly our rights, and to cultivate sincerely peace and friendship with the United States—it will be expedient for you to make such communications to the British Government, as will assure it that nothing has been done inconsistent with our good faith, and as will prevent a diminution of the good understanding which subsists between the two countries.

If the French Government, instead of friendly arrangements or views, should be found to meditate hostilities, or to have formed projects which will constrain the United States to resort to hostilities, such communications are then to be held with the British Government, as will sound its dispositions, and invite its concurrence in the war. Your own prudence will suggest that the communications be so made, as, on one hand, not to precipitate France into hostile operations, and, on the other, not to lead Great Britain from the supposition that war depends on the choice of the United States, and that their choice of war will depend on her participation in it. If war is to be the result, it is manifestly desirable that it be delayed until the certainty of this result can be known, and the legislative and other provisions can be made here; and also of great importance, that the certainty should not be known to Great Britain, who might take advantage of the posture of things to press on the United States disagreeable conditions of her entering into the war.

It will probably be most convenient, in exchanging ideas with the British Government, to make use of its public minister at Paris, as less likely to alarm and stimulate the French Government, and to raise the pretensions of the British Government, than the repairing of either of you to London, which might be viewed by both as a signal of rupture. The latter course, however, may possibly be rendered most eligible by the pressure of the crisis.

Notwithstanding the just repugnance of this country to a coalition of any sort with the belligerent politics of Europe, the advantages to be derived from the co-operation of Great Britain in a war of the United States, at this period, against France and her allies, are too obvious and too important to be renounced. And notwithstanding the apparent disinclination of the British councils to a renewal of hostilities with France, it will probably yield to the various motives which will be felt to have the United States in the scale of Britain against France, and particularly for the immediate purpose of defeating a project of the latter, which has evidently created much solicitude in the British Government.

The price which she may attach to her co-operation cannot be foreseen, and, therefore, cannot be the subject of full and precise instructions. It may be expected that she will insist at least on a stipulation that neither of the parties shall make peace or truce without the consent of the other; and as such an article cannot be deemed unreasonable, and will secure us against the possibility of her being detached, in the course of the war, by seducing overtures from France, it will not be proper to raise difficulties on that account. It may be useful, however, to draw from her a definition, as far as the case will admit, of the objects contemplated by her, that whenever, with ours, they may be attainable by peace, she may be duly pressed to listen to it. Such an explanation will be the more reasonable, as the objects of the United States will be so fair and so well known.

It is equally probable, that a stipulation of commercial advantages in the Mississippi, beyond those secured by existing treaties, will be required. On this point, it may be answered at once, that Great Britain shall enjoy a free trade with all the ports to be acquired by the United States, on the terms allowed to the most favored nations in the ports, generally, of the United States. If made an essential condition, you may admit, that in the ports to be acquired within the Mississippi, the trade of her subjects shall be on the same footing for a term of about ten years with that of our own citizens. But the United States are not to be bound to the exclusion of the trade of any particular nations or nation.

Should a mutual guaranty of the existing possessions, or of the conquests to be made by the parties, be proposed, it must be explicitly rejected, as of no value to the United States, and as entangling them in the frequent wars of that nation with other Powers, and very possibly in disputes with that nation itself.

The anxiety which Great Britain has shown to extend her domain to the Mississippi, the uncertain extent of her claims from north to south, beyond the western limits of the United States, and the attention she has paid to the northwest coast of America, make it probable that she will connect with a war on this occasion, a pretension to the acquisition of the country on the west side of the Mississippi, understood to be ceded by Spain to France, or at least of that portion of it lying between that river and the Missouri. The evils involved in such an extension of her possessions in our neighborhood, and in such a hold on the Mississippi, are obvious. The acquisition is the more objectionable, as it would be extremely displeasing to our Western citizens, and as its evident bearing on South America might be expected to arouse all the jealousies of France and Spain, and to prolong the war, on which the event would depend. Should this pretension, therefore, be pressed, it must be resisted as altogether repugnant to the sentiments and to the sound policy of the United States. But it may be agreed, in alleviation of any disappointment of Great Britain, that France shall not be allowed to retain or acquire any part of the territory, from which she herself would be precluded.

The moment the prospect of war shall require the precaution, you will not omit to give confidential notice to our public ministers and consuls, and to our naval commanders in the Mediterranean, that our commerce and public ships may be as little exposed to the danger as possible. It may, under certain circumstances, be proper to notify the danger immediately to the collectors in the principal ports of the United States.

A separate letter to you is enclosed, authorizing you to enter into such communications and conferences with British ministers as may possibly be required by the conduct of France. The letter is made a separate one, that it may be used with the effect, but without the formality, of a commission. It is hoped that sound calculations of interest, as well as a sense of right, in the French Government, will prevent the necessity of using the authority expressed in this letter. In a contrary state of things, the President relies on your own information, to be gained on the spot, and on your best discretion, to open with advantage the communications with the British Government, and to proportion the degree of an understanding with it to the indications of an approaching war with France. Of these indications, also, you will be best able to judge. It will only be observed to you, that, if France should avow or evince a determination to deny to the United States the free navigation of the Mississippi, your consultations with Great Britain may be held on the ground that war is inevitable. Should the navigation not be disputed, and the deposite alone be denied, it will be prudent to adapt your consultations to the possibility that Congress may distinguish between the two cases, and make a question how far the latter right may call for an instant resort to arms, or how far a procrastination of that remedy may be suggested and justified by the prospect of a more favorable conjuncture.

These instructions have thus far supposed that Great Britain and France are at peace, and that neither of them intend at present to interrupt it. Should war have actually commenced, or its approach be certain, France will, no doubt, be the more apt to concur in friendly accommodations with us, and Great Britain the more desirous of engaging us on her side. You will, of course, avail yourselves of this posture of things, for avoiding the necessity of recurring to Great Britain, or, if the necessity cannot be avoided, for fashioning her disposition to arrangements which may be the least inconvenient to the United States. Whatever connexion, indeed, may be eventually formed with Great Britain in reference to war, the policy of the United States requires that it be as little entangling as the nature of the case will permit.

Our latest authentic information from New Orleans is of the 25th February. At that date the port had been opened for provisions carried down the Mississippi, subject to a duty of six per cent. if consumed in the province, and an additional duty, if exported; with a restriction, in the latter case, to Spanish bottoms, and to the external ports permitted by Spain to her colonial trade. A second letter, written by the Spanish minister here, has been received by the Intendant, but without effect. On the 10th of March his interposition was repeated in a form which you will find, by his translated communication to the Department of State, in one of the enclosed papers, was meant to be absolutely effectual. You will find in the same paper the translation of a letter from the French chargé d'affaires here to the Governor of Louisiana, written with a co-operating view. A provisional letter to any French agents who might have arrived, had been previously written by him, in consequence of a note from this Department, founded on a document published at New Orleans, showing that orders had been given by the Spanish Government for the surrender of the province to France; and he has of late addressed a third letter on the subject to the Prefect said to have arrived at New Orleans. It does not appear, however, from any accounts received, that Louisiana has yet changed hands.

What the result of the several measures taken for restoring the right of deposite will be, remains to be seen. A representation on the subject was made by Mr. Graham, in the absence of Mr. Pinckney, to the Spanish Government, on the 3d of February. No answer had been received on the 8th; but Mr. Graham was led by circumstances to make no particular inference from the delay. The silence of the French Government to Mr. Livingston's representation, as stated in his letter of the —— day of —— is a very unfavorable indication. It might have been expected, from the assurances given, of an intention to observe the treaty between Spain and the United States, and to cultivate the friendship of the latter, that the occasion would have been seized for evincing the sincerity of the French Government; and it may still be expected that no interposition that may be required by the actual state of things will be withheld, if peace and friendship with the United States be really the objects of that Government. Of this, the mission of Mr. Monroe, and the steps taken by you on his arrival, will doubtless have impressed the proper convictions.

During this suspense of the rightful commerce of our Western citizens, their conduct has been, and continues to be, highly exemplary. With the just sensibility produced by the wrongs done them, they have united a patient confidence in the measures and views of their Government. The justice of this observation will be confirmed to you by manifestations contained in the Western newspapers, herewith enclosed; and, if duly appreciated, will not lessen the force of prudential as well as of other motives, for correcting past, and avoiding future trespasses on American rights.

April 20th.—The letter from the Marquis d'Yrujo, of which you will find a translated copy in the enclosed newspaper of this date, was yesterday received. The letters to which it refers, as containing orders for the re-establishment of our deposite at New Orleans, were immediately forwarded. They will arrive in time, we hope, to mitigate considerably the losses from the misconduct of the Spanish Intendant; and they are the more acceptable, as they are an evidence of the respect, in the Government of Spain, for our rights and our friendship.

From the allusion in this communication from the Spanish minister to a future agreement between the two Governments, on the subject of an equivalent deposite, it would seem that the Spanish Government regards the cession to France as either no longer in force, or not soon to be carried into execution. However this may be, it will not be allowed, any more than the result of our remonstrance to Spain on the violation of our rights, to slacken the negotiations for the greater security and the enlargement of these rights. Whether the French or the Spaniards, or both, are to be our neighbors, the considerations which led to the measures, taken with respect to these important objects, still require that they should be pursued into all the success that may be attainable.

With sentiments of great respect, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

R. R. Livingston and James Monroe, Esqrs.

The Secretary of State to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

Department of State, April 18, 1803.

Gentlemen:

The reasonable and friendly views with which you have been instructed by the President to enter into negotiations with the French Government, justify him in expecting from them an issue favorable to the tranquillity and to the useful relations between the two countries. It is not forgotten, however, that these views, instead of being reciprocal, may find, on the part of France, a temper adverse to harmony, and schemes of ambition, requiring, on the part of the United States, as well as of others, the arrangements suggested by a provident regard to events. Among these arrangements, the President conceives that a common interest may recommend a candid understanding, and a closer connexion with Great Britain; and he presumes that the occasion may present itself to the British Government in the same light. He, accordingly, authorizes you, or either of you, in case the prospect of your discussion with the French Government should make it expedient, to open a confidential communication with ministers of the British Government, and to confer freely and fully on the precautions and provisions best adapted to the crisis, and in which that Government may be disposed to concur; transmitting to your own, without delay, the result of these consultations.

With sentiments of high respect, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

R. R. Livingston and James Monroe, Esqrs.

Extract:—Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

April 19, 1803.

In Lord Whitworth's last despatch, he says: "Two days ago General Bernadotte left Paris, on his mission to the United States, with assurances of the First Consul's sincere desire to cultivate the friendship of that country; and yesterday Mr. Monroe, the American envoy, arrived here." The United States, says his lordship, are likely to reap the first fruits of our disagreement with France; the settlement of their affairs being already so nearly finished that little remains to be done by Mr. Monroe, who is said to be destined to relieve Mr. King at London.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in London to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, April 28, 1803.

"In a conference with Lord Hawkesbury on the 6th instant, I explained to him the object of the extraordinary mission of Mr. Monroe, pursuant to the tenor of your letter of the 29th of January, and I have the pleasure to inform you that his lordship received the communication in good part, suggested no doubt of our right to pursue separately and alone the objects we aim at, and appeared to be satisfied with the President's views on this important subject."

[TRANSLATION.]

Extract of a letter from Mr. Cevallos, Minister of State of his Catholic Majesty, to Charles Pinckney, Esq.

ARANJUEZ, May 4, 1803.

The system adopted by His Majesty not to dispossess himself of any portion of his States, deprives him of the pleasure of assenting to the cessions which the United States wish to obtain by purchase, as I have intimated for their information to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo.

By the retrocession made to France of Louisiana, this Power regains the said province with the limits it had, and saving the rights acquired by other Powers. The United States can address themselves to the French Government to negotiate the acquisition of territories which may suit their interest.

Mr. King to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe, ministers of the United States at Paris.

LONDON, May 7, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

War seems to be quite inevitable, though it is possible that the offer of France to leave Malta in the hands of Russia, Austria, or Prussia, may create some hesitation, and, had it been early made would perhaps have prevented the present crisis. In case of war, it is the purpose of this Government to send an expedition to occupy New Orleans. If it be ceded to us, would it not be expedient openly or confidentially to communicate the fact here? I have reason to be satisfied that it would prevent the projected expedition. I shall remain here till the fourteenth, in hopes that I may receive your answer, which might be expedited by a courier, should the communication be deemed prudent.

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to Mr. King.

PARIS, May —, 1803.

SIR:

We have the honor to inform you that a treaty (the 30th April) has been signed between the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Government, and ourselves, by which the United States have obtained the full right to and sovereignty in and over New Orleans, and the whole of Louisiana, as Spain possessed the same. If, sir, you should find it necessary to make any communication to the British Government on this subject, you may likewise inform them that care has been taken so to frame the treaty as not to infringe upon any of the rights that Great Britain might claim in the navigation of the Mississippi.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 12, 1803.

SIR:

You have seen in my late letter the direct commencement of the negotiation previous to the arrival of Mr. Monroe, and, in our joint letter, its consummation. It will be matter of curiosity, at least to you, to be more intimately acquainted with the exciting causes which have been long operating, and which I have hinted at in my letters to the President, but which, from their extreme delicacy, I have not thought it proper to detail. As this goes with the treaty by a special and safe messenger, I will send you the papers I referred to in my letters to the President.

On my arrival, I found the credit and character of our nation very low. They were considered as interested speculators, whose god was money. The features of our statesmen, drawn from the caricatures in our newspapers, were viewed as real likenesses; and the democracy of America was believed to be the mad Jacobinism of France. The President was considered as among the most mad, because the head of the party; and it was not doubted that his minister to France partook of his phrensy. Some of my former friends were sent artfully to sound me on the subject of the existing Government here. As I had seen and heard enough to be satisfied that nothing short of the change that had taken place could have lessened the calamities of France, I answered them sincerely in such manner as to satisfy them that I meant to have no intrigues with its enemies; I carefully avoided all connexion with them; and, in consequence of this, began to acquire a degree of favor at court. As the attention to Great Britain began to diminish, for reasons which it will take me too much time to explain, and was gradually converted into aversion by the freedom with which the election of the First Consul to that dignity for life, and his other great measures, were treated in England, we of course grew more in favor; and if, in any instance, they relaxed from the extreme hauteur with which they treated all the foreign Powers, it was more particularly with us. They answered my notes politely though not satisfactorily; while they left those of many other ministers, who had demands upon them, unanswered. Among the most favorite projects of the First Consul, was the colonization of Louisiana. He saw in it a new Egypt; he saw in it a colony that was to counter-balance the eastern establishment of Britain; he saw in it a provision for his generals; and, what was more important in the then state of things, he saw in it a pretence for the ostracism of suspected enemies. To render the acquisition still more agreeable to the people, exaggerated accounts of its fertility, &c. were sold in every print shop. My first endeavor was to remove these impressions from the minds of the people most likely to be consulted, in which I was, generally speaking, very successful. But they all told me that it was a favorite project with the First Consul; nor would any of them hear of disposing of it by sale; yet so ignorant were they of the nature of their acquisition, that they never once suspected the Floridas were not included in their treaty, till they were convinced of the contrary by the inquiries they set on foot in consequence of my information. The Floridas, as you know, they endeavored to give in exchange for Parma; and in that negotiation set the price for which they would buy one, or sell the other, at forty millions of francs.

I endeavored, as far as possible, to obstruct that negotiation, and, at the same time, urged the absurdity of attempting to colonize Louisiana without ports in the Gulf. When I found impressions were made by these measures, I wrote the treatise I have sent you, entitled Mémoire sur cette question: Est il avantageux à la France de prendre possession de la Louisiane? As the First Consul had before read, with considerable attention, my notes on the relative naval force and commerce of France and England and the United States, (which I have also sent you,) and paid me some compliments upon it, I got this essay under his eyes through the same channel. It was read with attention; and, though I have reason to think it weakened his belief in the importance of Louisiana, yet, as he does not easily relinquish his plans, he still prosecuted them, though with much less ardor than he had before done. As I knew that his ministers seldom dared to interpose their opinions, it was necessary to apply directly to him, through the only person who was supposed to have any influence with him: and who that was, you have seen in my private letters to the President. I will not hazard the repetition here. After breaking the subject in a conversation with this gentleman, I sent him the note No. 1. He received it very graciously. Reading it in my presence, he told me that, if I would permit him, he would show it to the First Consul. I made some hesitation, on account of the delicacy of the subject. He assured me that he would take care that I should not be committed by it. Some days after, he told me that the First Consul had read it with attention; that so far as it referred to personal objects, he could not listen to it: but that the general and public motives I had mentioned merited particular attention: that he approved my proposition, in part, but not to the extent I had proposed. I am satisfied that from this period they had determined to let us have New Orleans, and the territory above the Arkansas, in exchange for certain commercial advantages; and that, if they could have concluded with Spain, we should also have had West Florida: but that nothing could be done until that business was terminated. This note had the effect of removing, in the fullest degree, every doubt that could possibly have remained relative to my sentiments of the present Government; and certain circumstances in it led to a kind of personal consideration which I have ever since enjoyed here. Not willing, however, to let the impressions I have made wear off, I wrote the note No. 2, which was also read with attention by the First Consul: and I believe produced a determination to enter upon the subject as soon as matters were arranged with Spain. As I believed, from the First Consul having spoken on this subject to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that the channel through which I submitted my observations was known to the latter, and of course could not be very pleasing to him; and as this was intimated to me by ———, who, in answer to my note No. 3, requested me to break the subject to the minister: you will have seen in my several notes, that I did not neglect to do so. But two causes suspended any absolute determination. First, the state of the negotiation with Spain relative to the Floridas: and next, my total want of power or instructions, which reduced me to the necessity of bringing forward nothing more specific; while I endeavored to pave the way for something conclusive when I should, as I had long hoped, receive them. The First Consul, too, had conceived an idea that, by taking possession of the country, he could more advantageously treat with our Government: and Mr. Talleyrand accordingly told me several times, in general terms, that every thing would be arranged: but that they must first take possession. After General Bernadotte was appointed, he assured me that he should have powers for this purpose: but as I had then received the newspaper account of the conduct of the Governor of New Orleans, I thought it would be a good ground for pressing something decisive, both with the minister, and through ———; with a view then to bring them to make some proposition here, or at least to give such discretionary powers as would facilitate your treaty with General Bernadotte. My notes to the minister you have. No. 4. is a copy of my letter to ———, which was also submitted to the First Consul, and produced nothing more than a verbal promise that all would be arranged when proper information could be received through General Bernadotte.

I have no doubt that it has long been their intention to make the arrangements I proposed, in exchange for commercial advantages. A sale has always been disrelished, as I was constantly told by Marbois and Talleyrand; and, as is clearly to be inferred from the Consul's note, in answer to my letter. What, however, I believe, principally drove them to this measure, was the promise which the First Consul had hastily made me to pay our debt fully and promptly; and which he found himself in no situation to fulfil, and yet knew not how to elude, as I pressed it at every turn, and spoke of it to Talleyrand and all the Consul's friends, assured them that I had communicated it not only to the Government, but to the creditors, with the declaration that they might firmly rely on it, as no one could believe that a man of the Consul's character, a sovereign and a soldier, could break his word. I told the Minister of the Treasury, that, as I owed it to myself to justify what I had said, I thought myself bound to publish my letter to the First Consul, with his answer, and the execution of his solemn engagements. I asked what his enemies would say to such a publication? He replied,—Or his friends?

The resolutions proposed in Congress, in consequence of the business of New Orleans, coming to hand, I sent a translation of them by General Bernadotte to ———; and also enclosed them to the minister. They proved we would not be rifled with; and the probability of a rupture with England, the effects of which upon the country, as you have observed in my notes, have been very strongly stated to them, hastened their determination; and they saw, as Mr. Talleyrand told me, that if they gave what I asked the rest was not worth keeping. This, and the impossibility of otherwise keeping faith with us, produced a determination to sell; which was communicated to the council, as I informed you on the 8th of April. There was a moment, even after Talleyrand called on me to set a price, that I thought the whole might drop through. It was when, as I informed you, he pretended he spoke without authority, and that Louisiana was not theirs, &c. But, as I have since written to you, that mystery was cleared up the next day.

The subsequent measures you have in my letters and notes, and in those Mr. Monroe and myself have jointly written to you. As I believe that, next to the negotiation that secured our independence, this is the most important the United States have ever entered into, I thought every thing that led to it might interest you and the President. I wished you to be minutely acquainted with every step I had taken; my verbal communications with every body, to whom I had access, whose interest I conceived might be useful, it would be impossible to detail. Nothing, however, was neglected on my part; and I sincerely hope the issue may be acceptable to our country.

Lord Whitworth retired last night, after the arrival of a messenger from Russia. The Emperor undertakes the mediation, but England will certainly decline; as it would be to continue her present ruinous expense, and derange her commerce probably for an unlimited time.

I have yet no time, nor indeed thought it proper, to interpose any business of less importance while the arrangements relative to, and in consequence of, the treaty were going on. The moment our messengers are despatched, I shall give it all my attention.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, May 13, 1803.

SIR:

We have the pleasure to transmit to you by M. Derieux a treaty which we have concluded with the French republic for the purchase and cession of Louisiana. The negotiation of this important object was committed, on the part of France, to M. Marbois, Minister of the Treasury, whose conduct therein has already received the sanction of his Government, as appears by the ratification of the First Consul, which we have also the pleasure to forward to you.

An acquisition of so great an extent was, we well know, not contemplated by our appointment: but we are persuaded that the circumstances and considerations which induced us to make it, will justify us in the measure to our Government and country.

Before the negotiation commenced, we were apprised that the First Consul had decided to offer to the United States, by sale, the whole of Louisiana, and not a part of it. We found, in the outset, that this information was correct, so that we had to decide, as a previous question, whether we would treat for the whole, or jeopardize, if not abandon, the hope of acquiring any part. On that point we did not long hesitate, but proceeded to treat for the whole. We were persuaded that, by so doing, it might be possible, if more desirable, to conclude eventually a treaty for a part, since, being thus possessed of the subject, it might be easy, in discussion at least, to lead from a view of the whole, to that of a part, and with some advantages peculiar to a negotiation on so great a scale. By treating for the whole, whereby we should be enabled to ascertain the idea which was entertained by this Government of its value, we should also be able to form some estimate of that which was affixed to the value of its parts. It was, too, probable that a less sum would be asked for the whole, if sold entire to a single purchaser, a friendly Power, who was able to pay for it, and whom it might be disposed to accommodate at the present juncture, than if it should be sold in parcels either to several Powers or companies of individuals: it was equally so, if this Government should be finally prevailed on to sell us a part, that some regard would be paid in the price asked for it to that which was demanded for the whole; lastly, by treating for the whole, whereby the attention of this Government would be drawn to the United States, as the sole purchasers, we might prevent the interference of other Powers, as also that of individuals, which might prove equally injurious in regard to the price asked for it, whether we acquired the whole or any part of the territory. We found, however, as we advanced in the negotiation, that M. Marbois was absolutely restricted to the disposition of the whole; that he would treat for no less portion, and, of course, that it was useless to urge it. On mature consideration, therefore, we finally concluded a treaty on the best terms we could obtain for the whole.

By this measure, we have sought to carry into effect, to the utmost of our power, the wise and benevolent policy of our Government, on the principles laid down in our instructions. The possession of the left bank of the river, had it been attainable alone, would, it is true, have accomplished much in that respect; but it is equally true that it would have left much still to accomplish. By it our people would have had an outlet to the ocean, in which no Power would have a right to disturb them; but while the other bank remained in the possession of a foreign Power, circumstances might occur to make the neighborhood of such Power highly injurious to us in many of our most important concerns. A divided jurisdiction over the river might beget jealousies, discontents, and dissensions, which the wisest policy on our part could not prevent or control. With a train of colonial Governments established along the western bank, from the entrance of the river far into the interior, under the command of military men, it would be difficult to preserve that state of things which would be necessary to the peace and tranquillity of our country. A single act of a capricious, unfriendly, or unprincipled subaltern might wound our best interests, violate our most unquestionable rights, and involve us in war. But by this acquisition, which comprises within our limits this great river, and all the streams that empty into it, from their sources to the ocean, the apprehension of these disasters is banished for ages from the United States. We adjust by it the only remaining known cause of variance with this very powerful nation; we anticipate the discontent of the great rival of France, who would probably have been wounded at any stipulation of a permanent nature which favored the latter, and which it would have been difficult to avoid, had she retained the right bank. We cease to have a motive of urgency, at least, for inclining to one Power, to avert the unjust pressure of another. We separate ourselves in a great measure from the European world and its concerns, especially its wars and intrigues. We make, in fine, a great stride to real and substantial independence, the good effect whereof will, we trust, be felt essentially and extensively in all our foreign and domestic relations. Without exciting the apprehension of any Power, we take a more imposing attitude with respect to all. The bond of our Union will be strengthened, and its movements become more harmonious by the increased purity of interest which it will communicate to the several parts which compose it.

In deliberating on this subject in a financial view, we were strongly impressed with the idea that while we had only a right of deposite, or, indeed, while the right bank remained in the possession of a foreign Power, it was always to be expected that we should, at some time or other, be involved in war on questions resulting from that cause. We were well satisfied that any war would cost us more than is hereby stipulated to be given for this territory; that none could produce a more favorable result; while it might, especially in the present disturbed state of the world, prove the ruin of our affairs.

There were other considerations which, though of minor importance, had, nevertheless, their due weight in our decision on this great question. If France, or any other Power holding the right bank of the river, imposed lighter duties than comported with the revenue system of the United States, supposing even that we had acquired the left bank, all the supplies destined for our extensive and populous settlements on the other side would be smuggled in through that channel, and our revenue thereby considerably diminished. Should such Power open offices for the sale of lands on the western bank, our population might be drained to the advantage of such Power, the price of our lands be diminished, and their sale prevented. But, by the possession of both banks, these evils are averted.

The terms on which we have made this acquisition, when compared with the objects obtained by it, will, we flatter ourselves, be deemed advantageous to our country. We have stipulated, as you will see by the treaty and conventions, that the United States shall pay to the French Government sixty millions of francs in stock bearing an interest of six per cent.; and a sum not exceeding twenty millions more to our citizens, in discharge of the debts due to them by France, under the convention of 1800; and also to exempt the manufactures, productions, and vessels of France and Spain in the direct trade from those countries respectively, in the ports of the ceded territory, from foreign duties for the term of twelve years. The stock is to be created irredeemable for fifteen years, and discharged afterwards in three equal annual instalments; the interest on it is to be paid in Europe, and the principal, in case this Government thinks proper to sell it, disposed of in such manner as will be most conducive to the credit of the American funds. The debts due to our citizens are to be discharged by drafts on our treasury. We omit a more minute view of the stipulations of these instruments, since, as you will possess them, it is unnecessary.

Louisiana was acquired of Spain by France, in exchange for Tuscany, which latter is settled by treaty on the son-in-law of the King of Spain, with the title of King of Etruria, and was estimated in the exchange, in consideration of its revenue, at one hundred millions of francs. The First Consul thought he had made an advantageous bargain in that exchange, as appears by the high idea which he entertained of its value, as shown on many occasions. Louisiana was the territory which he promised, in his proclamation at the peace, as an asylum to those who had become unfortunate by the revolution, and which he spoke of as vast and fertile. When he made up his mind to offer the cession of it to the United States, it was contemplated to ask for it one hundred millions, exclusive of the debts they owed to our citizens, which they proposed we should also pay, with a perpetual exemption from foreign duties on the manufactures, productions, and vessels of France and Spain in the ports of the ceded territory. From that demand, however, in respect to the sum, he receded, under the deliberations of his own cabinet; for the first proposition which M. Marbois made to us was that we should pay eighty millions, sixty of which in cash, the balance to our citizens, the whole in one year in Paris, with a perpetual exemption from foreign duties as above. The modification in the mode of payment, that is by stock, for from the quantum he never would depart, and the limitation of the term of the duties to twelve years, with the proviso annexed to it, which was introduced into the treaty, with every other change from his project, was the effect of negotiation and accommodation, in which we experienced, on his part, and that of his Government, a promptitude and candor which were highly grateful to us.

In estimating the real value of this country to the United States, a variety of considerations occur, all of which merit due attention. Of these, we have already noticed many of a general nature, to which, however, it may be difficult to fix a precise value. Others present themselves of a nature more definite, to which it will be more practicable to fix some standard. By possessing both banks, the whole revenue or duty on imports will accrue to the United States, which must be considerable. The value of the exports, we have understood, was last year four millions of dollars. If a portion only of the imports pass through that channel, as, under our Government, we presume they will, the amount of the revenue will be considerable. This will annually increase in proportion as the population and productions in that quarter do. The value of the lands in the province of Louisiana, amounting to some hundred millions of acres, of the best quality, and in the best climate, is, perhaps, incalculable. From either of these sources it is not doubted that the sum stipulated may be raised in time to discharge the debt.

We hope to be able to forward you herewith the order of this Government for the delivery of the possession of the ceded territory to the United States, or to communicate its arrangements for that purpose, as also its views relative to the sale of the stock, since it is understood that their intention is to sell it. It has been intimated to us that the house of Baring, in London, connected with that of Hope, in Holland, will take the whole at their risk, at the current price in England, on a commission to be agreed on, paying to France a stipulated sum by the month; their object is said to be, exclusive of that of making profit by it, to keep up the credit of our stock, they being much interested in it. Considering the great capital of these houses, it is presumable that they would be able to comply with any engagement they might make to that effect. And it cannot be doubted that it would be more advantageous to us that the whole should be thus disposed of, than remain in the hands of France, who, under the pressure of difficulties, might have it less in her power to preserve or regard our credit, in the disposition of it. We shall communicate with M. Marbois fully on this subject, and apprise you of the result.

We received some days past a letter from Mr. King, in which he says, that, in case of war, which he deemed inevitable, the British Government contemplated taking possession of the island of New Orleans. He desired information to be communicated to that Government, whether it had been ceded to the United States, as he presumed a knowledge thereof would prevent the measure. We gave an immediate reply to his letter, in which we informed him that the whole of Louisiana had been ceded to the United States, which he was at liberty to communicate to the British Government. We likewise made the same communication to Lord Whitworth, the British ambassador here, who expressed himself to be well satisfied with the event.

These countries, France and England, have been on the point of a rupture for some time past. At present, the prospect of an accommodation is more remote, as the English ambassador left Paris at ten o'clock last night: still some hope of it is entertained by some persons in power here. This nation is desirous of peace, and it is believed that its Government is similarly disposed.

Permit us to express an earnest wish that the President and Senate may decide with the least possible delay on the treaty and conventions which we have concluded, and have the pleasure to transmit you. If it is the sense of our Government to ratify them, the sooner that fact is known to this Government the better its effect will be.

The list of the debts due by France to American citizens not being yet prepared, owing to M. Marbois's absence to-day from Paris, and the previous delays of the offices in which the evidences were, cannot be sent by this conveyance. In consequence, we retain the original of the convention to which it should be annexed, and send a copy of it: we shall forward in a day or two the original. By the list, it may be inferred that the debts amount to a greater sum than they really do: they will be subject, according to the convention, to the revision of our Board, by whom it is expected they will be reduced considerably. We have full confidence that, including the interest, they will not exceed the sum of twenty millions of francs, which is much to be desired, as in that case all our citizens, whose claims are entitled to the support of our Government, will be provided for and paid by it. You will observe that, in the mode adopted, considerable indulgence is given to our treasury. The whole sum is to be paid there, and under delays which will free it from embarrassment.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.
JAMES MONROE.

P. S. It was intended to have forwarded this by M. Derieux; but he being forced to leave Paris some days since on his way to Bordeaux, from whence he sails, we commit it to Mr. Hughes, who will embark at Havre. We shall forward to-morrow or next day an exemplication of it by Bordeaux, under the care of M. Derieux.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

LONDON, May 15, 1803.

MY LORD:

In the present critical posture of affairs, I lose no time in communicating to your lordship, for His Majesty's information, that a treaty was signed at Paris on the 30th April past, by the plenipotentiaries of America and France, by which the complete sovereignty of the town and territory of New Orleans, as well as of all Louisiana, as the same was heretofore possessed by Spain, has been acquired by the United States of America.

In drawing up this treaty, care has been taken so to frame the same as not to infringe any right of Great Britain in the navigation of the river Mississippi.

I flatter myself that this communication will be received with satisfaction, and regarded as a new proof of the disposition of the United States to observe towards His Majesty a spirit of amity and confidence, important at all times, and more especially so in present circumstances, to the harmony and mutual prosperity of the two countries.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, May 19, 1803.

SIR:

Having laid before the King your letter of the 15th of this month, in which you inform me that a treaty was signed at Paris on the 30th of last month, by the plenipotentiaries of America and France, by which the complete sovereignty of the town and territory of New Orleans, as well as of all Louisiana, has been acquired by the United States, I have received His Majesty's commands to express to you the pleasure with which His Majesty has received this intelligence, and to add that His Majesty regards the care which has been taken so to frame this treaty as not to infringe any right of Great Britain in the navigation of the Mississippi, as the most satisfactory evidence of a disposition on the part of the Government of the United States, correspondent to that which His Majesty entertains, to promote and improve that harmony and good understanding which so happily subsist between the two countries, and which are so conducive to their mutual benefit. I have it also in command to assure you, sir, that the sentiments which you have expressed in making this communication, are considered by His Majesty's Government as an additional proof of that cordiality and confidence which you have uniformly manifested in the whole course of your public mission, and which have so justly entitled you to the esteem and regard of His Majesty's Government.

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 16, 1803.

SIR:

We have the honor to enclose the account which should be annexed to the convention transmitted to you. The Bordeaux embargo is in assignats and two-thirds will be deducted. From many of the others, we have reason to think, from a particular account now in our hands, there will be such considerable deductions as will reduce the whole charge to less than twenty millions of livres, including the interest. The Consul has agreed to ratify immediately, and we hope to have the honor of transmitting you the ratified treaty, with an order to deliver the territory, in a few days. Such arrangements will also, we trust, be made relative to the stock as will prevent its coming on the market to any loss, or any part of it from being sold in America.

We have the honor to be, &c.

R. R. LIVINGSTON.
JAS. MONROE.

Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 20, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

The subject of this letter is too important to admit of delay, in case the treaties should have been any time in your hands; but, as it has not yet been fully considered by Mr. Monroe, he thinks he cannot make it that of a joint letter till we have more fully discussed it, which we propose to do to-morrow or the next day. But as that will be too late for this conveyance, I throw out these hasty thoughts for your consideration. In the mean time you will consider this rather as a private than as a public letter; since it may or may not be made use of to promote such measures as, upon mature deliberation, the President shall think proper to adopt. I do not, however, doubt that Mr. Monroe will concur with me in opinion, after we have discussed the subject; and that we shall, by the next opportunity, write to you officially thereon.

I informed you long since, that, on inquiring whether the Floridas were within the cession of Spain, I was told by M. Marbois he was sure that Mobile was, but could not answer further. I believed his information incorrect; because I understood that Louisiana, as it then was, made the object of the cession; and that since the possession of the Floridas by Britain, they had changed their names. But the moment I saw the words of the treaty of Madrid, I had no doubt but it included all the country that France possessed by the name of Louisiana, previous to their cession to Spain, except what had been conveyed bys ubsequent treaties. I accordingly insisted, with M. Marbois, at the time we negotiated, that this would be considered as within our purchase. He neither assented nor denied, but said that all they received from Spain was intended to be conveyed to us. That my construction was right, is fairly to be inferred from the words of the treaties, and from a comment upon them contained in the Spanish minister's letter to Mr. Pinckney; in which he expressly says that France had recovered Louisiana as it formerly belonged to her, saving the rights of other Powers. This leaves no doubt upon the subject of the intention of the contracting parties. Now, it is well known that Louisiana, as possessed by France, was bounded by the river Perdido, and that Mobile was the metropolis. For the facts relative to this, I refer you to Raynal and to his maps. I have also seen maps here which put the matter out of dispute.

I called this morning upon M. Marbois for a further explanation on this subject, and to remind him of his having told me that Mobile made a part of the cession. He told me that he had no precise idea on the subject, but that he knew it to be an historical fact, and that on that only he had formed his opinion. I asked him what orders had been given to the Prefect, who was to take possession, or what orders had been given by Spain, as to the boundary, in ceding it? He assured me that he did not know; but that he would make the inquiry, and let me know. At four o'clock I called for Mr. Monroe to take him to the Minister of Foreign Affairs; but he was prevented from accompanying me. I asked the minister what were the east bounds of the territory ceded to us? He said he did not know; we must take it as they had received it. I asked him how Spain meant to give them possession? He said, according to the words of the treaty. But what did you mean to take? I do not know. Then you mean that we shall construe it our own way? I can give you no direction; you have made a noble bargain for yourselves, and I suppose you will make the most of it.

Now, sir, the sum of this business is, to recommend to you, in the strongest terms, after having obtained the possession, that the French commissary will give you, to insist upon this as a part of your right; and to take possession, at all events, to the river Perdido. I pledge myself that your right is good; and, after the explanations that have been given here, you need apprehend nothing from a decisive measure. Your minister here, and at Madrid, can support your claim; and the time is peculiarly favorable to enable you to do it without the smallest risk at home. It may also be important to anticipate any designs that Britain may have upon that country. Should she possess herself of it, and the war terminate favorably for her, she will not readily relinquish it. With this in your hand, East Florida will be of little moment, and may be yours whenever you please. At all events, proclaim your right and take possession.

I am, sir, &c.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

Hon. JAMES MADISON.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 25, 1803.

Your several letters of March 3, 11, 18, and 24, with their enclosures, have been duly received, as has been that of March 12 to the President. According to the request in this last, I now acknowledge, also, or perhaps repeat the acknowledgment, of the two papers enclosed, the one in your letter of February 26, the other in that of August 10, 1802.

The assurances given by the Chief Consul, on the subject of our claims, cannot but be acceptable, although they amount to less than justice; because no more than justice would have been done if the claims had been satisfied without the delay which has intervened, and according to the example of good faith and punctuality in executing the treaty given by the United States. It is to be hoped that the sincerity of these assurances will be verified by the success of the measures you are taking for a final and favorable settlement in behalf of our citizens, who have never doubted, as far as I know, your solicitude or your exertions to obtain justice for them.

The assurances given, at the same time, by the Chief Consul, of his regard for the United States, and of his personal esteem for their Chief Magistrate, are entitled also to favorable attention, as an indication that a juster value begins to be placed on our friendly relations to the French republic. Whether this language of the French Government be the effect of the political crisis in which it finds itself, or of a growing conviction of the important destinies and honorable policy of the United States, or, as is probable, of both these considerations, you will, in return, communicate the assurances, with which you are charged by the President, of his disposition to cherish a reciprocity of these sentiments, and that sincere amity between the two nations, which is prescribed to both by such weighty advantages.

The persevering evasion of your demands on the subject of the deposite at New Orleans, and generally of the rights of the United States, as fixed by their treaty with Spain, is not a little astonishing. It is as difficult to be reconciled with the sincerity of the late professions of the French Government, and with the policy which the moment dictates to it, as with any other rational motives. It is the more extraordinary, too, as it appears, by a late communication from the Spanish Government to Mr. Pinckney, (of which, he says, he forwarded a copy to Paris, and of which another is herewith enclosed,) that the treaty of cession expressly saves all rights previously stipulated to other nations. A conduct so inexplicable is little fitted to inspire confidence, or to strengthen friendship; and rendered proper the peremptory declaration contained in your note of the 16th of March. The negotiations succeeding the arrival of Mr. Monroe cannot fail to draw out the views of France on this important subject.

You were informed, in my letters of the 18th and 20th of April, that orders had been transmitted by the Spanish Government for restoring the deposite. The answers from New Orleans to the Spanish and French ministers here show that their successive interpositions, including the peremptory one from the Marquis d'Yrujo of the 11th of March, were all unavailing. The orders of the King of Spain will, no doubt, be obeyed, if they arrive before possession be given to the French authority; nor is it presumable that, in that event, they would be disregarded. Still it is possible that the French agents may choose to wait for the French construction of the treaty before they relinquish the ground taken by the Intendant; and the more possible, as the orders to the Intendant may contain no disavowal of his construction of it. Under these circumstances, it will be incumbent on the French Government to hasten the orders necessary to guard against a prolongation of the evil, and the very serious consequences incident to it. It cannot be too much pressed, that the justice and friendship of France, in relation to our rights and interests on the Mississippi, will be the principal rules by which we shall measure her views respecting the United States, and by which the United States will shape the course of their future policy towards her.

We are still ignorant of the result of the armed negotiations between Great Britain and France. Should it be war, or should the uncertainty of the result be spun out, the crisis may be favorable to our just rights and our just objects; and the President assures himself that the proper use will be made of it. Mr. Monroe's arrival has not yet been mentioned in any accounts which have not been contradicted.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, Esq.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

GENTLEMEN: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 28, 1803.

Since my last, which was of April 18th, the tenor of our information from France and Great Britain renders a war between those Powers in the highest degree probable. It may be inferred, at the same time, from the information given by Mr. Livingston and Mr. King, that the importance of the United States is rising fast in the estimation both of the French and the British cabinets; and that Louisiana is as much a subject of solicitude with the latter, as it has been an object of acquisition with the former. The crisis presented by this jealous and hostile attitude of those rival Powers has, doubtless, been seen in its bearings on the arrangements contemplated in your commissions and instructions; and it is hoped, though we have not yet heard, that the arrival of Mr. Monroe will have taken place in time to give full advantage to the means of turning the actual state of things to the just benefit of the United States.

The solicitude of England, with respect to Louisiana, is sufficiently evinced by her controlling the French expedition from Holland to that country. But her views have been particularly unfolded to Mr. King by Mr. Addington, who frankly told him, that, in case a war should happen, it would, perhaps, be one of their first steps to occupy New Orleans; adding, that it would not be to keep it, for that England would not accept the country were all agreed to give it to her, but to prevent another Power from obtaining it, which, in his opinion, would be best effected by its belonging to the United States: and concluding with assurances that nothing should be done injurious to their interests. If the councils of France should be guided by half the wisdom which is here displayed on the part of her rival, your negotiations will be made very easy, and the result of them very satisfactory.

Although the immediate object of Great Britain in occupying New Orleans may be that of excluding France, and although her prudence may renounce the fallacious advantage of retaining it for herself, it is not to be presumed that she will yield it to the United States without endeavoring to make it the ground of some arrangement that will directly or indirectly draw them into her war, or of some important concessions in favor of her commerce, at the expense of our own. This consideration necessarily connects itself with the explanation and friendly assurances of Mr. Addington, and so far leaves in force the inducement to accomplish our object by an immediate bargain with France.

In forming this bargain, however, the prospect held out by the British minister, with the nature of the crisis itself, authorizes us to expect better terms than your original instructions allow.

The President thinks it will be ineligible, under such circumstances, that any convention whatever on the subject should be entered into, that will not secure to the United States the jurisdiction of a reasonable district on some convenient part of the bank of the Mississippi.

He is made the more anxious, also, by the manner in which the British Government has opened itself to our minister, as well as by other considerations, that as little concession as possible should be made in the terms with France, on points disagreeable to Great Britain, and particularly that the acknowledgment of the right of France as holding one shore of the Mississippi, to shut it against British vessels, should be avoided, if not essential to the attainment of the great objects we have in view, on terms otherwise highly expedient. It is desirable that such an acknowledgment should not even be admitted into the discussion.

The guaranty of the country beyond the Mississippi is another condition which it will be well to avoid if possible, not only for the reasons you already possess, but because it seems not improbable, from the communications of Mr. King, that Great Britain is meditating plans for the emancipation and independence of the whole of the American continent south of the United States, and consequently, that such a guaranty would not only be disagreeable to her, but embarrassing to the United States. Should war, indeed, precede your conventional arrangements with France, the guaranty, if admitted at all, must necessarily be suspended and limited in such a manner as to be applicable only to the state of things which may be fixed by a peace.

The proposed occupancy of New Orleans by Great Britain suggests a further precaution. Should possession be taken by her, and the preliminary sum of two millions, or any part of it, be paid to France, risks and disputes might ensue, which make it advisable to postpone the payment till possession shall be given to the United States; or, if this cannot be done, to obtain every possible security against eventual loss.

As the question may arise, how far, in a state of war, one of the parties can, of right, convey territory to a neutral Power, and thereby deprive its enemy of the chance of conquest incident to war, especially when the conquest may have been actually projected, it is thought proper to observe to you, 1st, That, in the present case, the project of peaceable acquisition by the United States originated prior to the war, and, consequently, before a project of conquest could have existed. 2d, That the right of a neutral to procure for itself, by a bona fide transaction, property of any sort, from a belligerent Power, ought not to be frustrated by the chance that a rightful conquest thereof might thereby be precluded. A contrary doctrine would sacrifice the just interests of peace to the unreasonable pretensions of war, and the positive rights of one nation to the possible rights of another. A restraint on the alienation of territory from a nation at war to a nation at peace, is imposed only in cases where the proceeding might have a collusive reference to the existence of the war, and might be calculated to save the property from danger, by placing it in secret trust, to be reconveyed on the return of peace. No objection of this sort can be made to the acquisitions we have in view. The measures taken on this subject were taken before the existence or the appearance of war: and they will be pursued as they were planned, with the bona fide purpose of vesting the acquisition forever in the United States.

With these observations you will be left to do the best you can, under all circumstances, for the interests of your country, keeping in mind that the rights we assert are clear; that the objects we pursue are just; and that you will be warranted in providing for both, by taking every fair advantage of emergencies.

For the course of information relating to the deposite at New Orleans, I refer you to my letter of the 25th instant, to Mr. Livingston.

I have the honor to be, &c. JAMES MADISON.

From the Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Livingston.

PARIS, le 11 Prairial, an 11.

MONSIEUR:

La déclaration publiée le 17ème Mai, par le Gouvernement Anglais; l'embargo mis dans les ports d'Angleterre sur le commerce des Français, des Bataves, et des autres alliés de la république; les lettres de marque distribuées aux armateurs, et autorisant la course contre le commerce de France; la prise, enfin, de deux bâtimens faite, à quelques lieues de Brest, par deux frégates Anglaises; ne permettent plus de mettre en doute les intentions du Gouvernement de la Grand Bretagne.

Le Premier Consul a attendu que rien ne manquait à la conviction de tous les Gouvernemens de l'Europe sur les dispositions hostiles de S. M. Britannique; pour manifester les siennes, ce n'est que de ce jour qu'il a fait connaitre la résolution que l'honneur lui impose de repousser une injuste agression.

En informant vôtre Gouvernement de cette détermination, monsieur, vous le trouverez, je n'en doute pas, déjà éclairci de la justice de nos droits par la publication faite en France de pièces de la discussion.

L'histoire des relations diplomatiques n'a jamais présenté, d'une part, de plus constans efforts pour conserver la paix; de l'autre, une recherche plus soutenu, de tous les moyens, de tous les prétextes, pour rallumer la guerre.

Le Gouvernement Anglais a fait ressortir ses torts par la publication même qu'il a ordonnée dans la vue de se justifier. Sa déclaration de guerre est en contradiction ouverte avec la correspondance officielle qui en est la suite. Cette déclaration donne, pour motif à la guerre, des réclamations qui ont toujours été ignorées du Gouvernement Français, et des griefs, enfin, qu'il ne connait que par les hostilités et le manifeste de l'Angleterre.

J'ai l'honneur de vous transmettre la copie exacte d'une des lettres de Lord Whitworth, dont l'original a été communiqué à vôtre excellence. Cette note renfermait une faux allégation, que le Gouvernement Anglais a cru devoir faire disparaitre dans la copie qu'il a fait mettre sous les yeux de son Parlement. En rapprochant cette copie falsifié de son texte, vôtre excellence a du se convaincre que le ministre Britannique n'avoit trouvait d'autre moyen de se soustraire au jugement de l'Europe, que celui de couvrir un mensonge officiel par une imposture Parlementaire.

Le Premier Consul se flatte que tous les Gouvernemens de l'Europe n'hesiteront pas à juger que la France a été constamment loyale dans une cause juste, et que, dans de prétentions, sans justice, de l'Angleterre, s'en volontairement mise dans l'obligation de n'avoir a faire que des démarches sans convenance, et des déclarations sans bonne foi.

Agréez, monsieur, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Livingston.

PARIS, 11*th Prairial*, an 11, (May 30, 1803.)

SIR:

The declaration published the 17th of May by the English Government; the embargo laid in the ports of England on the commerce of the French, and of the Batavians, and of other allies of the republic; the letters of marque distributed to privateers, authorizing them to cruise against the commerce of France; the capture, in fine, of two vessels, made some leagues from Brest, by two English frigates; permit a doubt to exist no longer concerning the intentions of the Government of Great Britain.

The First Consul is persuaded that nothing can be wanting to convince all the Governments of Europe of the hostile dispositions of His Britannic Majesty. To manifest his own, it is only this day he publishes the resolution, which honor extorts, to repulse an unjust aggression.

In informing your Government of this determination, you will find it, I have no doubt, already apprised of the justice of our claims by the publication, made in France, of the papers which this discussion has elicited.

The history of diplomatic relations has never presented, on the one side, more constant efforts to preserve peace; and, on the other, a more persevering desire, by any means and every pretext, to rekindle the war.

The English Government, even in the publication which has been ordered for the purpose of defending her conduct, has only made her injustice the more apparent. The declaration of war is in palpable contradiction of the official correspondence which follows it. This declaration assigns, as a motive for the war, demands of which the French Government had been always ignorant, and complaints of which it was only apprised by the hostilities and manifesto of England.

I have the honor to transmit to you an exact copy of one of the letters of Lord Whitworth, the original of which has been communicated to your excellency. This note contains a false allegation, which it has thought proper to expunge from the copy submitted to the British Parliament. By comparing this falsified copy with the original text, your excellency will be convinced that the British ministry could find no other means to escape the condemnation of Europe than that of concealing an official untruth under a Parliamentary imposture.

The First Consul flatters himself with the belief that the Governments of Europe will not hesitate to pronounce that France has been uniformly loyal in a just cause; and that, amidst the unjust pretensions of England, she has involuntarily imposed upon herself the necessity of adopting measures destitute of propriety, and making declarations in violation of good faith.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, June 2, 1803.

SIR:

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 11th Prairial, announcing the measures that have unfortunately led to a rupture between France and Britain. I shall transmit the same, together with the papers that accompany it, to the Government of the United States, who will doubtless learn with much pain the circumstances that have rekindled the flame of war in Europe; and, while they sincerely regret that the measures pursued by the First Consul for the preservation of the peace which Europe owes to his humanity have failed of success, they will still hope that some expedient may be found for stopping the effusion of blood, and restoring that repose to Europe for which she so ardently sighs.

I pray your excellency to accept the assurances of my high consideration.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, June 3, 1803.

SIR:

Mr. Monroe having undertaken to write our joint letter, I shall confine this to objects that do not relate to the treaty. I would only observe to you that, since the ratification, we have had a great deal of trouble with it, an opinion prevailing that we have made too favorable a bargain. My letter to the President and our joint letter will so fully explain this extraordinary business as to make any further observations unnecessary. I must, however, earnestly press you, if you think the object important, to get the ratification as soon as possible, and to do all that on our part remains to be done.

During this transaction, I have thought it improper to press any other business that might excite the smallest irritation.

How happy, my dear sir, are we to have concluded a treaty which will forever exclude us from the politics of this stormy quarter of the globe. I hope that you will not let it totally pass through your hands. My letter to the President will fully explain this. Some commercial arrangements might be advantageously proposed here in the present state of things, had I your instructions thereon and the necessary powers. This, too, is the moment to arrange the affair of extra duty with Batavia; and it might, I believe, be done here advantageously.

General Bernadotte, after waiting for weeks at Rochefort, has returned here, and I think it probable will not go out now, as his services may be required at home. Who will be appointed in his place I know not. Otto is still without office, but does not wish to be sent across the Atlantic.

I am, &c.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

Honorable JAMES MADISON.

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, June 7, 1803.

SIR:

We have the pleasure to forward to you by Mr. Jay, the ratification by the First Consul of the treaty and conventions which we concluded on the 30th April with this republic. We have heretofore forwarded to you the original instruments, and two copies by different ways, the original by Havre, under the care of Mr. Hughes, who sailed about two weeks since, expressly charged with that object, and instructed to proceed with the greatest possible despatch after his arrival in the United States, to the city of Washington, to deliver the same in person; the second by the way of England, under the care of Mr. Reed, son of the late President of Pennsylvania, who was instructed to forward it immediately on his arrival in England, by the most prompt and safe opportunity that offered; the third by M. Derieux, who sailed from Bordeaux. We flatter ourselves that you will receive those several communications in the course of the present month, and this by Mr. Jay early in July, as it is highly important that our Government should receive and act on the subject of them as soon as possible. The command of the sum stipulated for the cession to be paid to this Government being an object with them, is a motive for despatch, but it is not the only one: a late occurrence, which is suggested by the enclosed letter from M. Marbois, and our reply to it, has excited an anxiety on that point, which it was hoped and believed would not have grown out of the transaction. Several circumstances of late, especially the delay in granting us a passport for Mr. Jay to carry the ratifications to the United States, surprised us. We thought we could discern some symptoms of discontent in the Government with the bargain it had made. The letter from M. Marbois left no doubt on that head. We are convinced that if the transaction was not complete, or was within the reach of the Government, that it would not take place even on terms very different from those stipulated. There is much reason to believe that this letter was written not solely for the purpose of manifesting a sentiment of regret at what had been done, but to create difficulties and embarrass the transaction in the execution of it. On receiving the letter, we found ourselves placed in a situation of peculiar embarrassment, from personal as well as public considerations, which was much increased by a conference with the Minister of Foreign Affairs. We learned from him that the Consul considered the ratification as under his control till the exchange took place, and that he might annex to it such conditions as appeared to him to be proper; that he claimed every act stipulated on the part of the United States, to be performed strictly within the terms specified, or, on failure, that the parties be restored to the state they were in if the treaties were never made. We asked him what had created any doubt on that point: he said that the clause in the article of the convention respecting the payment of sixty millions of francs to France, which was made dependent on the delivery of possession of the country to our commissary, might, by accident or other causes, become nugatory; the Spaniards might not surrender it at once, the British might take it, &c. We told him that these things were contemplated by the parties when the treaties were made and provided for; that we could not add a new article to the treaty, or explain any one in it, since it must be explained by itself only; that delays which proceeded from bad faith were those only for which our Government was responsible; that such as were unavoidable attached to them no blame, and could not affect the treaty: he replied that, after the example of our Government in the last treaty, the Consul might nevertheless annex a condition to the ratification explanatory of his sense of it, which he would do if we did not satisfy him either with respect to the prompt manner in which the treaty would be executed by our Government, or agree to expunge the terms in that convention which respected taking possession of the territory. We did not fail to remark that the treaty must stand as it was to be adopted, rejected, or modified, by the parties having a right to do the same, not by us. Thus the affair was at a stand for a day or two, and it remained for us to decide what course we had better take to put it in motion. After viewing it in all the lights in which it presented itself to our minds, we thought it best to reply to M. Marbois's letter in the terms of that which is enclosed, which you will perceive, even had we had the power to modify the instruments which were passed and beyond our reach, has in truth not affected them at all: the principles implied or insisted on in M. Marbois's letter are not admitted. We state that the Government is bound to execute the treaty and conventions in the terms specified, which is no more than what those instruments state, that our Government is answerable for neglect, and by strong and obvious implication for it only, which is the doctrine of the law of nations; and even in that case, that the right which arises from it of declaring how far the party injured will be bound by the treaty, is reciprocal, since, if our Government is willing to make compensation for the injury resulting from the delay, it may equally insist on it. The remaining sentence in the letter states that we confine ourselves to the letter of the treaty, be which it is intended to exclude the construction of either party as the rule of interpretation for the other: this letter was accepted as satisfactory, and will, we presume, remove every difficulty to the execution of the treaty. We expect the order for the surrender of the country to be addressed to M. Pichon, in Washington, to be executed by him or by some person to be appointed by him, will be delivered to us to-morrow, and that Mr. Jay will take it with him with the ratification the day after to-morrow: had we pursued any other course, it is not easy to decide what the effect might have been. The First Consul in the moment of chagrin at what he may consider a bad bargain, (but which we think a good one for him, since he had better have given it away than held it with the expense attending the establishment by troops, which might occasion variance and wars with us,) might have so compromitted himself in opposition to the measure, as to have made the transaction, if not finally defeat the treaties, a cause of future discontent between the two nations, instead of what was contemplated by it, the establishment of perpetual peace, by the removal of every existing cause of variance which could possibly disturb it. The most favorable result that we could have expected was, that the ratification would have been forwarded to M. Pichon, with advice of the dissatisfaction of the First Consul with the treaties, and his desire to extricate himself from them, and with instructions not to exchange the ratifications, if any circumstance on our part, under the most rigid construction, would justify it. It is possible this may be still done: nevertheless we think it important to put the engagements in a train of execution, without exciting ill temper, in the belief that every stipulation may be executed in time, and that should the contrary occur by any accident or misfortune, it was the surest mode to prevent discussion and disagreement in the sequel. It is our earnest wish and advice, if the treaties are approved by the President, that he convene the Congress to provide the funds for an immediate compliance with them. It is best to leave nothing to hazard. The surrender of the posts ought to precede the creation of the fund: but as there will be no doubt on that point after taking the necessary measures, we would consider it as done, and act accordingly. If we execute our part strictly within the terms specified, the transaction is at an end; there will be no obstacle from this quarter.

We shall send you a copy of Mr. Baring's contract for the stock with this Government, which will show in what manner the payment is to be made. A third of the whole debt is to be advanced to him in Washington; the remaining two-thirds to be sent here immediately. It was contended lately that these two-thirds must be received here in three months after the exchange of ratifications, but that seems to be given up at present, since the term transfer being technical, and applicable to an act to be performed in our treasury, and no where else, it is admitted that it must have been used by us in that sense only. Still it is much to be wished that the certificates might be sent here within the three months, if possible, and which it is presumed may be done if the Congress is immediately convened.

After the funds are created and transferred in our treasury, it is, by the spirit of the treaty, the duty of the French minister to forward them here. But it is much to be desired that our Government would undertake that service, and forward them by a public vessel, to guard against accidents which might create delay. Should it happen unfortunately that the ratification or creation of the public stock should be protracted beyond the terms specified, we think the cause should be made known by a public vessel, with the assurance of the President that every injury resulting from it should be repaired, and ample compensation made for it. We cannot too strongly impress an idea, if our conduct is approved, of the most prompt execution of the stipulations to be performed on our part, and of a course of proceeding which leaves nothing to chance, by giving any cause of complaint to this Government.

We are happy to have it in our power to assure you, that, on a thorough examination of the subject, we consider it incontrovertible that West Florida is comprised in the cession of Louisiana. West Florida was a part of Louisiana when it was in the hands of France, and it was not in her hands in any other situation. The transfer of the whole was on the same day, the 3d of November, 1762, that being the day of the secret convention between France and Spain, and of the preliminary articles of the treaty of the 10th February, 1763, between those Powers and Great Britain. The treaty of 1783 between Britain and Spain, by which the Floridas were ceded to the latter, put Louisiana in her hands in the same state it was in the hands of France: and the remaining or third member of the article in the treaty of St. Ildefonso between France and Spain, under which we claim, by referring to that of 1783, (as to that between Spain and the United States of 1795,) and of course in the above character, only tends to confirm this doctrine. We consider ourselves so strongly founded in this conclusion, that we are of opinion the United States should act on it in all the measures relative to Louisiana, in the same manner as if West Florida was comprised within the island of New Orleans; or, lay to the west of the river Iberville, and to the lakes through which its waters pass to the ocean. Hence the acquisition becomes of proportionably greater value to the United States.

In compliance with the convention, which provides for the payment of the debts due by France to the citizens of the United States, we have organized a board of three commissioners, whose duty it is to revise the claims that are or may be liquidated by the suitable department of the French Government, according to the principles of that convention. We have appointed to this office Colonel John Mercer, Isaac C. Barnet, and William McClure, three of our citizens, who are not interested in any of the claims; and who, for ability, probity, and industry, we think very deserving of the trust. Their appointment is, of course, provisional only, subject to the approbation of the President, whose disposition on the subject you will be pleased to communicate. We shall advance them a sum, by a draft on our bankers in Holland, necessary for defraying their current expenses; leaving it to our Government to fix the rate of compensation.

We consider it important that the stock to be created should not be brought on the American market, nor, indeed, strictly speaking, on the European market; lest it might occasion a decline in the price, to the injury of our credit, and the injury of the holders of it here and there, as well as of France, with whom we have a joint interest in that respect. On that principle we promoted the disposal of it to the company of Baring and Hope, which took place according to a contract which is here enclosed.* We consider the arrangement as accomplishing the object referred to, and, in that light, as being advantageous to the United States. We were not competent judges of the price at which the stock ought to have sold, on which account, as well as that that was a question which belonged more peculiarly to the Government of France to attend to, we did not interfere further in the transaction than to communicate to the latter the best information that we possessed. We believe the contract is such as, while it gives to the company an adequate profit, and may prevent sales by compulsion, will prove more beneficial to France than any other disposition she could have made of it. It is a justice due to this house to remark, that the assurances which we received from it through its agent here, of the advances of money on the credit of the United States, in case we should require them in the execution of the trust reposed in us, inspired us with greater confidence than we might otherwise have felt, to make the engagements we have entered into.

We are, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient servants,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON,
JAS. MONROE.

P. S. Since writing the above, this Government has, of its own accord, restored our letter and retaken its own. It has also shown to us the instructions given to M. Pichon, which is substituted for the other measure, and amounts to this: that, on exchanging the ratifications, he is to declare they are void if the funds, &c. are not created by our Government in the term stipulated. It is possible that this Government is fearful that the British may take the territory, and we, in consequence, delay the payment; though we rather think that the hesitation and procedure arose from some sentiment relative to the contract. It is known that the Consul has said lately, that he thought the territory worth three or four hundred millions of livres. The above change is the effect of further reflection on the subject. It will be well, that some of these circumstances be known, and that nothing appear under the sanction of the Government or otherwise, if to be avoided, to excite an unpleasant sensation here: since a belief they stand well with us, which is their political motive in the transaction, will contribute greatly to reconcile the Government and nation to the cession, and promote its harmonious execution.

We have thought it advisable to employ Mr. Jay to bear the ratifications of the First Consul to our Government; to whom we have advanced fifty louis, and undertaken that his expenses shall be borne. The above sum to that object are credited in his account. The ratifications are addressed to M. Pichon, as is the order for the surrender of the territory. The whole, however, is under our —— to be delivered by Mr. Jay to you, and by you handed over to M. Pichon. The exchange of ratifications in the United States has been very favorable to us.

[TRANSLATION.]

M. Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury, to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

PARIS, 20*th Floreal*, 11*th year*, (9*th April*, 1803.)

GENTLEMEN:

The article of the convention relative to the payment which the United States have to make to France, in three months at most after the ratification of the treaties, and after the taking possession of Louisiana in the name of the United States, determines, in a precise manner, the longest terms agreed upon for the consummation of this affair. They are three months after the ratification and the taking of possession. It is proper to foresee, also, the case in which this business shall not be consummated within the interval above expressed, and as they are precise, it is well understood, that every extraordinary delay beyond the terms fixed places the contracting parties in the same situation as if they had never treated. These consequences of the stipulations agreed upon are just and necessary. It has, nevertheless, appeared useful to recall them to view, in consideration of the great distance which separates the parties who contract, and that no doubt may be raised upon this subject. I have, nevertheless, gentlemen, a sure guarantee that delays will be abridged, as far as circumstances will permit, in the good faith which has presided in this negotiation during its whole continuance; and I know by my own and old experience, that it will be consummated by the Government of the United States according to these same principles.

I pray you to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

BARBE MARBOIS.

[Enclosed in the joint letter of 7th June.]

Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to M. Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury.

PARIS, June 2, 1803.

SIR:

We have received the letter with which you have honored us, dated the 20th Floreal. Without entering into the principles it lays down, we are ready to admit, in order to remove, as far as depends on us, all difficulties, that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty and conventions in the times therein specified; and that any neglect on their part so to do, puts it in the power of the Government of France to declare how far it will, or it will not, be bound thereby, or entitle it to a compensation for the damage it may sustain. We will observe, sir, that, in making these concessions, we mean to confine ourselves to the letter of the treaty.

With the highest respect, &c.

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON,
JAS. MONROE.

* It was not enclosed.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, June 25, 1803.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the —— with the commissions, &c. Before this reaches you, you will have learned that they were unnecessary, as they respected our negotiations. You will find, by looking back to my letters, that I had long anticipated something of this kind, and I was greatly surprised when Mr. Monroe came without it. I, however, in all my conversations, held out the idea very strongly, and you will see it hinted at in my notes, and in my letters to J. B.; so that it doubtless has had a considerable operation in bringing this Government to the resolution they took, before the arrival of Mr. Monroe, to part with Louisiana. You will remember that in one of my letters I request you to set on foot a negotiation with Britain for ascertaining your northwestern boundary, but not to come to a conclusion. Indeed, as I was at that time endeavoring to excite an alarm here that should put us in possession of the country above the Arkansas, I own I have felt very much distressed that I never found any of these suggestions noticed or encouraged by our Government. But presuming always that they ultimately would be, I have carefully concealed my want of powers, and acted as decidedly as if I had possessed them: and to this, as well as to the firm attitude that our Government took, you may attribute the success of our negotiations. I hope that nothing will prevent your immediate ratification, without altering a syllable of the terms. If you wish any thing changed, ratify unconditionally and set on foot a new negotiation. Be persuaded that France is sick of the bargain; that Spain is much dissatisfied; and that the slightest pretence will lose you the treaty. Nothing has raised the reputation of our country in Europe so high as the conduct of our Government upon this occasion both at home and abroad. In pursuance of the wish expressed in your letter, Mr. Monroe proceeds, in a few days, as your resident minister plenipotentiary to England; for though it was doubtful whether this was or was not intended to depend upon the contingency mentioned therein, yet, as you were unrepresented there, and the war rendered some representation necessary, we thought it most conformable to the President's intentions that he should go.

I am, &c.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Livingston.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1803.

SIR:

Since the date of my last, which was May 24, I have received your several letters of April 11, 13, 17, and May 12th. As they relate almost wholly to the subject which was happily terminated on the 30th of April, a particular answer is rendered unnecessary by that event, and by the answer which goes by this conveyance to the joint letter from yourself and Mr. Monroe of the 13th of May. It will only be observed first, that the difference in the diplomatic titles given to Mr. Monroe from that given to you, and which you understood to have ranked him above you, was the result merely of an error in the clerk, who copied the document, and which escaped attention when they were signed. It was not the intention of the President that any distinction of grade should be made between you. Indeed, according to the authority of Vattel, the characters of minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary are precisely of the same grade; although it is said that the usage in France, particularly, does not correspond with this idea. Secondly, that the relation of the First Consul to the Italian republic received the compliment deemed sufficient in the answer to a note of M. Pichon, communicating the flag of that nation. A copy of the communication and of the answer are now enclosed.

The boundaries of Louisiana seem to be so imperfectly understood, and are of so much importance, that the President wishes them to be investigated whenever information is likely to be obtained. You will be pleased to attend particularly to this object as it relates to the Spanish possessions both on the west and on the east side of the Mississippi. The proofs countenancing our claim to a part of West Florida may be of immediate use in the negotiations which are to take place at Madrid. Should Mr. Monroe proceed thither, as is probable, and any such proofs should, after his departure, have come to your knowledge, you will of course have transmitted them to him.

You will find by our Gazettes that your memorial, drawn up about a year ago on the subject of Louisiana, has found its way into public circulation. The passages in it which strike at Great Britain have undergone some comment; and will probably be conveyed to the attention of that Government. The document appears to have been sent from Paris, where you will be able no doubt to trace the indiscretion to its author.

No answer has yet been received either from you or Mr. Monroe to the diplomatic arrangement for London and Paris. The importance of shortening the interval at the former, and preventing one at the latter, makes us anxious on this point. As your late letters have not repeated your intention of returning home this fall, it is hoped that the interesting scenes which have since supervened may reconcile you to a longer stay in Europe.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

The Secretary of State to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

Your despatches, including the treaty and two conventions signed with a French plenipotentiary, on the 30th of April, were safely delivered on the 14th inst. by Mr. Hughes, to whose care you had committed them.

In concurring with the disposition of the French Government to treat for the whole of Louisiana, although the western part of it was not embraced by your powers, you were justified by the solid reasons which you give for it; and I am charged by the President to express to you his entire approbation of your so doing.

This approbation is in no respect precluded by the silence of your commission and instructions. When these were made out, the object of the most sanguine was limited to the establishment of the Mississippi as our boundary. It was not presumed, that more could be sought by the United States, either with a chance of success, or perhaps without being suspected of a greedy ambition, than the island of New Orleans, and the two Floridas; it being little doubted that the latter was, or would be comprehended in the cession from Spain to France. To the acquisition of New Orleans and the Floridas, the provision was, therefore, accommodated. Nor was it to be supposed that in case the French Government should be willing to part with more than the territory on our side of the Mississippi, an arrangement with Spain for restoring to her the territory on the other side, would not be preferred to a sale of it to the United States. It might be added, that the ample views of the subject carried with him by Mr. Monroe, and the confidence felt that your judicious management would make the most of favorable occurrences, lessened the necessity of multiplying provisions for every turn which your negotiations might possibly take.

The effect of such considerations was diminished by no information, or just presumptions whatever. The note of Mr. Livingston, in particular, stating to the French Government the idea of ceding the Western country above the Arkansas, and communicated to this Department in his letter of the 29th January, was not received here till April 5, more than a month after the commission and instructions had been forwarded. And besides, that this project not only left with France the possession and jurisdiction of one bank of the Mississippi from its mouth to the Arkansas, but a part of West Florida, the whole of East Florida, and the harbors for ships of war in the Gulf of Mexico. The letter enclosing the note, intimated that it had been treated by the French Government with a decided neglect. In truth, the communications in general between Mr. Livingston and the French Government, both of prior and subsequent date, manifested a repugnance to our views of purchase, which left no expectation of any arrangement with France, by which an extensive acquisition was to be made, unless in a favorable crisis, of which advantage should be taken. Such was thought to be the crisis which gave birth to the extraordinary commission in which you are joined. It consisted of the state of things produced by the breach of our deposite at New Orleans; the situation of the French islands, particularly the important island of St. Domingo; the distress of the French finances; the unsettled posture of Europe; the increasing jealousy between Great Britain and France; and the known aversion of the former to see the mouth of the Mississippi in the hands of the latter. These considerations, it was hoped, might so far open the eyes of France to her real interest, and her ears to the monitory truths which were conveyed to her through different channels, as to reconcile her to the establishment of the Mississippi as a natural boundary to the United States; or, at least, to some concessions which would justify our patiently waiting for a fuller accomplishment of our wishes, under auspicious events. The crisis relied on has derived peculiar force from the rapidity with which the complaints and questions between France and Great Britain ripened towards a rupture; and it is just ground for mutual and general felicitation that it has issued under your zealous exertions in the extensive acquisition beyond the Mississippi.

With respect to the terms on which the acquisition is made, there can be no doubt that the bargain will be regarded as on the whole highly advantageous. The pecuniary stipulations would have been more satisfactory, if they had departed less from the plan prescribed; and particularly if the two millions of dollars in cash, intended to reduce the price or hasten the delivery of possession, had been so applied, and the assumed payments to American claimants placed on the footing specified in the instructions. The unexpected weight of the draught now to be made on the Treasury will be sensibly felt by it, and may possibly be inconvenient in relation to other important objects.

The President has issued his proclamation convening Congress on the 17th of October, in order that the exchange of the ratifications may be made within the time limited. It is obvious that the exchange, to be within the time, must be made here, and not at Paris; and we infer from your letter of —— that the ratifications of the Chief Consul are to be transmitted hither with that view.

I only add the wish of the President, to know from you the understanding which prevailed in the negotiation with respect to the boundaries of Louisiana; and particularly the pretensions and proofs for carrying it to the river Perdido, or for including any lesser portion of West Florida.

With high respect and consideration, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON and JAMES MONROE, Esqrs.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, July 30, 1803.

SIR:

The house of Hope and Baring will to-morrow lodge with me the amount in bills of the stock they have purchased from the French Government, to be delivered by me according to the terms of their contract. If the treaty is ratified, I believe that this meets with no delay. Be assured that were the business to do again it would never be done. They think we have obtained an immense advantage over them. Though the appearance of war had some influence, it had much less than is ascribed to it. Whenever I mentioned its falling into the hands of England, they admitted the possibility, but insisted that, as it must abide the event of the war, they had no doubt of ultimate success; they would get it back with the British improvements. Mr. Skipwith still thinks that the American debt will fall much within the twenty millions for which we have engaged, and all the fair creditors be fully satisfied; the supposed debt being extremely exaggerated in America. Other nations, creditors of France, have, at present, no prospect of being paid.

I this day got a sight of a letter from the minister to M. Laussat, containing directions for giving up the country, and assigning the reasons for the cession. I was much flattered to find their reasons wholly drawn from the memoirs I had presented; and that the order for the cession was full, and contained no other description of the country than that which had been designated in the treaty of St. Ildefonso: so that I hope you have not failed to insist on West Florida.

I have also this day been favored with a duplicate of yours of the 26th [25th] of May. You observe that the promise I had obtained for payment was still short of justice. This may be true; but, sir, were you here, or indeed in any court in Europe, you would admit that obtaining of any thing that approaches to justice, required some skill and much good fortune. At present, I believe you may purchase millions of just debt of Denmark, Sweden, &c. here at fifty-seven in the pound, and purchase it dear enough; and I think that I may, without vanity, ascribe my obtaining the promise to what are here considered as very delicate measures; and to that promise, a ruling influence in procuring a treaty that I trust will be considered in America (as in Europe) among the most important and advantageous the United States ever made.

I have the honor, &c.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Hon. JAMES MADISON.

Extract of a letter from James Monroe, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary, London, to the Secretary of State, dated

AUGUST 15, 1803.

The enclosed, which I received last night from Paris by an American gentleman, containing important information, is, therefore, transmitted to you.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Fenwick to Mr. Monroe.

PARIS, August 5, 1803.

Since you left this city nothing very material has transpired. I know, however, from a faithful source, that the Spanish Government has made the most serious remonstrances against the cession of Louisiana, and their instructions here are to prevent its being carried into execution, if yet possible; and, if pecuniary arguments could succeed, the hands of their ministers are not tied on that score. This might be a useful hint, if our Senate should not disregard federal examples in modifying treaties, as it is now well understood, that, if any conditional clause of ratification should be introduced by the United States, this Government would profit of the circumstance to annul the whole work.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 6, 1803.

SIR:

My last was of July 29, written a few days before my departure for Virginia, whence I returned, as did the President, ten or twelve days ago. Your letters received since that date are of May 20, June 3, and 25, July 11, 12, and 30th.

In the reply to the communication made by the French Government on the subject of the war, you are charged by the President to express the deep regret felt by the United States at an event so afflicting to humanity. Deploring all the calamities with which it is pregnant, they devoutly wish that the benevolent considerations which pleaded in vain for a continuance of peace, may have their due effect in speedily restoring its blessings. Until this happy change shall take place, the French Government may be assured that the United States will forget none of the obligations which the laws of neutrality impose on them. Faithful to their character, they will pay to every belligerent right the respect which is due to it; but this duty will be performed in the confidence that the rights of the United States will be equally respected. The French Government will do justice to the frankness of this declaration, which is rendered the more proper by the irregularities of which too many examples have been heretofore experienced. The President does not permit himself to doubt that the French Government, consulting equally its own honor and the true interests of France, will guard, by effectual regulations, against every abuse under color of its authority, whether on the high seas or within French or foreign jurisdiction, which might disturb the commerce, or endanger the friendly relations so happily subsisting, and which the United States are so much disposed to cherish, between the two nations.

Your interposition against the arrêt of the 1st Messidor, an 11, was due to the just interests of your fellow citizens. It is to be hoped, that the strong views which you have presented of the subject, will lead the French Government to retract, or remodify, a measure not less unjust to foreigners, than injurious to the interests of France: regulations which, by their suddenness, ensnare those who could not possibly know them, and who meant to observe those naturally supposed to be in force, are, to all intents, retrospective—having the same effect, and violating the same privileges, as laws enacted subsequent to the cases to which they are applied. The necessity of leaving between the date and the operation of commercial regulations an interval sufficient to prevent surprise on distant adventurers, is, in general, too little regarded, and so far there may be room for common complaint; but when great and sudden changes are made, and above all, when legal forfeitures, as well as mercantile losses, are sustained, redress may fairly be claimed by the innocent sufferers. Admitting the public safety, which rarely happens, to require regulations of this sort, and the right of every Government to judge for itself of the occasions, it is still more reasonable that the losses should be repaired than that they should fall on the individuals innocently ensnared.

Your suggestion as to commercial arrangements of a general nature with France, at the present juncture, has received the attention of the President, but he has not decided that any instructions should be given you to institute negotiations for that purpose; especially as it is not known on what particular points, sufficiently advantageous to the United States, the French Government would be likely to enter into stipulations. Some obscurity still hangs on the extra duty exacted by the Batavian Government. The state of our information leaves it doubtful, whether the interests of the United States would be promoted by the change authorized by our treaty with that republic.

Mr. Pinckney will doubtless have communicated to you his conversation with Mr. Cevallos, in which the latter denied the right of France to alienate Louisiana to the United States, alleging a secret stipulation by France not to alienate. Two notes on the same subject have lately been presented here by the Marquis d'Yrujo. In the first, dated September 4, he enters a caveat against the right of France to alienate Louisiana, founding it on a declaration of the French ambassador at Madrid, in July, 1802, that France would never part with that territory; and affirming that on no other condition Spain would have ceded it to France. In the second note, dated September 27, it is urged, as an additional objection to the treaty between the United States and France, that the French Government had never completed the title of France, having failed to procure the stipulated recognition of the King of Etruria from Russia and Great Britain, which was a condition on which Spain agreed to cede the country to France. Copies of these notes of the Spanish minister here, with my answer, as also extracts from Mr. Pinckney's letter to me, and from a note of the Spanish minister at Madrid to him, are also enclosed.

From this proceeding on the part of Spain, as well as by accounts from Paris, it is not doubted, that whatever her views may be, in opposing our acquisition of Louisiana, she is soliciting the concurrence of the French Government. The interest alone which France manifestly has in giving effect to her engagement with the United States, seems to forbid apprehensions that she will listen to any entreaties or temptations which Spain may employ. As to Spain, it can hardly be conceived that she will, unsupported by France, persist in her remonstrances, much less that she will resist the cession to the United States by force.

The objections to the cession, advanced by Spain, are in fact too futile to weigh either with others or with herself. The promise made by the French ambassador, that no alienation should be made, formed no part of the treaty of retrocession to France; and, if it had, could have no effect on the purchase by the United States, which was made in good faith, without notice from Spain of any such condition, and even with sufficient evidence that no such condition existed. The objection drawn from the failure of the French Government to procure from other Powers an acknowledgment of the King of Etruria, is equally groundless. This stipulation was never communicated either to the public or to the United States, and could, therefore, be no bar to the contract made by them. It might be added, that, as the acknowledgment stipulated was, according to the words of the article, to precede possession by the King of Etruria, the overt possession by him was notice to the world that the conditions on which it depended had either been fulfilled or been waived. Finally, no particular Powers, whose acknowledgment was to be procured, are named in the article; and the existence of war between Great Britain and France, at the time of the stipulation, is a proof that the British acknowledgment, the want of which is now alleged as a breach of the treaty, could never have been in its contemplation.

But the conduct of the Spanish Government, both towards the United States and France, is a complete answer to every possible objection to the treaty between them. That Government well knew the wish of the United States to acquire certain territories which it had ceded to France, and that they were in negotiation with France on the subject: yet the slightest hint was never given that France had no right to alienate, or even that an alienation to the United States would be disagreeable to Spain. On the contrary, the minister of His Catholic Majesty, in an official note, bearing date May 4th last, gave information to the minister of the United States at Madrid, that "the entire province of Louisiana, with the limits it had when held by France, was retroceded to that Power, and that the United States might address themselves to the French Government in order to negotiate the acquisition of the territories which would suit their interest." Here is at once a formal and irrevocable recognition of the right as well of France to convey, as of the United States to receive, the territory which is the subject of the treaty between them. More than this cannot be required to silence, forever, the cavils of Spain at the titles of France, now vested in the United States: yet, for more than this, she may be referred to her own measures at New Orleans, preparatory to the delivery of possession to France; to the promulgation, under Spanish authority at that place, that Louisiana was retroceded, and to be delivered to France; and to the orders signed by His Catholic Majesty's own hand, now ready to be presented to the Government of Louisiana, for the delivery of the province to the person duly authorized by France to receive it.

In a word, the Spanish Government has interposed two objections only to the title conveyed to the United States by France. It is said, first, that the title in the United States is not good, because France was bound not to alienate. To this it is answered, that the Spanish Government itself referred the United States to France, as the Power capable, and the only Power capable, of conveying the territory in question. It is said, next, that the title in France herself was not good. To this, if the same answer were less decisive, the orders of the King of Spain for putting France into possession are an answer which admits of no reply.

The President has thought proper that this view of the subject should be transmitted to you; not doubting that you will make the proper use of it with the French Government, nor that that Government will feel the full force of its stipulated obligations to remove whatever difficulties Spain may interpose towards embarrassing a transaction, the complete fulfilment of which is as essential to the honor of France as it is important to the interests of both nations. In the mean time, we shall proceed in the arrangements for taking possession of the country ceded, as soon as possession shall be authorized; and it may be presumed, that the provisions depending on Congress will be sufficient to meet the discontents of Spain, in whatever form they may assume.

The United States have obtained, by just and honorable means, a clear title to a territory too valuable, in itself, and too important to their tranquillity and security, not to be effectually maintained. And they count on every positive concurrence, on the part of the French Government, which the occasion may demand from their friendship and their good faith.

The rightful limits of Louisiana are under investigation. It seems undeniable, from the present state of the evidence, that it extends eastwardly as far, at least, as the river Perdido; and there is little doubt that we shall make good both a western and northern extent highly satisfactory to us.

The considerations which led Mr. Monroe to decline his trip to Madrid, having the same weight with the President, the mission is suspended until other instructions shall be given, or until circumstances shall strongly invite negotiations at Madrid for completing the acquisition desired by the United States.

With great respect,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON, &c. JAMES MADISON.

P. S. October 14.—Since the above was written, I have received a third note from the Marquis d'Yrujo, in reply to my answer to his two preceding. A copy of it is herewith added. It requires no comment beyond what may be applicable in the above observations on his two first notes; being probably intended for little more than a proof of fidelity to his trust, and of a zeal recommending him to the favor of his sovereign.

It having been thought proper to communicate to M. Pichon, the French chargé d'affaires here, the tenor of the notes from the Marquis d'Yrujo, he has presented in a note, just received, a vindication of his Government, and its treaty with the United States, against the objections proceeding from the Spanish Government. A copy of this note is herewith enclosed.

The Marquis de Yrujo to the Secretary of State, dated

PHILADELPHIA, September 4, 1803.

Through the medium of the ambassador of the King my master, in Paris, it has come to His Royal knowledge, that that Government has sold to that of the United States the province of Louisiana which His Majesty had retroceded to the French republic. This information has occasioned to the King my master no small surprise, seeing that the French Government had contracted with His Majesty the most solemn engagement never to alienate the said province. In order to convince the Government of the United States of the nature of these engagements, I take the liberty here to insert a paragraph of a note presented on the 22d July, 1802, by M. de St. Cyr, ambassador of the French republic, at Madrid, to the Secretary of State of His Majesty, as follows:

"His Catholic Majesty has appeared to wish that France should engage not to sell nor alienate, in any manner, the property and the enjoyment of Louisana. Its wish in this respect is perfectly conformable with the intentions of the Spanish Government; and its sole motive for entering therein was because it respected a possession which had constituted a part of the French territory. I am authorized to declare to you in the name of the First Consul that France will never alienate it."

The mere reading of the paragraph which precedes will convince you, as well as the President of the United States, that the sale of Louisiana which France has lately made is a manifest violation of the obligations contracted by her with His Catholic Majesty, and that France wants the powers to alienate the said province without the approbation of Spain, as is seen incontestably in the above recited of the ambassador St. Cyr, authorized by his Government.

The King my master charges me to inform this Government as soon as possible of this important circumstance; and, in compliance with His Royal will, I hasten to acquaint you therewith, in order that it may as soon as possible come to the knowledge of the President of the United States. God preserve you many years.

EL MARQUIS DE CASA YRUJO.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

From the Marquis de Yrujo, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

VICINITY OF PHILADELPHIA, September 27, 1803.

SIR:

On the 4th current I had the honor to intimate to you the extraordinary surprise with which the King my master had heard of the sale of Louisiana, made to the United States in contravention of the most solemn assurances given in writing to His Majesty by the ambassador of the French republic near his person, and with the consent and approbation of the First Consul. The King my master charges me again to remind the American Government, that the said French ambassador entered, in the name of his republic, into the positive engagement that France never would alienate Louisiana, and to observe to it that the sale of this province to the United States is founded in the violation of a promise so absolute that it ought to be respected; a promise, without which the King my master would, in no manner, have dispossessed himself of Louisiana. His Catholic Majesty entertains too good an opinion of the character of probity and good faith which the Government of the United States has known how to obtain so justly for itself, not to hope that it will suspend the ratification and effect of a treaty which rests on such a basis. There are other reasons no less powerful which come to the support of the decorum and respect which nations mutually owe each other. France acquired from the King my master the retrocession of Louisiana under obligations, whose entire fulfilment was absolutely necessary to give her the complete right over the said province; such was that of causing the King of Tuscany to be acknowledged by the Powers of Europe; but, until now, the French Government has not procured this acknowledgment promised and stipulated, either from the court of London or from that of St. Petersburg. Under such circumstances it is evident that the treaty of sale entered into between France and the United States does not give to the latter any right to acquire and claim Louisiana, and that the principles of justice as well as sound policy ought to recommend it to their Government not to meddle with engagements as contrary in reality to her true interest as they would be to good faith, and to their good correspondence with Spain.

Such are the sentiments which the King my master has ordered me to communicate to the President of the United states; and, having done it through you, I conclude, assuring you of my respect and consideration towards your person, and of my wishes that our Lord may preserve your life, &c.

EL MARQUIS DE CASA YRUJO.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

[Enclosed in Mr. Madison's letter of October 6.]

From the Secretary of State to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, dated

OCTOBER 4, 1803.

SIR:

I have duly received your two letters of the 4th and 27th ultimo, and have laid them before the President. The repugnance manifested in these communications, on the part of His Catholic Majesty, to the cession of Louisiana lately made by the French republic to the United States, was as little expected as the objections to the transaction can avail against its solidity.

The United States have given unquestionable proofs to the Spanish Government and nation of their justice, their friendship, and their desire to maintain the best neighborhood; and the President confides too much in the reciprocity of these sentiments so repeatedly and so recently declared on the part of His Catholic Majesty, to have supposed that he would see with dissatisfaction a convenient acquisition by the United States of territories which were no longer to remain with Spain. With respect to the transaction itself, by which the United States have acquired Louisiana, it would be superfluous to say more in justification of its perfect validity than to refer to the official communication made by Mr. Cevallos to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, in a note dated on the 4th of May last. His words are: * "Por la retrocesion hecha á la Francia de la Luisiana, recobró esta Potencia dicha provincia con los limites con que la tubo, y salvos los derechos adquiridos por otras Potencias. La de los Estados Unidos podra dirigirse al Gobierno Francés para negociar la adquisicion de territorios que convengan á su interes." Here is an explicit and positive recognition of the right of the United States and France to enter into the transaction which has taken place.

To these observations, which I have been charged by the President to make to you, I have only to add, sir, that his high respect for His Catholic Majesty, and his desire to cherish and strengthen the friendly sentiments happily subsisting between the two nations, will induce him to cause such explanations and representations to be made through the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid as cannot fail to reconcile His Catholic Majesty to an event so essentially connected with the respect which the United States owe to their character and their interest.

Be pleased, sir, to accept assurances of the high respect and consideration with which I have the honor to be, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Marquis d'Yrujo to the Secretary of State.

BALTIMORE, October 12, 1803.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 4th current in reply to those which I had the honor to write you on the 4th and 27th of last month; and as, without entering into the examination of the powerful reasons which, in the name of the King my master, I unfolded therein, against the sale of Louisiana, you refer generally to the expediency which, as you inform me, the minister of the United States near His Majesty is to make at Madrid. I shall at present confine my observations to that which you are pleased to make to me, founded upon certain expressions which you cite to me from an official letter of the Secretary of State, of the King my master, to the above mentioned American minister in Spain. The expressions are the following:

"By the retrocession made to France of Louisiana, this Power has recovered the said province, with the limits which it had, and saving the rights acquired by other Powers. The United States can address themselves to the French Government to negotiate the acquisition of territory which may suit their interest."

These expressions, which you consider as an explicit and positive acknowledgment of the right of the United States and France to enter into the engagements which they afterwards did, do not, in my opinion, weaken in any manner the foundation and the force of the representations which I have had the honor to make to you against the sale of Louisiana.

There is an expression, among those you cite, which will suffice to refute the inference you draw from them, and it is that of saving the rights acquired by other Powers. Although the general form of this expression gives, in other respects, much latitude to its true meaning, it is indubitable that Spain having made the retrocession of Louisiana to France, under certain conditions and modifications, Spain has the indubitable right to claim their execution. Of this nature was the stipulation, that France should not sell nor alienate Louisiana in any manner whatever, and likewise the solemn and positive accession and declaration of the French Government adhering to the wishes of Spain; consequently this expression destroys the possibility that, according to existing circumstances, the French Government should possess the right of selling the said province, or that of the United States that of buying it.

There is another consideration still stronger, and which is not at all subject to the interpretation of equivocal expressions. It is evident that the engagement entered into by France with Spain not to alienate Louisiana in any manner, is much older in date than the official letter of Mr. Cevallos, whose expressions you are pleased to cite to me. In that letter those which you have scored, that the United States can address themselves to the French Government to negotiate the acquisition of the territory which may suit their interest, neither signify nor can signify any thing but a deference towards France, whose Government alone is now concerned to give a decisive answer to the requests of the United States, an answer analogous and conformable to the nature of the previous engagements which had been entered into with Spain. The repugnance of the Spanish Government may likewise be recognised to give to that of the United States a necessary negative at a time when it found itself united with them by bands of the most sincere friendship.

Other interpretations of equal force may be derived from the obvious meaning of the expressions of the official letter of the Secretary of State of His Majesty mentioned by you; but as those which I have just made are, in my opinion, conclusive, I abstain from entering upon others in detail, and I take the liberty to call to them the attention, as well of yourself, as of the President of the United States, in order that you may be more and more convinced of the reason and justice with which the King my master objects to the ratification of a treaty founded upon a manifest violation of the most solemn engagements entered into by France.

I avail myself, with pleasure, of this occasion to reiterate to you my wishes to serve you, and that our Lord would preserve your life, &c.

EL MARQUIS DE CASA YRUJO.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 12, 1803.

Since my last, of July 29th, I have received your several letters of April 12th and 20th, May 2d, and 4th, June 12th, and July 18th.

Mr. Monroe has already informed you of his having proceeded to London, and of his intention not to repair to Madrid for the present. He will have since received instructions, given on a contrary supposition; but it is probable he will wait where he is for the determination of the President, on the reasons which kept him from proceeding to Madrid. I have just informed him that the President approves the course he has taken, so that he is not to be expected to join you at Madrid, until he shall be so instructed, or until a change of circumstances shall, in his view, clearly invite him to do so. My last letter to you, having provided for the case of Mr. Monroe's postponing this trip, I need not repeat the instructions and observations then made to you. I shall only add that it is more proper now than ever that you should not be in haste, without the concurrence of your colleague, to revive the negotiation jointly committed to you.

* TRANSLATION.—"By the retrocession made to France of Louisiana, this Power has recovered the said province with the limits which it had, and saving the rights acquired by other Powers. The United States can address themselves to the French Government to negotiate the acquisition of territories which may suit their interest."

Among the reasons which weighed with the President, as well as with Mr. Monroe, against attempting, at present, to procure from the Spanish Government the residuum of territory desired by the United States, is the ill humor shown by that Government at the acquisition already made by them from France; and of which the language held to you by Mr. Cevallos, as communicated in your letter of ———, is a sufficient proof. A still fuller proof of the same fact is contained in three letters lately received from the Spanish minister here; copies of which, with my answer to the two first, are herewith enclosed. I enclose also a copy of a letter written on the occasion to Mr. Livingston, which was rendered more proper by the probability, as well as by information from Paris, that efforts would be used by Spain to draw the French Government into her views of frustrating the cession of Louisiana to the United States.

In these documents you will find the remarks by which the objections made by the Spanish Government to the treaty of cession between the United States and France are to be combated. The President thinks it proper that they should, without delay, be conveyed to the Spanish Government, either by a note from you or in conversation, as you may deem most expedient; and in a form and style best uniting the advantages of making that Government sensible of the absolute determination of the United States to maintain their right, with the propriety of avoiding undignified menace and unnecessary irritation.

The conduct of Spain, on this occasion, is such as was, in several views, little to be expected, and as is not readily explained. If her object be to extort Louisiana from France, as well as to prevent its transfer to the United States, it would seem that she must be emboldened by an understanding with some other very powerful quarter of Europe. If she hopes to prevail on France to break her engagement to the United States, and voluntarily restore Louisiana to herself, why has she so absurdly blended with the project the offensive communication of the perfidy which she charges on the First Consul? If it be her aim to prevent the execution of the treaty between the United States and France, in order to have for her neighbor the latter instead of the United States, it is not difficult to show that she mistakes the lesser for the greater danger against which she wishes to provide. Admitting, as she may possibly suppose, that Louisiana, as a French colony, would be less able, as well as less disposed, than the United States, to encroach on her southern possessions, and that it would be too much occupied with its own safety against the United States to turn its force on the other side against her possessions, still it is obvious, in the first place, that in proportion to the want of power in the French colony would be safe for Spain, compared with the power of the United States, the colony would be insufficient as a barrier against the United States; and, in the next place, that the very security which she provides would itself be a source of the greatest of all dangers she has to apprehend. The collisions between the United States and the French would lead to a contest, in which Great Britain would naturally join the former, and in which Spain would, of course, be on the side of the latter; and what becomes of Louisiana and the Spanish possessions beyond it, in a contest between Powers so marshalled? An easy and certain victim to the fleets of Great Britain and the land armies of this country. A combination of these forces was always, and justly, dreaded by both Spain and France. It was the danger which led both into our revolutionary war, and much inconsistency and weakness is chargeable on the projects of either which tend to re-unite, for the purposes of war, the power which has been divided. France, returning to her original policy, has wisely, by her late treaty with the United States, obviated a danger which could not have been very remote. Spain will be equally wise in following the example; and, by acquiescing in an arrangement which guards against an early danger of controversy between the United States, first with France, then with herself, and removes to a distant day the approximation of the American and Spanish settlements, provides in the best possible manner for the security of the latter, and for a lasting harmony with the United States. What is it that Spain dreads? She dreads, it is presumed, the growing power of this country, and the direction of it against her possessions within its reach. Can she annihilate this power? No. Can she sensibly retard its growth? No. Does not common prudence, then, advise her to conciliate, by every proof of friendship and confidence, the good will of a nation whose power is formidable to her; instead of yielding to the impulses of jealousy, and adopting obnoxious precautions which can have no other effect than to bring on, prematurely, the whole weight of the calamity which she fears? Reflections such as these may, perhaps, enter with some advantage into your communications with the Spanish Government; and, as far as they may be invited by favorable occasions, you will make that use of them.

Perhaps, after all this interposition of Spain, it may be intended merely to embarrass a measure which she does not hope to defeat, in order to obtain from France, or the United States, or both, concessions of some sort or other as the price of her acquiescence. As yet no indication is given that a resistance, by force, to the execution of the treaty is prepared or meditated. And if it should, the provisions depending on Congress, whose session will commence in two days, will, it may be presumed, be effectually adapted to such an event.

With sentiments, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.

[TRANSLATION.]

M. Pichon to the Secretary of State, dated

GEORGETOWN, 21 Vendemiaire, 12*th year*, (October 14, 1803.)

The undersigned, to whom the Secretary of State has been pleased to communicate the proceedings of the minister of His Catholic Majesty to the United States, in relation to the treaty by which the French Republic has ceded Louisiana to the United States, thinks that he owes it to his own Government as well as to the American Government, to present to Mr. Madison the observations of which those proceedings, as far as they attack the rights and even the dignity of the French Government, have appeared to him susceptible.

The court of Madrid, according to the notes of its minister, considers the cession made by France to the United States as irregular and invalid: 1st. Because France had renounced the right of alienating the territories in question: 2d. Because the treay of St. Ildefonso, by which Spain retroceded those territories to France, has not been fully executed with respect to the acknowledgment of the King of Etruria, an acknowledgment which was one of the conditions of the retrocession to be fulfilled by France.

On the first point, the undersigned will observe, that the treaty of St. Ildefonso retrocedes Louisiana in full sovereignty, and without any limitation as to the future domain of France. To operate a limitation so essential as is that to which the court of Madrid appeals, nothing less would have been necessary, according to the nature of contracts in general and of treaties in particular, than a stipulation to this effect inserted in the treaty itself. A promise made fifteen months after the signature of this pact, and which might, on one side, have been yielded to the solicitations of one of the contracting parties, and, on the other, dictated by dispositions which might then exist in the other party, but which ulterior circumstances might have changed; such a promise cannot create in favor of Spain a right sufficient to enable her to charge with invalidity the transactions which have contravened it. The contrary pretension would certainly confound all the principles relative to the nature of obligations, and would destroy the solemnity of treaties. These general reasonings would receive a new force from the circumstances which are peculiar to different nations in relation to the subject of pacts; but the undersigned will not enter into the examination of these circumstances, under the persuasion that general principles sufficiently repel the pretensions of the court of Madrid.

On the second point, the objections of that court do not appear to the undersigned to be better founded. It is known that the King of Etruria was placed on the throne since the treaty of St. Ildefonso. We have a right to suppose that His Catholic Majesty was satisfied from that period with the measures and efforts employed by France, to cause the title of this Prince to be acknowledged by the other nations. It is at least what might be concluded from facts within the knowledge of all the world. In the treaty of Amiens, concluded on the 27th of March, 1802, Great Britain did not acknowledge the King of Etruria. Notwithstanding the silence of the court of London, on so solemn an occasion, that of Madrid ordered, in the month of October following, the delivery of the colony to France, as is proved by the Royal cedula, which the undersigned has received and exhibited to Mr. Madison; a cedula, which, as all the world knows, was long ago forwarded to the Captain General of Louisiana, who sent the Marquis of Casa Calvo to New Orleans, to superintend its execution.

To these conclusive observations, the undersigned will add, that the court of Madrid might have been informed in the course of the month of February last, by its minister to the United States, that the American Government was sending to Paris a minister extraordinary, in order to negotiate with the French Government the acquisition of New Orleans. If the court of Madrid had seen, in the object of this mission, an injury offered to its rights, what prevented it, after being thus early apprised, from informing thereof the minister of the United States at Paris, and the French Government, and from interposing, before the conclusion of the treaty, its intervention in a form adapted to suspend it? It does not appear that that court has taken, at Paris, any steps of this nature. To suppose it, would be inconsistent with the instructions which the undersigned has received from his Government, to accelerate as much as is in his power the execution of the treaty concluded on the 30th of April last, between the French republic and the United States.

The undersigned therefore hopes, that the American Government will not see in the proceedings of the court of Madrid, in order to obstruct the execution of this treaty, any thing but specious reasonings, and will proceed to its execution with the same earnestness which the French Government has employed on its part. The undersigned has received the necessary orders to exchange the ratifications, and to effect the taking of possession of Louisiana by France, and its transfer to the United States. He does not presume that the court of Madrid would wish to oppose the execution of the first orders. This supposition would be as contrary to its loyalty as to the dignity of the French Government. In any event, as soon as the ratifications are exchanged, the undersigned will proceed without delay, in concert with the commissary appointed for that purpose by the First Consul, to the delivery of the colony to the persons whom the President of the United States shall appoint to take possession of it.

The undersigned has the honor to request Mr. Madison to submit to the President of the United States the contents of this note, which is intended to prevent the imputations cast by the minister of Spain against the French Government, from remaining without reply. The undersigned prays, at the same time, Mr. Madison to receive the assurance of his respect and of his high consideration.

L. A. PICHON.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to James Monroe.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 24, 1803.

I have received from you letters of the following dates, written after your arrival in London, viz. the 19th, 20th, and 26th of July, and the 11th and 15th of August.

I have the pleasure to inform you that the treaty for Louisiana has been ratified in form, and is now before both Houses for the legislative provisions necessary with respect to the stock, to taking possession, and to governing the country. There is no doubt that they will be made by very large majorities.

It will be agreeable to you to know that the ratifications were exchanged by M. Pichon and myself, unshackled by any condition or modification whatever. The note from me to him, with his reply, of which copies are enclosed, will show the turn and issue of our consultations on that point.

The information from Paris, enclosed in your letter of the 15th of August, had been previously received here from the same source, and was followed by full proof of the discontent of Spain at the transfer of Louisiana to the United States, in a formal protest against it from the Spanish minister here, in pursuance of orders from his Government. You will find herewith copies of his correspondence with this Department, and of my letters to Mr. Livingston and Mr. Pinckney, and of M. Pichon's to me, on this subject; all of which were included in the communications to the Senate. These documents will put you in possession of all that has passed, as well as of the present posture of the business. It remains to be seen how far Spain will persist in her remonstrances, and how far she will add to them resistance by force. Should the latter course be taken, it can lead to nothing but a substitution of a forcible for a peaceable possession. Having now a clear and honest title, acquired in a mode pointed out by Spain herself, it will, without doubt, be maintained with a decision becoming our national character, and required by the importance of the object.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE, Esq. &c. &c.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 9, 1803.

In my letter of the 22d ultimo, I mentioned to you that the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty and conventions with France had taken place here, unclogged with any condition or reserve. Congress have since passed an act to enable the President to take possession of the ceded territory, and to establish a temporary Government therein. Other acts have been passed for complying with the pecuniary stipulations of those instruments. The newspapers enclosed will inform you of these proceedings.

By the post which left this city for Natchez on Monday last, a joint and several commission was forwarded to Governor Claiborne and General Wilkinson, authorizing them to receive possession of and occupy those territories, and a separate commission to the former as temporary Governor. The possibility suggested, by recent circumstances, that delivery may be refused at New Orleans on the part of Spain, required that provision should be made as well for taking as receiving possession. Should force be necessary, Governor Claiborne and General Wilkinson will have to decide on the practicability of a coup de main, without waiting for the reinforcements, which will require time on our part, and admit of preparations on the other. The force provided for this object is to consist of the regular troops near at hand, as many of the militia as may be requisite, and can be drawn from the Mississippi territory, and as many volunteers from any quarter as can be picked up. To them will be added five hundred mounted militia from Tennessee, who, it is expected, will proceed to Natchez with the least possible delay.

M. Pichon has, in the strongest manner, pressed on M. Laussat, the French commissary appointed to deliver possession, the necessity of co-operating in these measures of compulsion, should they prove necessary by the refusal of the Spanish officers to comply without them.

On the 8th of October it was not known, and no indications had been exhibited at New Orleans, of a design, on the part of Spain, to refuse or oppose the surrender of the province to France, and thereby to us.

With high respect and consideration, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, Esq.

P. S.—The President approves of the individuals appointed as commissioners to liquidate the claims payable under the convention of the 30th of April last. But as it now appears that difficulties have arisen, and are likely to increase, respecting the true construction of that instrument, and especially as it seems more than possible that the twenty millions allotted for the payments to be made under it may be insufficient to cover all which, in equity, and by a sound interpretation, ought to be included, it is the desire of the President that you apply to the French Government for its consent to suspend the issuing of any drafts upon the awards which may be given, until it is ascertained whether the twenty millions be sufficient or not, and with a view to give time for such mutual explanations and arrangements, as may tend to effectuate the true spirit and object of the convention. In taking this step, you will refer yourself to the further communications you are to expect from your Government upon the subject; the application you may make upon it to that of France being intended only as a preliminary to a further development.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

SIR: PARIS, November 15, 1803.

I have only within these few days been honored by your letter to me of the 29th July, by way of Hamburgh, together with one of the same date to Mr. Monroe, which I have sent to him by Mr. ——, an American gentleman, by the way of Holland; none more direct offering here, as the intercourse is very strictly forbidden. I shall make the communication you direct, of Mr. Pichon's note, and your reply, relative to the flag of the Italian republic. It appears to me, however, that this notice rather recommends than supersedes the propriety of a direct recognition of the First Consul, and the compliment of a commission, upon the principle I have mentioned; but of this the President is the best judge. The letters you have received since the date of yours, you will find have anticipated your direction relative to information on the subject of West Florida, since they refer to documents and historic facts that it will be easy to adduce. As I presume you will have no trouble on this ground, I do not think it necessary to put you to the expense of procuring original papers. Should it happen otherwise, I shall obey your orders; and if any negotiation is necessary at Madrid, I shall transmit to Mr. Pinckney all the proofs I can collect; and I think they will be too numerous to admit of doubt, especially taken in connexion with the letter of the Spanish minister to Mr. Pinckney, of which a copy has been transmitted to you. The moment is so favorable for taking possession of that country, that I hope it has not been neglected, even though a little force should be necessary to effect it. Your minister must find the means to justify it.

I have seen, as you mention, a publication of my memoir on the subject of Louisiana. But, as it is not an official paper, as it is not signed or delivered in my public character, I do not see that it can ever be noticed on this side of the water as such; besides that, there is nothing in it relative to Britain that has not been told them officially by our Government and by almost every maritime power in Europe, on the subject of their vexations at sea. Nor can they blame any endeavor of mine to effect the objects of my country, by such arguments as I thought would have weight here. It could hardly be expected that this paper could be secret: since, as I informed you at the time, I had delivered printed copies of it, not only to the First and other Consuls, and to the French ministers, but to most of those persons who I believed would be consulted upon the occasion. A few were also sent to America, with injunctions, however, not to publish them. I am very sorry a bad translation of it has found its way into the papers, though it may serve, in some measure, to justify the President's appointment of me, by showing that I had not been inattentive to the great interests of my country. The zeal of our friends often carries them too far. Some of them, finding that Mr. Monroe was appointed (through circumstances which you have done me the honor to explain, but which they could not know) with a higher grade than myself; seeing him only mentioned in the newspapers, as the acting minister; and finding some endeavor here to impress a belief that he was the principal agent in treating with France; it was natural that they should feel some mortification, and endeavor to do me the justice they know I was entitled to. This may apologise for, I mean not by it to justify, their imprudence. There is another on the part of Mr. Monroe's friends, which I should not mention but that it carries with it a circumstance for which I may be under the necessity of apologising to the President, should my private letter to Mr. Monroe have reached the United States: since it argues a difference of sentiment upon an important point, which I fear will be laid hold of by our common enemies. I have in my former letter informed you of M. Talleyrand's calling upon me previous to the arrival of Mr. Monroe, for a proposition for the whole of Louisiana; of his afterwards trifling with me, and telling me that what he had said was unauthorized. This circumstance, for which I have accounted to you in one of my letters, led me to think, though it afterwards appeared without reason, that some change had taken place in the determination which I knew the Consul had before taken to sell. I had just then received a line from Mr. Monroe, informing me of his arrival. I wrote to him a hasty answer, under the influence of ideas, excited by these prevarications of the minister, expressing the hope that he had brought information that New Orleans was in our possession: that I hoped our negotiation might be successful; but that, while I feared nothing but war would avail us any thing, I had paved the way for him. This letter is very imprudently shown and spoken of by Mr. Monroe's particular friends, as a proof that he had been the principal agent in the negotiation. So far, indeed, as it may tend to this object, it is of little moment; because facts and dates are too well known to be contradicted. For instance, it is known to every body here that the Consul had taken his resolution to sell previous to Mr. Monroe's arrival. It is a fact well known that M. Marbois was authorized, informally, by the First Consul, to treat with me before Mr. Monroe reached Paris: that he actually made me the very proposition we ultimately agreed to, before Mr. Monroe had seen a minister, except M. Marbois, for a moment, at my house, where he came to make the proposition: Mr. Monroe not having been presented to M. Talleyrand, to whom I introduced him the afternoon of the next day. All, then, that remained to negotiate, after his arrival, was a diminution of the price; and in this our joint mission was unfortunate; for we came up, as soon as Mr. Monroe's illness would suffer him to do business, after a few days d[illegible] to the minister's offers. There is no doubt that Mr. Monroe's talents and address would have enabled him, h[illegible]e been placed in my circumstances, to have effected what I have done. But he unfortunately came too late to do more than assent to the propositions that were made us, and to aid in reducing them to form. I think he has too much candor not to be displeased that his friends should publicly endeavor to depreciate me by speaking of a private letter, hastily written, under circumstances of irritation with which Mr. Monroe is fully acquainted; a letter, too, which may contribute in two ways to advance the views of the enemies of the administration. It is in this light only that it gives me pain. First, it shows that it was my sentiment, founded upon the knowledge I must have been supposed to possess of the temper of this court, and the state of things here, that we should have availed ourselves of the circumstance of the denial of the right of depôt to possess New Orleans. That this was my sentiment, I confess: and you have found, by my notes, that I labored to impress this Government with a belief that it would be done. And I have every reason to think that the treaty would have been concluded in March, had not M. Pichon's letter, at the moment, contradicted my suggestion on this subject. As the President's views have been happily more correct than mine; as he has effected, without this harsh measure, his great object; it certainly is not advisable to publish that we differed in sentiment; and introduce discussions on the comparative advantages that might be derived from the one or the other mode of proceeding. The next point in which the letter may do harm, is in authorizing an opinion, which the enemies of the administration are most zealous in promoting, viz. that no credit is due either to the President or his ministers, since the war only produced the measure. The war, doubtless, had its effect upon the First Consul: but it is equally true that every person he consulted had long before been convinced, and even the Consul's opinion shaken, and I will venture to say by my means, of the little advantage France would derive from the possession of that country; and he had even, as I have before informed you, through Joseph Bonaparte, given me assurances that such arrangements should be made as we should approve. The not selling was a sort of personal point of honor, particularly as he was bound by the express stipulation of his treaty with Spain not to do so. Nor, until he found himself hampered by another personal consideration, to wit: his promise to pay the American claims, which I had purposely published, could he bring himself to take the step which the prospect of war and the spirited measures of our Government, among which I number the special mission of Mr. Monroe, gave him the strongest apology for doing; particularly as, in case of war, he had no other means of keeping his word with us. Thus, sir, you see that it is very difficult for the most prudent man to restrain the ill judged zeal of his friends; and I dare say that Mr. Monroe will as sincerely lament that of his friends, who, indeed, ought not to have seen a mere private letter, as I do that of the gentleman that I suspect to have occasioned the publication which you justly blame.

Having had the goodness, sir, to correct one of the errors of the clerk that gave me some cause of complaint, I must notice another which added to my doubts of success at the moment I wrote to Mr. Monroe. In the copy of our joint instructions which you had forwarded to me, the ultimatum that we were limited to was thirty millions, out of which the American claims were to be paid. Now, I was satisfied, that, if Mr. Monroe, on his arrival, should adhere to this, our prospect of success was not very great; since ten millions, in cash, to the Government was an object of but little moment. More might have been got from Spain by a transfer. On looking over, however, the original instructions, of which Mr. Monroe was the bearer, I found that we were authorized to give fifty millions for New Orleans and the Floridas: so that we could, without, too, an extraordinary assumption of powers, go to the price they expected for Louisiana.

I have applied to M. Talleyrand on the subject of East Florida, thinking the moment favorable for making the acquisition. I have endeavored to alarm him and Spain about the danger that will result to Spain and France if England takes possession of the ports on the Gulf; and I have obtained from him a positive promise that this Government shall aid any negotiation that may be set on foot for its purchase. I have written on this subject to Mr. Pinckney, and advised him to open his negotiation by reiterating this argument, and by making some offer of payment in American stocks. I shall inform Mr. Monroe of these circumstances, and will forward for him any instructions he may choose to send to Mr. Pinckney.

I am, &c.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 31, 1804.

SIR:

The two last letters received from you bear date on the —— and 30th September; so that we have been now four months without hearing from you. The last from me to you was dated on the 16th day of January, giving you information of the transfer of Louisiana, on the 20th of December, by the French commissioner, M. Laussat, to Governor Claiborne and General Wilkinson, the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to receive it. The letters subsequent to that date from Governor Claiborne, who is charged with the present administration of the ceded territory, show that the occupancy by our troops of the military posts on the island of New Orleans, and on the western side of the Mississppi, was in progression; and that the state of things, in other respects, was such as was to be expected from the predisposition of the bulk of the inhabitants, and the manifest advantages to which they have become entitled as citizens of the United States. A bill providing for the government of the territory has been some time under the deliberation of the Senate, but has not yet passed to the other branch of the Legislature. The enclosed copy shows the form in which it was introduced. Some alterations have already been made, and others may be presumed. The precise form in which it will pass cannot, therefore, be foreknown; and the less so as the peculiarities and difficulties of the case give rise to more than the ordinary differences of opinion. It is pretty certain that the provisions generally contemplated will leave the people of that district, for a while, without the organization of power dictated by the republican theory; but it is evident that a sudden transition to a condition so much in contrast with that in which their ideas and habits have been formed, would be as unacceptable and as little beneficial to them as it would be difficult for the Government of the United States. It may fairly be expected that every blessing of liberty will be extended to them as fast as they shall be prepared and disposed to receive it. In the mean time, the mild spirit in which the powers derived from the Government of the United States will, under its superintendence, be administered, the parental interest which it takes in the happiness of those adopted into the general family, and a scrupulous regard to the tenor and spirit of the treaty of cession, promise a continuance of that satisfaction among the people of Louisiana which has thus far shown itself. These observations are made that you may be the better enabled to give to the French Government the explanations and assurances due to its solicitude in behalf of a people whose destiny it has committed to the justice, the honor, and the policy of the United States.

It does not appear that, in the delivery of the province by the Spanish authorities to M. Laussat, any thing passed denoting its limits, either to the east, the west, or the north; nor was any step taken by M. Laussat, either whilst the province was in his hands, or at the time of his transferring it to ours, calculated to dispossess Spain of any part of the territory east of the Mississippi. On the contrary, in a private conference, he stated positively that no part of the Floridas was included in the eastern boundary; France having strenuously insisted to have it extended to the Mobile, which was peremptorily refused by Spain.

We learn, from Mr. Pinckney, that the Spanish Government holds the same language to him. To the declaration of M. Laussat, however, we can oppose that of the French minister, made to you, that Louisiana extended to the river Perdido; and to the Spanish Government, as well as to that of France, we can oppose the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and of September 30, 1803, interpreted by facts and fair inferences. The question with Spain will enter into the proceedings of Mr. Monroe, on his arrival at Madrid, whither he will be instructed to repair as soon as he shall have executed at London the instructions lately transmitted to him in relation to the impressment of seamen from American vessels, and several other points which call for just and stipulated arrangements between the two countries. As the question relates to the French Government, the President relies on your prudence and attention for availing yourself of the admission, by M. Marbois, that Louisiana extended to the river Perdido, and for keeping the weight of that Government in our scale against that of Spain. With respect to the western extent of Louisiana, M. Laussat held a language more satisfactory. He considered the Rio Bravo, or Del Norte, as far as the 30th degree of north latitude, as its true boundary on that side. The northern boundary, we have reason to believe, was settled between France and Great Britain by commissioners appointed under the treaty of Utrecht, who separated the British and French territories west of the Lake of the Woods by the 49th degree of latitude. In support of our just claims in all these cases, it is proper that no time should be lost in collecting the best proofs which can be obtained. This important object has already been recommended generally to your attention. It is particularly desirable that you should procure an authenticated copy of the commercial charter granted by Louis XIV. to Crozat, in 1712, which gives an outline to Louisiana favorable to our claims, at the same time that it is an evidence of the highest and most unexceptionable authority. A copy of this charter is annexed to the English translation of Joutel's journal of La Salle's last voyage, the French original not containing it. A record of the charter doubtless exists in the archives of the French Government; and it may be expected that an attested copy will not be refused to you. It is not improbable that the charter, or other documents relating to the Mississippi project, a few years after, may afford some light, and be attainable from the same source. The proceedings of the commissioners under the treaty of Utrecht will merit particular research, as they promise not only a favorable northern boundary, but as they will decide an important question involved in a convention of limits now depending between the United States and Great Britain. To these may be added whatever other documents may occur to your recollection or research, including maps, &c. If the secret treaty of Paris, in 1762-3, between France and Spain, and an entire copy of that of St. Ildefonso, in 1800, can be obtained, they may also be useful. An authentication of the precise date, at least, of the former is very important. You will be sensible of the propriety of putting Mr. Monroe in possession of all the proofs and information which you may obtain. Should he take Paris in his way to Madrid, you will have the best of opportunities for the purpose.

In my letter of the 9th of November last I communicated the ideas entertained by the President, with respect to the pecuniary provision in the last convention with France in behalf of our citizens. It is presumed that you will have found no difficulty in obtaining the concurrence of the French Government in suspending drafts in favor of any until the claims of all shall have been ascertained. Should the sum of three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars be insufficient for the payment of all, as becomes daily more probable, the least that ought to be attempted will be an apportionment of it among them. Perhaps more than this may now be attended with great difficulty; although it is clear that the patronage of the Government of the United States is due, on prior considerations, more to some classes of the claimants than to others; to those, for example, whose property was wrongfully taken on the high seas by force, than to those who, by voluntary contracts, placed a confidence in the French Government, which was disappointed. It seems requisite, nevertheless, that some effort should be made in behalf of those whose claims were embraced by the convention of September 30th, 1800, and not provided for by that of April 30th, 1803.

With this view, the President thinks it proper that you should adjust with the French Government a provision for comprehending in the convention of 1803 the claims still remaining under the convention of 1800; and for apportioning the money payable at the treasury of the United States among the claimants under both; or, as the object next to be pursued, a provision for apportioning among the whole, the money so payable, and also the balance chargeable on France, according to the tenor of the last convention. Or, as the object next in order, a provision for apportioning, among the whole, the money payable at the treasury of the United States, leaving to the claimants under the last convention the balance from France to which it entitles them; or, lastly, a provision for apportioning among the claimants under the last convention the money so payable, instead of paying it in the order of settlement, or according to any other rule of preference.

The first arrangement takes for granted that France considers herself bound, notwithstanding the last convention, to satisfy all the claims provided for by the first convention, pretermitted by the last. The supposition is founded on several expressions and implications of its text, as the head of the fifth article, "all agreements," &c. and particularly in the closing words of article tenth; and, with respect to debts, the provision is express in article twelve. This construction is the more reasonable also, inasmuch as the reciprocal stipulations of the convention of 1800, in this particular, were carried into immediate and full effect on the part of the United States; and as a contrary construction would imply the relinquishment, without equivalent, of vested rights never formally contested by France.

Should France, however, be unlikely to admit her responsibility for the pretermitted claims, and there be danger that, by urging her responsibility at this time, an equitable modification of any sort may be rendered more difficult, it will be best to pass over the question for the present, taking care that no waiver be made which may either still further weaken the claims against France, or give color for turning them over against the United States.

Neither of the succeeding alternatives will increase the balance payable by France, nor is it contemplated that in these or any other modifications whatever, the treasury of the United States is to be made chargeable with more than three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; or rather, with more than so much of that sum as would satisfy the debts to which it is subjected by the last convention.

The object of each of the proposed modifications is to distribute whatever is to be paid by the United States and by France among all the claimants, as well those omitted as those included in the last convention; and in such a manner that every claimant of both descriptions shall receive a fair proportion from the treasury of the United States, as well of the balance to be paid by France.

The claimants who were provided for in the last convention cannot justly complain of any arrangement that will replace on the same footing with themselves their fellow claimants left by the last, under the first convention, as being a retrospective measure working a disadvantage to them. The retrospective proceeding will be found to lie in the last convention, so far as it is disadvantageous in its operation, to those claiming under the first only. An act superseding a retrospective act is not itself retrospective. The effect of it is to restore and enforce the original rule of justice.

Should the French Government refuse to concur in any proposition that will restore the latitude given to claims as defined by the first convention, and which is narrowed and obscured by the text of the last, it will be proper to settle with the Government, if it can be done, such a construction of this text as will be most favorable to all just claims, particularly those for freights, indemnities, property put in requisition, and the separate property of individuals who are concerned in the disqualifying partnerships mentioned in the convention, which are said to be threatened with rejection by the Board at Paris. It is to be kept in view, however, that in case the whole sum of three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars should not be absorbed by the construction of the Board, the construction settled with the French Government is not to enlarge the sum to be paid by the treasury of the United States beyond that to which the treasury would be made liable by the construction of the Board.

It will occur to you that, in case the field of claims should be enlarged, the time for presenting and settling them ought to be lengthened. You can yourself best decide how far a prolongation of the time necessary for the claims now admissible before the Board may be necessary, and ought to be attempted.

There is reason to believe that not a few of this description are yet to be forwarded from this side the Atlantic.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, ESQ.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 31, 1804.

SIR,

Since my acknowledgment of yours of October 20 and 31, I have received those of 2d, 15th, and 23d November and 11th December.

In mine of January 31, I informed you that Louisiana had been transferred by the French commissioner to our commissioners on the 20th of December; that nothing had officially passed on the occasion concerning the boundaries of the ceded territory; but that M. Laussat had confidentially signified that it did not comprehend any part of West Florida; adding, at the same time, that it extended westwardly to the Rio Bravo, otherwise called Rio del Norte. Orders were accordingly obtained from the Spanish authority for the delivery of all the posts on the west side of the Mississippi, as well as on the island of New Orleans. With respect to the posts in West Florida, orders for the delivery were neither offered to, nor demanded by, our commissioners. No instructions have, in fact, been ever given them to make the demand. This silence on the part of the Executive was deemed eligible; first, because it was foreseen that the demand would not only be rejected by the Spanish authority at New Orleans, which had, in an official publication, limited the cession westwardly by the Mississippi and the island of New Orleans, but it was apprehended, as has turned out, that the French commissioner might not be ready to support the demand, and might even be disposed to second the Spanish opposition to it; secondly, because, in the latter of these cases, a serious check would be given to our title; and, in either of them, a premature dilemma would result between an overt submission to the refusal, and a resort to force; thirdly, because mere silence would be no bar to a plea at any time that a delivery of a part, particularly of the seat of Government, was a virtual delivery of the whole; whilst, in the mean time, we could ascertain the views, and claim the interposition of the French Government, and avail ourselves of that and any other favorable circumstances for effecting an amicable adjustment of the question with the Government of Spain. In this state of things, it was deemed proper by Congress, in making the regulations necessary for the collection of revenue in the ceded territory, and guarding against the new danger of smuggling into the United States, through the channels opened by it, to include a provision for the case of West Florida, by vesting in the President a power which his discretion might accommodate to events. This provision is contained in the eleventh, taken in connexion with the fourth section of the act herewith enclosed. The act had been many weeks depending in Congress, with these sections, word for word, in it; the bill had been printed as soon as reported by the committee, for the use of the members, and as two copies are, by a usage of politeness, always allotted for each foreign minister here, it must in all probability have been known to the Marquis d'Yrujo in an early stage of its progress. If it was not, it marks much less of that zealous vigilance over the concerns of his sovereign than he now makes the plea for his intemperate conduct. For some days even after the act was published in the gazette of this city, he was silent. At length, however, he called at the office of State, with the gazette in his hand, and entered into a very angry comment on the eleventh section, which was answered by remarks (some of which it would seem from his written allusion to them were not well understood) calculated to assuage his dissatisfaction with the law, as far as was consistent with a candid declaration to him that we considered all of West Florida, westward of the Perdido, as clearly ours by the treaty of April 30, 1803, and that of St. Ildefonso. The conversation ended, as might be inferred from his letters which followed it on the 7th and 17th instant, of which copies are herewith enclosed, as are also copies of my answer of ——, and of his reply of ——. You will see by this correspondence the footing on which a rudeness, which no Government can tolerate, has placed him with this Government, and the view of it which must be unavoidably conveyed to our minister at Madrid. It may be of some importance, also, that it be not misconceived where you are. But the correspondence is chiefly of importance as it suggests the earnestness with which Spain is likely to contest our construction of the treaties of cession, and the Spanish reasoning which will be employed against it; and, consequently, as it urges the expediency of cultivating the disposition of the French Government to take our side of the question. To this she is bound no less by sound policy than by a regard to right.

She is bound by the former, because the interest she has in our friendship interests her in the friendship between us and Spain, which cannot be maintained with full effect, if at all, without removing the sources of collision lurking under a neighborhood marked by such circumstances; and which, considering the relation between France and Spain, cannot be interrupted without endangering the friendly relations between the United States and France. A transfer from Spain to the United States of the territory claimed by the latter, or rather of the whole of both the Floridas on reasonable conditions, is, in fact, nothing more than a sequel and completion of the policy which led France into her own treaty of cession; and her discernment and her consistency are both pledges that she will view the subject in this light. Another pledge lies in the manifest interest which France has in the peaceable transfer of these Spanish possessions to the United States, as the only effectual security against their falling into the hands of Great Britain. Such an event would be certain in case of a rupture between Great Britain and Spain, and would be particularly disagreeable to France, whether Great Britain should retain the acquisition for the sake of the important harbors and other advantages belonging to it, or should make it the basis of some transaction with the United States, which, notwithstanding the good faith and fairness towards France, (which would doubtless be observed on our part,) might involve conditions too desirable to her enemy not to be disagreeable to herself. It even deserves consideration that the use which Great Britain could make of the territory in question, and the facility in seizing it, may become a casting motive with her to force Spain into war, contrary to the wishes and the policy of France.

The territory ceded to the United States is described in the words following: "the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be, according to the treaties subsequently passed between Spain and other States."

In expounding this three-fold description, the different forms used must be so understood as to give a meaning to each description, and to make the meaning of each coincide with that of the others.

The first form of description is a reference to the extent which Louisiana now has, in the hands of Spain. What is that extent, as determined by its eastern limits? It is not denied that the Perdido was once the eastern limit of Louisiana. It is not denied that the territory now possessed by Spain extends to the river Perdido. The river Perdido, we say, then, is the limit to the eastern extent of Louisiana ceded to the United States.

This construction gives an obvious and pertinent meaning to the term "now," and to the expression "in the hands of Spain," which can be found in no other construction. For a considerable time previous to the treaty of peace in 1783, between Great Britain and Spain, Louisiana, as in the hands of Spain, was limited eastwardly by the Mississippi, the Iberville, &c. The term "now," fixes its extent, as enlarged by that treaty, in contradistinction to the more limited extent in which Spain held it prior to that treaty. Again: the expression "in the hands or in the possession of Spain," fixes the same extent; because, the expression cannot relate to the extent which Spain, by her internal regulations, may have given to a particular district under the name of Louisiana; but evidently to the extent in which it was known to other nations, particularly to the nation in treaty with her; and in which it was relatively to other nations in her hands, and not in the hands of any other nation. It would be absurd to consider the expression, "in the hands of Spain," as relating not to others, but to herself and to her own regulations; for the territory of Louisiana in her hands must be equally so, and be the same, whether formed into one or twenty districts, or by whatever name or names it may be called by herself.

What may now be the extent of a provincial district under the name of Louisiana, according to the municipal arrangements of the Spanish Government, is not perfectly known. It is at least questionable, even whether these arrangements have not incorporated the portion of Louisiana acquired from Great Britain, with the western portion before belonging to Spain, under the same provincial Government. But, whether such be the fact or not, the construction of the treaty will be the same.

The next form of description refers to the extent which Lousiana had when possessed by France. What is this extent? It will be admitted, that for the whole period prior to the division of Louisiana between Spain and Great Britain in 1762–3, or at least from the adjustment of boundary between France and Spain in 1719, to that event, Louisiana extended, in the possession of France, to the river Perdido. Had the meaning, then, of the first description been less determinate, and had France been in possession of Louisiana at any time with less extent than to the Perdido, a reference to this primitive and long continued extent would be more natural and probable than to any other. But it happens that France never possessed Louisiana with less extent than to the Perdido; because, on the same day that she ceded a part to Spain, the residue was ceded to Great Britain; and, consequently, as long as she possessed Louisiana at all, she possessed it entire, that is, in its extent to the Perdido. It is true, that after the cession of Western Louisiana to Spain in the year 1762–3, the actual delivery of the territory by France was delayed for several years: but it can never be supposed, that a reference could be intended to this short period of delay, during which France held that portion of Louisiana without the eastern portion in the right of Spain only, not in her own right, when, in other words, she held it as the trustee of Spain; and, that a reference to such a possession for such a period should be intended, rather than a reference to the long possession of the whole territory in her own acknowledged right, prior to that period.

In the order of the French King in 1764, to Monsieur d'Abbadie, for the delivery of Western Louisiana to Spain, it is stated that the cession by France was on the 3d of November, and the acceptance by Spain, on the 13th of that month, leaving an interval of ten days. An anxiety to find a period, during which Louisiana, as limited by the Mississippi and the Iberville, was held by France in her own right, may possibly lead the Spanish Government to seize the pretext into which this momentary interval may be converted. But it will be a mere pretext. In the first place, it is probable that the treaty of cession to Spain, which is dated on the same day with that to Great Britain, was, like the latter, a preliminary treaty, consummated and confirmed by a definitive treaty, bearing the same date with the definitive treaty, including the cession to Great Britain; in which case, the time and effect of each cession would be the same, whether recurrence be had to the date of the preliminary or definitive treaties. In the next place, the cession by France to Spain was essentially made on the 3d of November, 1762, on which day, the same with that of the cession to Great Britain, the right passed away from France. The acceptance by Spain, ten days after, if necessary at all to perfect the deed, had relation to the date of the cession by France, and must have the same effect, and no other, as if Spain had signed the deed on the same day with France. This explanation, which rests on the soundest principles, nullifies the interval of ten days, so as to make the cession to Great Britain and Spain simultaneous, on the supposition that recurrence be had to the preliminary treaty, and not to the definitive treaty; and, consequently, establishes the fact that France, at no time, possessed Louisiana with less extent than to the Perdido; the alienation and partition of the territory admitting no distinction of time. In the last place, conceding even that during an interval of ten days the right of Spain was incomplete, and was in transitu only from France; or, in another form of expression, that the right remained in France, subject to the eventual acceptance of Spain, is it possible to believe that a description, which must be presumed to aim at clearness and certainty, should refer for its purposes to so fugitive and equivocal a state of things, in preference to a state of things where the right and the possession of France were of long continuance, and susceptible of neither doubt nor controversy? It is impossible. And, consequently, the only possible construction which can be put on the second form of description coincides with the only rational construction that can be put on the first: making Louisiana of the same extent, that is to the river Perdido, both "as in the hands of Spain" and "as France possessed it."

The third and last description of Louisiana is in these words: "Such as it ought to be according to the treaties subsequently passed between Spain and other States."

This description may be considered as auxiliary to the two others, and is conclusive as an argument for comprehending within the cession of Spain, territory eastward of the Mississippi and the Iberville, and for extending the cession to the river Perdido.

The only treaties between Spain and other nations that affect the extent of Louisiana, as being subsequent to the possession of it by France, are, first, the treaty in 1783 between Spain and Great Britain; and, secondly, the treaty of 1795 between Spain and the United States.

The last of these treaties affects the extent of Louisiana, as in the hands of Spain, by defining the northern boundary of that part of it which lies east of the Mississippi and the Iberville; and the first affects the extent of Louisiana, by including in the cession from Great Britain to Spain, the territory between that river and the Perdido; and by giving to Louisiana, in consequence of that reunion of the eastern and western part, the same extent eastwardly in the hands of Spain as it had when France possessed it. Louisiana, then, as it ought to be, according to treaties of Spain subsequently to the possession by France, is limited by the line of demarcation settled with the United States, and forming a northern boundary, and is extended to the river Perdido as its eastern boundary.

This is not only the plain and necessary construction of the words, but is the only construction that can give a meaning to them. For they are without meaning, on the supposition that Louisiana, as in the hands of Spain, is limited by the Mississippi and the Iberville, since neither the one nor the other of those treaties have any relation to Louisiana that can affect its extent, but through their relation to the limits of that part of it which lies eastward of the Mississippi and the Iberville. Including this part, therefore, as we contend, within the extent of Louisiana, and a meaning is given to both as pertinent as it is important. Exclude this part, as Spain contends, from Louisiana, and no treaties exist to which the reference is applicable.

This deduction cannot be evaded, by pretending that the reference to subsequent treaties of Spain was meant to save the right of deposite, and other rights stipulated to the commerce of the United States by the treaty of 1795; first, because, although that may be an incidental object of the reference to that treaty, as was signified by His Catholic Majesty to the Government of the United States, yet the principal object of the reference is evidently the territorial extent of Louisiana; secondly, because the reference is to more than one treaty, to the treaty of 1783, as well as to that of 1795; and the treaty of 1783 can have no modifying effect whatever rendering it applicable, but on the supposition that Louisiana was considered as extending eastward of the Mississippi and the Iberville, into the territory ceded by that treaty to Spain.

In fine, the construction which we maintain gives, to every part of the description of the territory ceded to the United States a meaning clear in itself, and in harmony with every other part, and is no less conformable to facts, than it is founded on the ordinary use and analogy of the expressions. The construction urged by Spain gives, on the contrary, a meaning to the first description which is inconsistent with the very terms of it; it prefers in the second a meaning that is impossible or absurd; and it takes from the last all meaning whatever.

In confirmation of the meaning which extends Louisiana to the river Perdido, it may be regarded as most consistent with the object of the First Consul in the cession obtained by him from Spain. Every appearance, every circumstance, pronounces this to have been to give lustre to his administration, and to gratify a natural pride in his nation, by re-annexing to its domain possessions which had, without any sufficient considerations, been severed from it; and which, being in the hands of Spain, it was in the power of Spain to restore. Spain, on the other side, might be the less reluctant against the cession in this extent, as she would be only replaced by it within the original limits of her possessions, the territory east of the Perdido having been regained by her from Great Britain in the peace of 1783, and not included in the late cession.

It only remains to take notice of the argument derived from a criticism on the term "retrocede," by which the cession from Spain to France is expressed. The literal meaning of this term is said to be that Spain gives back to France what she received from France; and that as she received from France no more than the territory west of the Mississippi and the Iberville, that, and no more, could be given back by Spain.

Without denying that such a meaning, if uncontrolled by other terms, would have been properly expressed by the term "retrocede," it is sufficient, and more than sufficient, to observe, first, that with respect to France, the literal meaning is satisfied; France receiving back what she had before alienated; secondly, that with respect to Spain, not only the greater part of Louisiana had been confessedly received by her from France, and, consequently, was literally ceded back by Spain, as well as ceded back to France; but, with respect to the part in question, Spain might not unfairly be considered as ceding back to France what France had ceded to her; inasmuch as the cession of it to Great Britain was made for the benefit of Spain, to whom, on that account, Cuba was restored. The effect was precisely the same as if France had, in form, made the cession to Spain, and Spain had assigned it over to Great Britain; and the cession may the more aptly be considered as passing through Spain, as Spain herself was a party to the treaty by which it was conveyed to Great Britain. In this point of view, not only France received back what she had ceded, but Spain ceded back what she had received, and the etymology even of the term "retrocede" is satisfied. This view of the case is the more substantially just, as the territory in question passed from France to Great Britain, for the account of Spain, but passed from Great Britain into the hands of Spain in 1783, in consequence of a war to which Spain had contributed but little, compared with France, and in terminating which so favorably in this article for Spain, France had doubtless a preponderating influence. Thirdly, that if a course of proceeding might have existed to which the term "retrocede" would be more literally applicable, it may be equally said that there is no other particular term which would be more applicable to the whole proceeding, as it did exist. Fourthly. Lastly, that if this were not the case, a nice criticism on the etymology of a single term can be allowed no weight against a conclusion drawn from the clear meaning of every other term, and from the whole context.

In aid of these observations, I enclose herewith two papers, which have been drawn up with a view to trace and support our title to Louisiana in its extent to the Perdido. You will find in them also the grounds on which its western extent is maintainable against Spain, and its northern in relation to Great Britain.

On the whole, we reckon with much confidence on the obligations and dispositions of the French Government, to favor our object with Spain, and on your prudent exertions to strengthen our hold on both; not only in reference to the true construction of the treaty, but to our acquisition of the Spanish territory eastward of the Perdido, on convenient and equitable conditions.

You will find herewith enclosed copies of another correspondence, sufficiently explaining itself, with the Marquis d'Yrujo on the commerce from our ports to St. Domingo; to which is added a letter on that subject from M. Pichon. The ideas of the President, as well to the part which the true interest of France recommends to her, as to the part prescribed both to her and to the United States by the law of nations, were communicated in my letter of the 31st of January last. It is much to be desired that the French Government may enter into proper views on this subject.

With respect to the trade in articles not for war, there cannot be a doubt that the interest of France concurs with that of the United States. With respect to articles for war, it is, probably, the interest of all nations that they should be kept out of hands likely to make so bad a use of them. It is clear, at the same time, that the United States are bound by the law of nations to nothing further than to leave their offending citizens to the consequences of an illicit trade; and it deserves serious consideration, how far their undertaking, at the instance of one Power, to enforce the law of nations, by prohibitory regulations to which they are not bound, may become an embarrassing precedent, and stimulate pretensions and complaints of other Powers. The French Government must be sensible, also, that prohibitions by one nation would have little effect, if others, including Great Britain, should not follow the example. It may be added, that the most which the United States could do in the case, short of prohibiting the export of contraband articles altogether, a measure doubtless beyond the expectations of France, would be to annex to the shipment of these articles a condition, that they should be delivered elsewhere than in St. Domingo, and that a regulation of this kind would readily be frustrated by a reshipment of the articles after delivery elsewhere, in the same or other vessels, in order to accomplish the forbidden destination. If, indeed, the prohibitory regulations, on the part of the United States, were the result of a stipulation, and recommended by an equivalent concession, the objection to it as an inconvenient precedent would be avoided. If, for example, France would agree to permit the trade with St. Domingo in all other articles, on condition that we would agree to prohibit contraband articles, no objection of that sort would lie against the arrangement; and the arrangement would, in itself, be so reasonable, on both sides, and so favorable, even to the people of St. Domingo, that the President authorizes you not only to make it, if you find it not improper, the subject of a frank conference with the French Government, but to put it into the form of a conventional regulation; or, should this be objectionable, the object may be attained, perhaps, by a tacit understanding between the two Governments, which may lead to the regulations on each side respectively necessary. Although a legal regulation, on our part, cannot be absolutely promised, otherwise than by a positive and mutual stipulation, yet, with a candid explanation of this constitutional circumstance, there can be little risk in inspiring the requisite confidence that the legislative authority here would interpose its sanction.

It is the more important that something should be done in this case, and done soon, as the pretext, founded upon the supposed illegality of any trade whatever with the negroes in St. Domingo, is multiplying depredations on our commerce, not only with that island, but with the West Indies generally, to a degree highly irritating, and which is laying the foundation for extensive claims and complaints on our part. You will not fail to state this fact to the French Government in its just importance; as an agreement for some such arrangement as is above suggested, or if that be disliked, as requiring such other interposition of that Government as will put an end to the evil.

It is represented that a part of the depredations are committed by French armed vessels without commissions, or with commissions from incompetent authorities. It appears, also, that these lawless proceedings are much connected with Spanish ports and subjects, probably Spanish officers, also, in the West Indies, particularly in the island of Cuba. So far as the responsibility of Spain may be involved, we shall not lose sight of it. An appeal, at the same time, to that of France, is as pressing as it is just; and you will please to make it in the manner best calculated to make it effectual.

In one of your letters you apprehend that the interest accruing from the delay of the commissioners at Paris may be disallowed by the French Government, and wish for instructions on the subject. I am glad to find, by later communications from Mr. Skipwith, that the apparent discontent at the delay had subsided. But whatever solicitude that Government might feel for despatch in liquidating the claims, it would be a palpable wrong to make a disappointment in that particular a pretext for refusing any stipulated part of the claims. In a legal point of view, the treaty could not be in force until mutually ratified; and every preparatory step taken for carrying it into effect, however opposite or useful, must be connected with legal questions arising under the treaty.

In other parts of your correspondence, you seem to have inferred, from some passage in mine, that I thought the ten millions of livres in cash, over which a discretion was given, ought to have been paid rather to France than to our creditor citizens. If the inference be just, my expressions must have been the more unfortunate as they so little accord with the original plan, communicated in the instructions to yourself and Mr. Monroe; the more unfortunate still, as they not only decide a question wrong, but a question which could never occur. The cash fund of ten millions was provided on the supposition, that, in a critical moment, and in a balance of considerations, the immediate payment of that sum, as a part of the bargain, might either tempt the French Government to enter into it, or to reduce the terms of it. If wanted for either of these purposes, it was to be paid to the French Government; if not wanted for either, it was made applicable to no other. The provision contemplated for the creditors had no reference to the fund of ten millions of livres; nor was it even contemplated that any other cash fund would be made applicable to their claims. It was supposed not unreasonable, that the ease of our treasury and the chance and means of purchasing the territory remaining to Spain eastward of the Mississippi, might be so far justly consulted as to put the indemnification of the claims against France on a like footing with that on which the indemnification of like claims against Great Britain had been put. And it was inferred, that such a modification of the payments would not only have fully satisfied the expectations of the creditors, but would have encountered no objections on the part of the French Government, who had no interest in the question, and who were precluded by all that had passed from urging ojections of any other sort.

Congress adjourned on Tuesday, the 27th of March, to the first Monday in November next. Copies of their laws will be forwarded to you, as soon as they issue from the press. For the present, I enclose herewith a list of all their acts, and copies of a few of them, particularly of the acts providing for the Government of Louisiana, and for the war in the Mediterranean. The former, it is hoped, will satisfy the French Government of the prudent and faithful regard of the Government of the United States to the interest and happiness of the people transferred into the American family.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, Esq.

[The following is one of the memoirs, or essays, referred to in the preceding letter from Mr. Livingston to the President, dated March 12, and in Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. Livingston of May 25, 1803.]

Thoughts on the relative situation of France, Britain, and America, as commercial and maritime nations.

The power of France having reached a height that leaves her nothing to wish or to fear from the continental sovereignties of Europe, she might be considered as invulnerable if she could either divide the empire of the sea, or place it in so many hands as to command, by her influence, or the advantages of her commerce, such a portion of it as would, with her own maritime exertion, reduce her rival to terms of equality.

It is certain that, for the last century, she has not been able to effect this; although she has generally had the aid of Spain, and sometimes that of Holland. Spain and Holland are diminishing in naval importance. Holland, by the shallowness of her harbors, which do not, without great difficulty, admit ships of the great size which are every day found more necessary in battle; by the ruin of her colonies; by the cession of the island of Ceylon; by the derangement of the affairs of her commercial companies; and, above all, by the great comparative advantages enjoyed by Britain in the East Indies: add to these circumstances the loss of seamen which she has sustained by the war, and the disaffection which has led many of them into foreign service, together with the accumulated debt of the nation, and it will appear that little aid can be expected from her in case of a maritime war. It must, at least, be doubtful, if she quits that system of neutrality so congenial to her own situation, whether she will take part with Britain or France. The neighborhood and force of France must, indeed, make her tremble for her possessions in Europe; but still she may find resources against them in the aid of the neighboring nations. But where is she to look for support against the power of Britain, who, in the very commencement of a war, will strip her of every foreign possession, and cut off all her resources?

Spain is much in the same situation; her wealth and credit depend upon her colonies. One of the most valuable of these (part of Hispaniola) has been ceded to France; and the possession of Trinidad, which the great capital of England will soon render very important, will afford her such a point of support, in America, as must render the situation of the remaining islands very precarious, and always keep Spain in pain for her colonies; this will lead her to seek for safety, as far as possible, in neutrality. But, at all events, the maritime power of Spain must diminish by the circumstances I have mentioned, and by the illicit trade which the possession of the Mosquito shore, the bay of Honduras, and the island of Trinidad, will enable the British to carry on in spite of the vigilance of Spain—a vigilance, too, which will be, in some sort, relaxed from the apprehension of provoking a war by too much rigor.

The naval power of Britain has, on the other hand, acquired an immense accession, during the last war, by that maritime superiority which gave protection to her commerce in every part of the world; by her conquests in the East Indies; and by the cession of Trinidad. But, besides the extent of her colonies, she has, in her peculiar position, an advantage unattainable by France. The fuel for all the great cities of England and Scotland is coal. Not less than three thousand and six hundred ships enter the port of London yearly, charged with this article alone. This, together with similar exports to other cities, and the situation of the capitals of England and Ireland, is a great nursery for seamen, which France wants; and makes a coasting trade, which is more than four-fold of all the coasting trade of France taken together, and is not less than the whole colonial trade of Britain, including the East Indies. It also has this peculiar advantage, that, in time of war, all the seamen employed in this commerce may be engaged in the navy with very little inconvenience, only by permitting (which is not done in peace) the coal to be brought to London by inland navigation.

It becomes, then, a serious question with France, how she is to counterbalance the advantages enjoyed by her rival? Shall she establish foreign colonies?

Unless she has a naval force capable of protecting them, these colonies must soon change their masters; and the whole expense employed in their support redound to the benefit of her rival. But admit that they could be secured by land forces. How trifling will all the seamen afforded by the commerce of those colonies be compared to the number produced by the colonies of Britain in the East and West Indies, America, Africa, and the Southern Ocean. But supposing them equal, still the seamen Britain derives from her coasting trade alone more than equal those drawn from all these sources.

Will France create a marine by becoming the carrier of other nations? This is impossible. Except Britain, there is no nation in Europe which cannot navigate their ships as cheap as France. The materials for ship building, and more especially naval stores and provisions, are dearer in France than in the Northern States, and labor is equally high?

Will she be her own carrier? If she will it must be by restrictions on the trade of other nations, who will certainly not submit to them without imposing similar restrictions on France. Suppose, for instance, she should say (as indeed she has said) that tobacco brought to France in foreign vessels shall pay an extra duty. How easy will it be for the country which grows tobacco to say that that article, exported in a French ship, shall pay a similar duty? And what will be the end of this commercial warfare? But that every nation shall carry its own produce, and let their ships return home empty, if the partial duties are high? Thus, if France imposes a high duty on tobacco, and America a high duty on wines and other articles of France in foreign bottoms, the tobacco must be brought in French ships, and charged with a double expense of freight, because they can carry out no cargo to pay the expense and insurance of the ships on their outward-bound voyage. Of course this expense must fall on the consumer of tobacco; and for what? Why, in order that ten French seamen may be employed rather than ten foreigners. A ship of three hundred tons must make, in order to clear herself, seventy thousand francs a year. The whole of this, with insurance out and home, must be charged on the tobacco imported, in the case I mention; whereas only the one-half would be paid if she could take out a cargo. Thus, then, the consumer of tobacco in France pays, annually, to the maintenance of ten seamen, thirty-five thousand francs, or three thousand five hundred for every seaman; and this, too, without being of the smallest advantage to that class of people whose wages are not thereby at all increased. This is purchasing sailors at such a rate as I believe no nation in the world would ever long submit to. But should the same reasoning be applied to the manufactures and wines of France, and she, by attempting to be her own carrier, charge them with a double freight, it must necessarily follow that, with respect to every article which other nations can supply, she would soon lose the carriage by losing the sale; for if a foreign ship can carry out a cargo to Lisbon, and take back one from thence charged with no extra duty, the wine and oil of Lisbon will be preferred, though of inferior quality, to those of France. Thus, whatever she gives to her seamen by discouraging a free trade, she takes from her agriculture and manufactures: and yet her agriculture and manufactures can alone form the basis of her commerce. In time of war, unless this operation can really create a naval power, sufficient to protect her commerce, (of which there is not the smallest prospect,) foreigners having been driven from her ports by this operation, she must cease to trade altogether. Thus, the sources of her wealth will be cut off at the moment she most needs them.

What, then, is to be done? Is France to abandon her colonies as weak points in her system, which she cannot maintain? Is she to suffer a tyranny to be established upon the ocean, which shall forever hold her in check? Is she to allow such an accumulation of wealth as will forever enable her rival to interfere in the affairs of the continent and provoke new combinations against her? I answer these questions by returning to my first position.

She must place the empire of the sea in more hands, without attempting to grasp it alone. She must make it the interest of those who aid her in the attainment of a considerable portion of it to maintain her superiority. Spain and Holland are not to be neglected; though, as I have stated, they will, in the situation in which their colonies are now placed, incline to neutrality; and if otherwise, their aid would be insufficient during a war. The United States have physical advantages which, like those of Britain, must necessarily lead them to be a considerable maritime nation. The mass of their population lies upon the ocean, and upon large rivers that are navigable for sea vessels to the interior of the country, which is generally rough and hilly between the rivers. Hence it happens that there is little land carriage in America. If merchandises are to be transported from one State to another, it is by water; and that not solely by rivers or canals, but by descending one river, passing out into the ocean, and ascending another. This circumstance, together with the variance between the productions of the Southern and Northern States, which promotes much intercourse, must give to them a nursery of seamen in their coasting trade, equal to that which Britain enjoys in her coal trade: to which a growing coal trade, from mines found in the banks of the James river, and in other places, will be added, when wood diminishes, or when the policy of the country shall charge the importation of British coal with heavy duties. Our large cities consume, even now, very considerable quantities of this article. The advantage also that the United States enjoy in the cheapness of the articles for building, and, above all, for victualling their ships, more than counterbalances the high price given to their seamen. Their situation relative to the cod and whale fisheries also calls numbers to a maritime life.

The islands, to whomsoever they may belong, from the various accidents to which they are liable, and the difficulty of supplying them from Europe, must receive their provision and timber from the United States; and, if they choose, they can compel them to receive them only in American bottoms. Were the Powers of Europe, therefore, to lay the severest restrictions on her commerce, the United States would still be a very important commercial nation.

But who is interested in preventing their rapid rise to the height to which their position and their destinies lead them? No nation upon earth; unless Britain should one day fear them more as rivals than she will value them as customers. While they confine themselves to the production of raw materials, they must prove the best market for such nations as can afford them manufactures, wine, oil, and fruit, in return. Weak, indeed, would that nation be who should treat them with neglect, or drive them, by ill-judged laws, from their harbors. Britain is so sensible of this, that she has never attempted to prevent, by partial duties, the American vessels from carrying their own produce to them, or their fabrics back in return. She well knows that every such measure would have a tendency to drive them from her harbors, to which she so much wishes to invite them, that she even grants them a right, by treaty, to enter all her ports in the East Indies.

While Britain refuses to naturalize American ships she never will be able to navigate (because she cannot build, fit, or victual) her ships so cheap as those of America. It must follow, therefore, that the trade of Britain to and from the United States will be chiefly carried on by American ships; and, as her articles are very bulky, a great number will be employed. There exists, indeed, at this moment a circumstance which will give them considerable advantages, unless France should instantly step in and prevent its operation.

The advanced price of living in Britain, owing to the debt contracted by the war, has naturally raised that of labor; while the peace, which gives more activity to her commerce, will make this operate upon seamen's wages, and thus give some check to her carrying trade. On the other hand, this diminution of the trade of the United States will throw at least twenty-five thousand seamen out of employ. These will, from their habits and manners, naturally pass into the service of Britain, and thus enable her to keep down wages and maintain her advantages.

It is obvious that it is much the interest of France to prevent this; and more particularly when it is considered that all these men are skilful mariners, and many of them experienced fishermen; who may transplant the whale fishery to Britain, and thus add a new source to her naval power. The efforts of France to establish a fishery will be of little avail against this; nor will it ever be found practicable to render this a flourishing branch of business, except by the aid of American fishermen; and even then by a charge upon a material useful in their manufactures more than equivalent to the value of the fishery.

I shall be asked how long it will take to make the United States a naval power equal to Britain? I answer, that a country which possesses timber, naval stores, provisions, and men accustomed, by an active commerce, to a sea life; a country whose credit is unblemished, and who has no debt but what she can instantly discharge; is certainly so far equal as her numbers are equal to one who has no advantage over her in any of these circumstances, and is inferior in others. It will be allowed, too, that, according to every rational probability, their numbers will be equal to those of the British isles in twenty years, and their wealth not inferior. But it is by no means necessary to carry the navy of America to the extent of that of Britain, in order to render her a useful ally, or a respectable enemy. The trade of Britain with her islands, and the Indies, must approach the coasts of America. Her privateers could, even without protection from a navy, destroy a great proportion of this. With a navy of thirty ships of the line, and a proportionate number of frigates, which need never be more than one week's sail from their own shores, such protection would be given to smaller vessels as would enable them to capture great part of their trade, unless protected by large fleets. For this purpose one-half of the British navy must be kept at vast expense, at a great distance from home, and in an unhealthy climate; while all the expenditures of the American navy would be made in their own ports. It will certainly admit of little doubt, that a nation who has no frontier to defend, who has six hundred thousand armed men at home, and who has no debts, need only will it to have a fleet of the size I mention. And it is very certain that such a fleet, by acting always together, would compel any European nation greatly to weaken her naval force in her own seas. No convoy could be less than the whole of the American fleet; nor could a smaller force be left in the islands; so that thirty ships in America would demand for convoys, out and in, and the stations in the islands, not less than ninety ships of equal force. What power could Britain oppose to this force, combined with an equal number of French ships, with the advantage of all the harbors of the United States? What refuge would she have against storms and accidental separation when on the American coast? And how, under these disadvantages, would she maintain her superiority in Europe? I infer, from this reasoning, that it is the true interest of France to promote the commerce and maritime force of America; and, at the same time, to interest her in the extension of the commerce of France. I do not mean to say that this force will always operate directly in favor of France. This will depend upon a variety of political circumstances that cannot be foreseen or controlled. The first interest of America will doubtless lead her to a state of neutrality. But such has always been the overbearing spirit of Britain at sea, that it is highly probable occurrences will arise which may compel America, when she feels her strength, to enter into a war to preserve her commercial rights from violation. But should she maintain her neutrality, she will indirectly serve France, if the plan I suggest is adopted: 1st, By carrying on her commerce for her during a war; 2d, By employing a great number of seamen who would otherwise go into the service of Britain; 3d, By seizing upon many branches of trade from which Britain derives her wealth, and which, when once diverted, may never return. But my plan embraces not only an extension of the American maritime force, but that of France, by an easy and natural operation, without imposing a burthen upon, but in fact giving the highest encouragement to, her manufactures and agriculture. It consists in a treaty of commerce which shall put the trade and shipping of both countries upon the most perfect equality. That is to say, the ships of France shall be admitted into the ports of America, paying a duty of six per cent. ad valorem only on all articles, and the same tonnage duty as the American ships pay. The American ships shall be admitted into all the ports of France and her colonies, upon the same terms, provided that they should never carry to the colonies any thing but the produce of their own country or of France; that the colonial products in American ships should be subject to every regulation as to their being landed in France, as they are in French ships.

The first advantage of this treaty would be, if immediately entered into, the saving to America twenty-five thousand seamen, who will, without this encouragement, go into the British service; and thus increase not only her relative but her actual force: 2d, The sale of a number of her ships to France, which will now become a dead capital in her hands: 3d, The preserving to the United States their fisheries, which may be otherwise greatly affected by the removal of their seamen to Britain. In these objects France has a mutual advantage; and I will venture to say, that she never acts more inconsistently with her own interest, or more conformably with that of Britain, than when, under the idea of raising a fishery at home, while she has not seamen or shipping for her other branches of commerce, she endeavors to discourage the fisheries of America, which, from a variety of physical causes, can alone keep them from falling into the hands of the English. France should bear in mind, that, were her colonies as extensive as those of Britain; were her trade in Europe and America equal to hers; yet, for the reasons I have mentioned, arising from the geographical and physical situation of England and Ireland, she would not possess more than two-thirds of the number of seamen, those circumstances alone producing nearly as many as all the other trade of Britain. France can only increase her relative strength by diminishing that of her rival, and keeping her from drawing from other sources new means of power.

France may injure, and perhaps ruin, the whale fishery in America; but England, only, will profit by it. The first war will break up her establishments; and the Americans in her service will return with their wealth into their own country.

The interest that France will have in this treaty will be much more extensive: 1st, The raising up a new marine Power; 2d, Giving that Power such an interest in her prosperity, as must not only keep it from being inimical to, but, on the contrary, frequently connected with her in hostile operations; 3d, The transfer of ships to France; 4th, The increase of French seamen: for as the wages of seamen are lower in France than in America, and must continue to be so, on account of the demand for men in a new country, while, on the other hand, ships, and the provisions for their outfit, are cheaper in America, French merchants, by fitting many of these vessels, and navigating them with French seamen, will be able to sail cheaper than the Americans themselves, and thus increase the number of their seamen. These seamen, in case of war, will be drawn into the navy; while their places will be supplied, during the war, at somewhat more expense, by Americans, without injuring their commerce. In the cod fishery, France will derive clear and obvious advantages from the American ports for her outfits, &c.

But even these advantages will be inferior to that derived from the increase of the commerce of exchange, by the removal of restrictions; an operation which, I will venture to say, will at least double the whole commerce and number of seamen employed by France, and quadruple it with respect to her navigation with America. It should also be considered that this works doubly in favor of France, 1st, So far as it is a direct advantage to her maritime power; 2d, So far as it subtracts from the navigation of England.

The benefits that will result to the manufacturers of France from this operation are incalculable: 1st, The raw materials will be purchased on easy terms to the manufacturer; 2d, The intercourse that this system will establish between the two nations will make their fabrics known, and render them fashionable in America; will draw off their custom from England, whose fabrics will continue to be charged with a heavy duty, unless, receding from her navigation act, she purchases an exemption.

Useful as this act may have been in its commencement, when the Dutch were the general carriers and rivals of Britain, and while the nations of Europe were ignorant of commercial principles, very enlightened statesmen now see many inconveniences in it to the general commerce of England; nor is there any thing necessary to its entire overthrow, but for other nations to pass similar laws, so far as respect Britain, while their trade is put upon a liberal footing with regard to other nations. This, by promoting their own commerce of exchange, while that of Britain is restricted, will place her flag under such disadvantages, that her own merchants will seek a foreign bottom when they have an operation that requires a circuitous voyage. This must ultimately, in spite of all her prejudices, compel her to repeal this selfish law, after having some time suffered under it. But while the navigation act exists in Britain, it will, under the circumstances of the treaty I suggest, operate as a bounty on the navigation and fabrics of France; because it is obvious that the freight and charge on any specific article carried in a ship that may make a circuitous voyage, is much less than they would be if part of the voyage was made in ballast. Thus, a French ship carrying a cargo of wine to America, taking in a load of tobacco, and returning from thence to Bordeaux, could take the wine on a much smaller freight than if the duties imposed in America on the importation of wine in a French ship should be equivalent to the duties upon tobacco imported in an American ship into France; because, in that case, the French ship would go out empty for the tobacco, and the American ship empty for the wine; and the double freight and insurance must be charged on each of these articles. It should always be remembered, that whatever is saved in freight is a bounty upon agriculture and manufactures. But even this is a small advantage compared to that derived from the increase of adventures that will be occasioned by the very circumstance of freight for the whole outward and homeward voyage, and the consequent consumption of the commodities of the country that encourages it.

In this plan, Spain, (under some restrictions with regard to South America,) the Italian States, and any others who should incline to engage in it, should be associated; without, however, delaying the project between France and the United States, lest they should lose, and Britain acquire, at this critical moment, that great body of seamen, who will, by the peace, be thrown out of employ.

Were France to declare her determination to support this liberal system, such is her advantage in point of product and manufactures, that she could not fail to command the greatest foreign commerce of any nation in the world.

The wealth arising from this source would be unbounded. But while her great capital is in the centre of the republic, she never can have an extensive coasting trade; and she can only make up this deficiency, in a contest with Britain, by the increase of her wealth and credit; by nursing up new maritime nations; by which, if she adds little to her positive power, she adds much to her relative strength, in diminishing that of her rival.

To cite a simple instance: America can build and victual her whaling vessels much cheaper than either France or England, and of course afford oil cheaper; but if France excludes American oil from her market, she throws such a discouragement upon this fishery as will compel the whalers to seek another place of residence. In this case, though a few may be invited to France, the great bulk of them will go to England: First, because of their language, religion, and habits; and next, because they know that a war will ruin their establishments in France, and thus it will encourage those of Britain. The very companies established in France, at great national expense, will receive their oil at sea from English fishermen. Thus fifteen thousand men will be thrown into the scale of Britain, to support one thousand in the vain attempt to establish a fishery in France. This, however, is a small part of the loss. By the encouragement which France might give to the fisheries of the United States, she could destroy those of Britain; and, as the French ships that brought oil, or the American that brought French goods, would not go or return empty, a greater market would be created for French wines, brandies, &c. Let the loss upon this be calculated. The additional expense upon the first price to the inhabitants of France, and the countries given, and they will find that they purchase their oil at a ruinous rate.

Let the difference between fifteen thousand men, added to those employed in the British fishery, and eight thousand taken from them by the encouragement given to the American fishery by France, making together the loss or gain of twenty-three thousand to Britain, be put in the scale with the comparatively few fishermen France can make, and she will form a fair estimate of the attempt, considering her as a rival power to Britain.

Great as are the advantages proposed by this system to the commerce and navigation of France, they are small compared to those which she will derive from having opened a way to the establishment of free and liberal principles, that cannot fail to give room for the exertion of those talents and that industry for which her citizens are distinguished. Every nation, except one, will eagerly embrace them; and their mutual interest will lead them to protect them against the power of any maritime despot. The advantage that the vessels of this association would have over all others, could not fail to produce such a revolution in the principles and practice of commerce and navigation as would be highly interesting to humanity, honorable to the nations who should first adopt the system, and not unworthy of the enlarged views of that distinguished statesman to whom Europe is already so much in debted, and who, alone, has sufficient power to carry it into effect.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In execution of the act of the present session of Congress for taking possession of Louisiana, as ceded to us by France, and for the temporary government thereof, Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi territory, and General Wilkinson, were appointed commissioners to receive possession. They proceeded, with such regular troops as had been assembled at Fort Adams from the nearest posts, and with some militia of the Mississippi Territory, to New Orleans. To be prepared for any thing unexpected which might arise out of the transaction, a respectable body of militia was ordered to be in readiness in the States of Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, and a part of those of Tennessee was moved on to the Natchez. No occasion, however, arose for their services. Our commissioners, on their arrival at New Orleans, found the province already delivered by the commissaries of Spain to that of France, who delivered it over to them on the 20th day of December, as appears by their declaratory act accompanying this. Governor Claiborne, being duly invested with the powers heretofore exercised by the Governor and Intendant of Louisiana, assumed the Government on the same day, and, for the maintenance of law and order, immediately issued the proclamation and address now communicated.

On this important acquisition, so favorable to the immediate interests of our Western citizens, so auspicious to the peace and security of the nation in general, which adds to our country territories so extensive and fertile, and to our citizens new brethren to partake of the blessings of freedom and self-government, I offer to Congress and our country my sincere congratulations.

TH: JEFFERSON.

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, December 20, 1803.

SIR:

We have the satisfaction to announce to you, that the province of Louisiana was this day surrendered to the United States by the commissioner of France; and to add, that the flag of our country was raised in this city amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants.

The enclosed is a copy of an instrument of writing, which was signed and exchanged by the commisioners of the two Governments, and is designed as a record of this interesting transaction.

Accept assurances of our respectful consideration.

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE,
JAMES WILKINSON.

The Hon JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, City of Washington.

The undersigned William C. C. Claiborne and James Wilkinson, commissioners or agents of the United States, agreeable to the full powers they have received from Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, under date of the 31st October, 1803, and twenty-eighth year of the independence of the United States of America, (8th Brumaire, 12th year of the French republic) countersigned by the Secretary of State, James Madison, and citizen Peter Clement Laussat, Colonial Prefect, and Commissioner of the French Government for the delivery, in the name of the French republic, of the country, territories, and dependencies of Louisiana, to the commissioners or agents of the United States, conformably to the powers, commission, and special mandate which he has received in the name of the French people from citizen Bonaparte, First Consul, under date of the 6th June, 1803, (17th Prairial, 11th year of the French republic,) countersigned by the Secretary of State, Hugues Maret, and by his excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies, Decres, do certify by these presents, that on this day, Tuesday, the 20th December, 1803, of the christian era, (28th Frimaire, 12th year of the French republic,) being convened in the hall of the Hotel de Ville of New Orleans, accompanied on both sides by the chiefs and officers of the army and navy, by the municipality and divers respectable citizens of their respective republics, the said William C. C. Claiborne and James Wilkinson delivered to the said citizen Laussat their aforesaid full powers, by which it evidently appears that full power and authority has been given them jointly and severally to take possession of and to occupy the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April last past, (10th Floreal,) and for that purpose to repair to the said territory, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things touching the premises as may be necessary for fulfilling their appointment conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States; and thereupon the said citizen Laussat declared that, in virtue of and in the terms of the powers, commission, and special mandate, dated at St. Cloud, 6th June, 1803, of the christian era, (17th Prairial, 11th year of the French republic,) he put from that moment the said commissioners of the United States in possession of the country, territories, and dependencies of Louisiana, conformably to the 1st, 2d, 4th, and 5th articles of the treaty and the two conventions, concluded and signed the 30th April, 1803, (10th Floreal, 11th year of the French republic,) between the French republic and the United States of America, by citizen Francis Barbé Marbois, minister of the public treasury, and Messrs. Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe, ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, all three furnished with full powers, of which treaty and two conventions the ratifications made by the First Consul of the French republic on the one part, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the other part, have been exchanged and mutually received at the City of Washington, the 21st Otober, 1803, (28th Vendemiaire, 12th year of the French republic,) by citizen Louis André Pichon, chargé des affaires of the French republic near the United States, on the part of France, and by James Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, on the part of the United States, according to the procès verbal drawn up on the same day; and the present delivery of the country is made to them, to the end that, in conformity with the object of the said treaty, the sovereignty and property of the colony or province of Louisiana may pass to the said United States, under the same clauses and conditions as it had been ceded by Spain to France, in virtue of the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso, on the 1st October, 1800, (9th Vendemiaire, 9th year,) between these two last Powers, which has since received its execution by the actual re-entrance of the French republic into possession of the said colony or province.

And the said citizen Laussat in consequence, at this present time, delivered to the said commissioners of the United States, in this public sitting, the keys of the City of New Orleans, declaring that he discharges from their oaths of fidelity towards the French republic the citizens and inhabitants of Louisiana, who shall choose to remain under the dominion of the United States.

And that it may forever appear, the undersigned have signed the procès verbal of this important and solemn act, in the French and English languages, and have sealed it with their seals, and have caused it to be countersigned by their secretaries of commission, the day, month, and year above written.

JAMES WILKINSON, [L. S.]

PROCLAMATION

By His Excellency William C. C. Claiborne, Governor of the Mississippi Territory, exercising the powers of Governor General and Intendant of the province of Louisiana.

Whereas, by stipulations between the Governments of France and Spain, the latter ceded to the former the colony and province of Louisiana, with the same extent which it had at the date of the abovementioned treaty in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States; and whereas the Government of France has ceded the same to the United States by a treaty duly ratified, and bearing date the 30th of April, in the present year, and the possession of said colony and province is now in the United States, according to the tenor of the last mentioned treaty; and whereas the Congress of the United States, on the 31st day of October, in the present year, did enact that until the expiration of the session of Congress then sitting, (unless provisions for the temporary Government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress,) all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the then existing Government of the same, shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the President of the United States has by his commission, bearing date the same 31st day of October, invested me with all the powers, and charged me with the several duties heretofore held and exercised by the Governor General and Intendant of the province:

I have, therefore, thought fit to issue this my proclamation, making known the premises, and to declare, that the Government heretofore exercised over the said province of Louisiana, as well under the authority of Spain as of the French republic, has ceased, and that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants thereof will be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; that, in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations, which were in existence at the cessation of the late Government, remain in full force; and all civil officers charged with their execution, except those whose powers have been especially vested in me, and except also such officers as have been entrusted with the collection of the revenue, are continued in their functions, during the pleasure of the Governor for the time being, or until provision shall otherwise be made.

And I do hereby exhort and enjoin all the inhabitants, and other persons within the said province, to be faithful and true in their allegiance to the United States, and obedient to the laws and authorities of the same, under full assurance that their just rights will be under the guardianship of the United States, and will be maintained from all force or violence from without or within.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand.

Given at the city of New Orleans, the 20th day of December, 1803, and of the independence of the United States of America the 28th.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

The Governor's Address to the Citizens of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, September 20, 1803.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF LOUISIANA:

On the great and interesting event now finally consummated—an event so advantageous to yourselves, and so glorious to united America, I cannot forbear offering you my warmest congratulations. The wise policy of the Consul of France has, by the cession of Louisiana to the United States, secured to you a connexion beyond the reach of change, and to your posterity the sure inheritance of freedom. The American people receive you as brothers; and will hasten to extend to you a participation in those inestimable rights, which have formed the basis of their own unexampled prosperity. Under the auspices of the American Government, you may confidently rely upon the security of your liberty, your property, and the religion of your choice. You may with equal certainty rest assured, that your commerce will be promoted and your agriculture cherished; in a word, that your true interests will be among the primary objects of our national Legislature. In return for these benefits, the United States will be amply remunerated, if your growing attachment to the constitution of our country, and your veneration for the principles on which it is founded, be duly proportioned to the blessings which they will confer. Among your first duties, therefore, you should cultivate with assiduity among yourselves the advancement of political information; you should guide the rising generation in the paths of republican economy and virtue; you should encourage literature; for, without the advantages of education, your descendants will be unable to appreciate the intrinsic worth of the Government transmitted to them.

As for myself, fellow-citizens, accept a sincere assurance, that, during my continuance in the situation in which the President of the United States has been pleased to place me, every exertion will be made on my part to foster your internal happiness, and forward your general welfare; for it is only by such means that I can secure to myself the approbation of those great and just men who preside in the councils of our nation.

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

At the same time that the minister of His Majesty in the United States is charged to inform the American Government respecting the falsity of the rumor referred to, he has likewise orders to declare to it that His Majesty has thought fit to renounce his opposition to the alienation of Louisiana made by France, notwithstanding the solid reasons on which it is founded; thereby giving a new proof of his benevolence and friendship towards the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, May 15, 1804.

SIR:

The explanations which the Government of France has given to His Catholic Majesty concerning the sale of Louisiana to the United States, and the amicable dispositions on the part of the King my master towards these States, have determined him to abandon the opposition which, at a prior period, and with the most substantial motives, he had manifested against that transaction. In consequence, and by special order of His Majesty, I have the pleasure to communicate to you his royal intentions on an affair so important; well persuaded that the American Government will see, in this conduct of the King my master, a new proof of his consideration for the United States, and that they will correspond, with a true reciprocity, with the sincere friendship of the King, of which he has given so many proofs. God preserve you many years.

THE MARQUIS OF CASA YRUJO.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

Whereas, by an act of Congress, authority has been given to the President of the United States, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to erect the shores, waters, and inlets of the bay and river of Mobile, and of the other rivers, creeks, inlets, and bays, emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, east of the said river Mobile, and west thereof to the Pascaguola, inclusive, into a separate district for the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage, and to establish such place within the same as he shall deem expedient to be the port of entry and delivery for such district; and to designate such other places within the same district, not exceeding two, to be ports of delivery only:

Now know ye, That I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, do hereby decide, that all the above mentioned shores, waters, inlets, creeks, and rivers, lying within the boundaries of the United States, shall constitute and form a separate district, to be denominated "the district of Mobile;" and do also designate Fort Stoddert, within the district aforesaid, to be the port of entry and delivery for the said district.

Given under my hand, this 30th day of May, 1804.

PHILADELPHIA, May 15, 1804.

SIR:

The explanations which the Government of France has given to His Catholic Majesty concerning the sale of Louisiana to the United States, and the amicable dispositions on the part of the King my master towards these States, have determined him to abandon the opposition which, at a prior period, and with the most substantial motives, he had manifested against that transaction. In consequence, and by special order of His Majesty, I have the pleasure to communicate to you his royal intentions on an affair so important; well persuaded that the American Government will see, in this conduct of the King my master, a new proof of his consideration for the United States, and that they will correspond, with a true reciprocity, with the sincere friendship of the King, of which he has given so many proofs. God preserve you many years.

THE MARQUIS OF CASA YRUJO.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

Whereas, by an act of Congress, authority has been given to the President of the United States, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to erect the shores, waters, and inlets of the bay and river of Mobile, and of the other rivers, creeks, inlets, and bays, emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, east of the said river Mobile, and west thereof to the Pascaguola, inclusive, into a separate district for the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage, and to establish such place within the same as he shall deem expedient to be the port of entry and delivery for such district; and to designate such other places within the same district, not exceeding two, to be ports of delivery only:

Now know ye, That I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, do hereby decide, that all the above mentioned shores, waters, inlets, creeks, and rivers, lying within the boundaries of the United States, shall constitute and form a separate district, to be denominated "the district of Mobile;" and do also designate Fort Stoddert, within the district aforesaid, to be the port of entry and delivery for the said district.

Given under my hand, this 30th day of May, 1804.

8th CONGRESS.] No. 183. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, OCTOBER 24, 1803.

[Reported on December 24, 1803.]

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before you the convention* signed on the 12th day of May last, between the United States and Great Britain, for settling their boundaries in the northeastern and northwestern parts of the United States, which was mentioned in my general message of the 17th instant; together with such papers relating thereto, as may enable you to determine whether you will advise and consent to its ratification.

TH: JEFFERSON.

OCTOBER 24, 1803.

CONVENTION WITH HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY.

In order that the boundaries between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States of America may be more precisely ascertained and determined than has hitherto been done, the parties have respectively named their plenipotentiaries, and given them full powers to negotiate and conclude a convention for this purpose; that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiary the Right Honorable Robert Banks Jenkinson, commonly called Lord Hawkesbury, one of His Majesty's most honorable privy council, and his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate thereof, has appointed for their plenipotentiary, Rufus King, Esq. their minister plenipotentiary to his said Majesty; who have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The line hereinafter described shall and hereby is declared to be the boundary between the mouth of the river St. Croix and the bay of Fundy: that is to say, a line beginning in the middle of the channel of the river St. Croix, at its mouth, as the same has been ascertained by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; thence through the middle of the channel between Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island, and Campo Bello island on the west and south, and round the eastern point of Campo Bello island, to the bay of Fundy; and the islands and waters northward and eastward of the said boundary, together with the island of Campo Bello, situated to the southward thereof, are hereby declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of His Majesty's province of New Brunswick; and the islands and waters southward and westward of the said boundary, except only the island of Campo Bello, are hereby declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of Massachusetts, one of the said United States.

ART. 2. Whereas, it has become expedient that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned and described in the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States should be ascertained and determined; and that the line between the source of the river St. Croix, and the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia, should be run and marked, according to the provisions of the said treaty of peace: It is agreed that for this purpose, commissioners shall be appointed in the following manner, viz: one commissioner shall be named by His Majesty and one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and the said two commissioners shall agree in the choice of a third; or, if they cannot agree, they shall each propose one person; and of the two names, so proposed, one shall be taken by lot in the presence of the two original commissioners; and the three commissioners, so appointed, shall be sworn impartially to ascertain and determine the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia, pursuant to the provisions of the said treaty of peace: and likewise to cause the said boundary line between the source of the river St. Croix, as the same has been determined by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to be run and marked according to the provisions of the treaty aforesaid. The said commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such place or places as they shall think fit; they shall have power to appoint a secretary and employ such surveyors, and other assistants, as they shall judge necessary: the said commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings which shall describe the line aforesaid, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the place ascertained and determined, as aforesaid, to be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same in behalf of their respective Governments; and the decision and proceedings of the said commissioners, or a majority of them, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 3. It is further agreed that the said commissioners, after they shall have executed the duties assigned them in the preceding article, shall be, and they hereby are, authorized, upon their oaths, impartially to ascertain and determine the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, according to the provisions of the aforesaid treaty of peace; and likewise to cause the boundary line described in the said treaty of peace, between the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the said northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, to be run and marked pursuant to the provisions of the said treaty. The said commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, and employ such surveyors and other assistants as they shall judge necessary. The said commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings, which shall describe the boundary line aforesaid, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the westernmost head of Connecticut river, duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same, in behalf of their respective Governments; and the decision and proceedings of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 4. It is further agreed that the aforesaid commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties, such agreement to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, and all other expenses incurred by the said commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the said commissioners; and, in case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, the place of any commissioners shall be supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was appointed, and the new commissioner shall take the same oath, and do the same duties.

ART. 5. Whereas it is uncertain whether the river Mississippi extends so far to the northward as to be intersected by a line drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods, in the manner mentioned in the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States, it is agreed that, instead of the said line, the boundary of the United States in this quarter shall, and is hereby declared to be the shortest line which can be drawn between the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods and the nearest source of the river Mississippi: and for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods and the source of the river Mississippi that may be nearest to the said northwest point, as well as for the purpose of running and marking the said boundary line between the same, three commissioners, upon the demand of either Government, shall be appointed, and authorized, upon their oaths, to act; and their compensation and expenses shall be ascertained and paid, and vacancies supplied, in the manner provided in respect to the commissioners mentioned in the preceding articles; and the decisions and proceedings of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, made and had pursuant to this convention, shall be final and conclusive.

* The Senate having assented to this convention on the condition that the fifth article should be expunged, the ratifications of the respective Governments were never exchanged.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty and of the United States of America, have signed this present convention, and caused to be affixed thereto the seals of our arms.

Done at London, this 12th day of May, 1803.

The Secretary of State to Rufus King, minister, &c. of the United States to Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, July 28, 1801.

SIR:

By the treaty of peace, the mouth of the St. Croix is supposed to be in the bay of Fundy. But as the commissioners have, in their decision, settled the mouth of that river, called the Schoodiac, to be in Passamaquoddy Bay, at a place called Joe's point, it is left undetermined to which nation the islands in the last mentioned bay, and the passages through them, into the bay of Fundy, belong. It appears to have been the intention of the two nations, in adjusting their limits at the peace, to make navigable waters, where they were the boundary common to both, by a divisional line running through the middle of their channels. Hence, it is believed, that, if it be true that one of the passages from the mouth of the river, intended as the St. Croix, into Fundy bay, be seldom and imperfectly navigable, and the other constantly and completely so, it will be most conformable to the treaty of peace to establish it as the boundary. Supposing, on the other hand, that the treaty of peace should be literally executed, as far as practicable, and the line drawn from Joe's point, due eastwardly, Great Britain would be excluded from both passages. At present, it is believed that the following description of the passage to be settled as the boundary, would be satisfactory to both nations: "Beginning in the middle of the channel of the river St. Croix, at its mouth; thence, direct, to the middle of the channel, between Pleasant point and Deer island; thence, to the middle of the channel, between Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island and Campo Bello island on the west and south; and round the eastern point of Campo Bello island, to the bay of Fundy. The other (western) channel has a bar across it, which is dry at low water.

These ideas are thrown out only for consideration. I shall probably have it in my power shortly to transmit you a commission to settle this point, with definitive instructions. Meanwhile, you may break the business to the British ministry, but without implicating any fixed mode of settlement.

The Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 8, 1802.

SIR:

You will herewith receive a commission, giving you powers to adjust, by proper stipulations, with the British Government, whatever remains to be decided in relation to the boundary between the two nations.

In executing the first part of this trust, relating to the bay of Passamaquoddy, you will recur to the observations contained in my letter of the 28th of July last. I refer you also to a copy, herewith enclosed, of a letter from Judge Sullivan, heretofore agent of the United States, on the controversy regarding the river St. Croix, in answer to some inquiries from me on the subject now committed to you. His information and his reasoning will be useful in the discussion; and, to illustrate both, I also enclose herewith a copy of the map to which he refers in the beginning of his letter.

The essential objects to be secured to the United States are, the jurisdiction of Moose island, and the common navigation of the bay, and of the channels leading towards the sea between Deer island and the island of Campo Bello. To the observations of Judge Sullivan, in support of the rights of the United States, it need only be added, that the outlet through Moose island being the only adequate communication with the sea from a great and valuable territory of the United States, they are entitled to the full use of it on that principle, as well as on others, and with the less pretext for objection, as the trifling island of Campo Bello is the only territory held by Great Britain on one side of the channel.

In pursuance of the next object, viz: the establishment of boundaries between the United States and New Brunswick, on one side, and of Canada on another, it will be proper to provide for the immediate extension of the line which is to run from the south of the St. Croix, and which is represented as necessary to guard against interfering or encroaching grants under American and British authorities. As the course of this line is to be due north, and is to proceed from the point fixed by a survey already made, the running of it will be sufficiently provided for by an appointment of a commissioner by each of the two Governments, and an appointment, by the two commissioners, of a surveyor. In fixing the point at which the line is to terminate, and which is referred to as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the difficulty arises from a reference of the treaty of 1783 "to the highlands," which it is now found have no definite existence. To remove this difficulty, no better expedient occurs than to provide for the appointment of a third commissioner, as in article five, of the treaty of 1794; and to authorize the three to determine on a point most proper to be substituted for the description in the second article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic, from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence. The commissioners may also be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed, and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, namely, a line drawn along the said highlands, such a reference to intermediate sources of rivers, or other ascertained or ascertainable points, to be connected by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and as will best comport with the apparent intention of the treaty of 1783.

The remaining provision necessary to complete the boundary of the United States will be a stipulation amending the second article of the treaty of 1783, in its description of the line which is to connect the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods with the Mississippi. The description supposes that a line running due west from that point, would intersect the Mississippi. It is now well understood that the highest source of the Mississippi is south of the Lake of the Woods; and, consequently, that a line, due west, from its most northwestern point, would not touch any part of that river. To remedy this error, it may be agreed that the boundary of the United States, in that quarter, shall be a line running from that source of the Mississippi which is nearest to the Lake of the Woods, and striking it, westwardly, as a tangent, and, from the point touched, along the water-mark of the lake, to its most northwestern point, at which it will meet the line running through the lake. The map in McKenzie's late publication is probably the best to which I can refer you on this subject.

From the mutual and manifest advantage to Great Britain and the United States, of an adjustment of all uncertainties concerning boundary, it is hoped you will find a ready concurrence in all the propositions which you will have to make to them. Should difficulties or delays threaten those which relate to the boundary connecting the Mississippi and the Lake of the Woods, or that connecting the Connecticut river and the point to be established as the northeast corner of the United States, it will be proper to separate from these the other subjects of negotiation, and to hasten the latter to a conclusion.

With the highest respect and consideration, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

RUFUS KING, Esq.
Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.

BOSTON, May 20, 1802.

SIR:

Having the honor of receiving your letter of the 10th inst., I hasten to communicate to you my ideas of the subject matter of its contents.

When I was under a commission, as agent of the United States, on the controversy with Great Britain regarding the river St. Croix, I forwarded to the office of the Secretary of State a map of the bay of Passamaquoddy, of the Schoodiac, and of the lines of the whole dispute. That map was accurately and elegantly composed from astronomical observations and actual surveys. As that map is under your eye, there is no need of my sending a fac-simile; but I refer you to that for an explanation of this letter.

The treaty of 1783 with Great Britain evidently contemplates a river, as the St. Croix, which has its mouth in the bay of Fundy. Both rivers claimed by the parties empty their waters in the bay of Passamaquoddy. The agent of the United States urged the commissioners to settle the boundary through that bay to the sea; because the treaty expressly recognised the mouth of the river as in the bay of Fundy, which is a limb of the ocean, and the other bay united with it might be considered as the river's mouth; but they declined it, on an idea that their commission extended no further than to an authority to find the mouth and source of the river, and that, let whichever would be the river, it had its mouth three leagues from the sea, in Passamaquoddy bay; they, therefore, limited their decision on its southerly line, to a point between St. Andrews and the shore of the United States.

The whole of the waters of Passamaquoddy, eastward and northward of Moose island, and of the island of Campo Bello, are navigable for vessels of any burthen. The channel between Moose and Deer island is the best. The channel between Moose island and the continent of the United States is shoal, narrow, and not navigable for vessels of consequence. That between Campo Bello and the main, called the west passage, is rendered hazardous and dangerous by a bar of rocks, and is so narrow and shoal, that no vessel of considerable size will be risked there excepting on a fair wind, and at the top of high water. The tides there are exceedingly rapid, and rise near about fifty feet. Therefore, any settlement which would deprive the United States of a free navigation, as far to the eastward and northward as the channel you propose, that is, to the one between Moose and Deer islands, and north of Campo Bello, would ultimately destroy the important commerce and valuable navigation of an extensive territory within the United States; for, as you may observe on the maps, there is no river of consequence between the Schoodiac and the Penobscot; and that the waters which issue from numerous and extensive lakes, in the interior parts of the country, running into the sea, as the Schoodiac, will give an advantageous and invaluable transportation to the articles of commerce.

Your construction of the treaty of 1783, which renders the waters dividing the nations common to both, (where they are navigable,) must be reasonable and just. The English people have, in many instances, practised upon the treaty under such a construction. There has been no interruption to the American navigation, in any part of Passamaquoddy bay; but our vessels have proceeded through that bay to the shore of the United States, at and near Moose island, and have gone into the Schoodiac, above St. Andrew's point, and anchored on the western side of the channel, where they have discharged their cargoes. There have been some seizures where goods have been carried from those vessels over to the English side, but the goods have been condemned, and the vessel discharged. These seizures being made within the jurisdiction of the United States, as to the vessels, were clearly infractions of the law of nations.

There was a seizure lately made of a vessel of one Goddard of Boston. She was taken from her anchor on the American side of the channel, in the river established by the commissioners as the St. Croix, and carried over to New Brunswick: but she was acquitted by the court of admiralty, with damages and costs. Campbell, who made the seizure, appealed to England, merely to avoid the costs and damages, where the cause is now depending under the attention of Robert Slade, a proctor, who is the advocate for Mr. Goddard.

There is a clause in the treaty, that the United States shall comprehend the islands within twenty leagues of any of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines drawn due east from the aforesaid boundaries, between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other, as they shall respectively touch the bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean. This circumstance, that the mouth of the St. Croix is settled to be between St. Andrew's point on the east, and the American shore on the west, three leagues within the island of Campo Bello, draws this consequence to the treaty, that nearly all the islands in Passamaquoddy bay are within the United States, by the above provision in the treaty, unless they are taken out by an exception, which I shall presently notice. A line, due east (as you will see on the plan) from the Schoodiac mouth at St. Andrew's point, takes in nearly all the bay. A line south, sixty-seven degrees east, will go to the north of Campo Bello, and take two-thirds of Deer island on the west. A southeast line, from the middle of the Schoodiac mouth, passes on the channel between Moose and Deer islands, and through the centre of Campo Bello.

The consequences attached to this provision may be, in some measure, controlled by an exception annexed to it in these words, "excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the province of Nova Scotia."

The island of Campo Bello is confessedly within the exception, and, therefore, it may be said that the principle of common privilege to navigable waters will not give our nation a right to a navigation northward of, and between, that and the other islands in the bay, because that they, being all within the same exception, the right of a common navigation in both nations may not extend to the waters between that and them. But the answer to this is, that the clause establishes the jurisdiction of the United States, by lines which clearly include all the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, and all within the bay of Fundy comprehended to the south of the east line drawn from St. Croix; while the exception can extend only to the islands formerly within the jurisdiction of Nova Scotia, inclusive of the privileges necessary to the occupancy of them. The principle, therefore, of the common right to navigation or navigable waters which divide two nations, cannot apply here; because, in that case, the line of national jurisdiction seems to be settled on the channel; but here, in this case, the jurisdiction is definite, express, and ceded, according to the lines agreed on, as above described.

The ancient charter of Nova Scotia to Sir William Alexander, in 1638, included all the country from the Kennebeck to the bay of Chaleur. The treaty cannot mean, by the expression "heretofore within Nova Scotia," all the islands in that charter. If it mean the islands which were within a more recent description of it, where the boundary westward was the St. Croix, excluding the territory of Acadia, which was placed under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, by the charter of that province in 1692, and bounded on that river. The river Schoodiac being now the established St. Croix, there can be no question in regard to Massachusetts extending to the channel where it joins that river. But Moose island, which I have described before, lies two leagues below what the commissioners made the mouth of the St. Croix: and very near the American shore. This was never granted by the crown of England, or by the Government of Nova Scotia, before the treaty of peace; nor was there ever an occupancy of it by subjects acknowledging the authority of Nova Scotia; nor did that province ever attempt to exercise authority there. Long before the revolutionary war, it was in the occupancy of people of, and from, the late province of Massachusetts bay. The soil has, I believe, been granted by that province, or by the State since the revolution, to the people who had it in possession. I do not know the date of the grant. There have been, as I am informed, recent grants by the province of New Brunswick of that island; but no formal claim on the part of the English nation has been made to it. The grantees of that province, who have speculated on the pretended right of the English nation, have excited civil officers, under the authority of the province of New Brunswick, to attempt to execute precepts there. These attempts were repelled, and I have not heard that they have been recently renewed. Should the jurisdiction of that island be found within the English authority, there can be no doubt how the right of property would be settled. This renders the dispute of consequence to the commonwealth of Massachusetts in a pecuniary point of view.

If the argument above stated does not prove that the jurisdiction of the United States is extended to all the waters of Passamaquoddy bay, but that the treaty leaves the navigable waters of the same, which form the natural boundaries common to both, it is of great consequence, that any claim made under the crown of the English empire to Moose island should be subverted. But if their having the island under the reservatory exception does not deprive the United States of the jurisdiction on all the waters southward of the east line, drawn from the mouth of he Schoodiac, the consideration of the property alone gives consequence to the question.

The channel where the waters more directly issue from the Schoodiac to the bay of Fundy, between Moose and Deer islands, and between Deer island and Campo Bello, as described in your letter of instructions to the minister, is quite adequate to all navigation of our country.

You mention a resolve of the Legislature, wherein the subject of the navigation in Passamaquoddy bay is mentioned. I have attended to a resolve of the tenth of March, which proposes that the Governor should request the President of the United States to take measures for settling the disputed jurisdiction to certain islands in Passamaquoddy bay; but I do not know of any dispute in that bay as to islands, excepting what I have stated as to Moose island.

The settlement and plain establishment of a line from the head or source of the Cheputnatecook, which is the source of the St. Croix, and empties its waters through a long chain of lakes into the Schoodiac, has become necessary, because that Massachusetts is making grants of the lands in that quarter, and the province of New Brunswick is in the same practice, controversies may be created by interfering locations in pursuance of, or under pretence of, those grants. Such controversies can have no guide to their adjustment, excepting lines drawn through a vast extent of wilderness, where many known and unknown causes will effect the magnetic variations. These disputes on national, or even colonial, or State jurisdiction, are not easily settled when they are connected with private claims.

By the treaty of peace, it is provided that the boundaries shall be "from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz. that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north, from the source of the St. Croix, to the highlands; along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river."

You will see by the maps of that part of the country, that the line which runs north from the source of the St. Croix, crosses the river St. John a great way south of any place which could be supposed to be the highlands; but where that line will come to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and find its termination, is not easy to discover.

The boundary between Nova Scotia and Canada was described, by the King's proclamation, in the same mode of expression as that used in the treaty of peace. Commissioners who were appointed to settle that line, have traversed the country in vain to find the highlands designated as a boundary. I have seen one of them, who agrees with the account I have had from the natives and others, that there are no mountains or highlands on the southerly side of the St. Lawrence, and northeastward of the river Chaudiere. That, from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to that river, there is a vast extent of high flat country, thousands of feet above the level of the sea, in perpendicular height; being a morass of millions of acres, from whence issue numerous streams and rivers, and from which a great number of lakes are filled by drains. That the rivers originating in this elevated swamp pass each other wide asunder, many miles in opposite courses, some to the St. Lawrence, and some to the Atlantic sea.

Should this description be founded in fact, nothing can be effectively done, as to a Canada line, without a commission to ascertain and settle the place of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, wherever that may be agreed to be: if there is no mountain or natural monument, an artificial one may be raised. From thence, the line westward to Connecticut river may be established by artificial monuments erected at certain distances from each other; the points of compass from the one to the other may be taken; and the ascertaining the degree of latitude, which each one is placed on from actual observation, may be very useful. Though there is no such chain of mountains as the plans or maps of the country represent under the appellation of the highlands, yet there are eminences from whence an horizon may be made to fix the latitude from common quadrant observations.

In the description of the morass, which is said to crown the heights between the United States and Lower Canada, it ought to have been noticed, that, though those swamps are vastly extensive, yet, in the acclivity from the Atlantic to their highest elevation, as well as in their declivity to the St. Lawrence, great tracts of valuable country are interspersed. On the banks of the river Chaudiere, and perhaps on the banks of other rivers, running to the St. Lawrence, the settlements are approaching fast towards those of the United States. This circumstance will soon render an established line of national jurisdiction absolutely necessary.

Should there be any thing within my power which will give aid to the Government on this occasion, you will please to command me.

I am, sir, with sentiments of sincere respect, your most humble servant,

JAS. SULLIVAN.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Esq. Secretary of State for the United States of America.

Mr. Gore to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, October 6, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters to Mr. King, under the following dates, viz: 8th June, 20th, 23d, and 26th of July, and 23d of August; the latter by Mr. Brent: all of which came to hand since his absence from this place. That of June 8th, covering commission and instructions to this gentleman to adjust whatever remains to be decided in relation to the boundaries between the United States and the British Government, was received, and forwarded to him before he left Harwich.

According to his desire, and with a view to expedite the business, I requested an interview of Lord Hawkesbury, for the purpose of making to him such communications on this subject as might enable him to enter on the negotiation with effect, on the return of Mr. King. After having opened the business at our first meeting, he requested it might lay over until Mr. Hammond, the under Secretary of State, should come from the seaside, where he then was for his health, to afford him an opportunity of conferring with this gentleman, who was much acquainted with the business to which the communication referred. On Mr. Hammond's arrival, I saw Lord Hawkesbury, and, with the map of the St. Croix, as reported by the commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, and Arrowsmith's map of the United States, endeavored to trace out the boundaries that were still requisite to explain to him the views of the President, and to impress on his mind the reasonableness and justice thereof, in regard to the British nation. He appeared disposed to accede to the propositions, so far as they relate to the boundary line through the Passamaquoddy, the mode suggested of adjusting that between the United States and New Brunswick, and fixing the point intended in the treaty of 1783, by the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and establishing the boundary between such point and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. It is, however, to be understood, that the disposition manifested by his lordship was founded on the belief that, on inquiry, he should find the islands in Passamaquoddy bay to have been possessed by, and to belong to, the respective nations as the proposed line would place them; and that, on further reflection, no insurmountable objection should occur to the plan proposed for running the other lines and fixing the point referred to. On these subjects, he doubtless intends to consult with Colonel Barclay, the British commissioner for ascertaining the St. Croix, who is now in some part of Great Britain, and who is expected in London early in the winter. On that part of the boundary which is to connect the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods with the Mississippi, he observed that it was evidently the intention of the treaty of peace that both nations should have access to, and enjoy the free use of that river; and he doubtless meant that this access should be to each nation through their own territories. He remarked, that commissions, which I had proposed for ascertaining the relation of the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi, if any doubt remained on this head, and running the line between these two waters, according to your proposition, might establish such a boundary as would secure to each nation this object. To the remark I made no reply, other than by observing that the line suggested was what naturally seemed to be demanded by just interpretation, where such a mistake had happened, as was herein supposed; but this I did, however, chiefly with a view of not assenting to his proposal, and in a manner rather declining than courting the discussion. It will probably be persisted in; and I much doubt if this Government will be inclined to adjust any boundary in this quarter, that has not the right desired for its basis.

I have considered it important to apprise you of the view entertained by the British Government in this respect, that the President may have an opportunity, if he should choose, to forward Mr. King any instructions relative to the boundary in question. The papers marked A, herewith enclosed, are copies of the notes that passed from me to Lord Hawkesbury, and minutes of the proposals made him in conversation, and traced out on the maps before mentioned, and of his note in reply. These, with the above detail of what passed in conversation, will communicate to you all that has been, or probably will be, done on this subject, before Mr. King's return, which may be expected in November, and doubtless before Lord Hawkesbury will have an opportunity of consulting the persons alluded to in his note.

Your letter of 20th July, with the enclosed copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Comptroller, respecting the portages, or carrying places, and the exemption from duty of small vessels trading between the northern and northwestern boundaries, came to hand on the 10th of September, and I lost no time in stating their contents to Lord Hawkesbury in a note, (copy whereof is herewith enclosed,) in order to rebut any argument in favor of the pretensions of the British traders, from a supposed acquiescence on the part of the Government of the United States, and to insist on such a construction of the terms, portages, and carrying places, as might comport with the safety of the revenue of the United States, and the interest of their citizens. I afterwards had a conference with him on this subject, in which he acceded to the construction contained in my note; and, as to the tonnage duty, he said it certainly merited, and should receive, all due consideration.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

C. GORE.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, August 24, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to inform him that, since the departure of Mr. King, he has received for this gentleman instructions and a full power from the President of the United States, to adjust, by amicable negotiation, with the Government of His Britannic Majesty, whatever remains unsettled as to the boundaries between the territories of the two nations.

Mr. Gore takes the liberty of proposing to his lordship to communicate to him, whenever he shall be at leisure to attend thereto, the views of the President of the United States in order that his lordship may give to the subject such consideration as he shall think its importance requires: and that, having a distinct knowledge thereof, his lordship may, on the return of Mr. King, be enabled to concur in such measures for defining and settling the boundary lines between the two countries, as shall appear most conducive to their mutual interests and future harmony.

Mr. Gore flatters himself that Lord Hawkesbury will see, in this proposal of the President, a new proof of the sincere and earnest desire of the Government of the United States to live in friendship with that of His Britannic Majesty, inasmuch as it invites to an adjustment, by amicable negotiation, of not only whatever may now be the occasion of inquietude between the parties, but also of every thing, as far as can be foreseen, which may interrupt in future that good understanding so essential to the interests and happiness of both nations.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, September 22, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to inform him that the President of the United States, ever desirous to continue uninterrupted the harmony so happily subsisting between the Government of said States and that of His Britannic Majesty, and by a constant vigilance and unremitted attention to every circumstance that might have a tendency, however remote, to disturb the same, in order to prevent its effect by such seasonable interposition as the occasion may require, has given directions that it should be represented to His Majesty's Government, that certain traders, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, have set up pretensions to transport goods and merchandise, free of duty, through certain rivers, and over tracts of country, in the northwestern parts of the United States, and entirely within their jurisdiction, under the clause of the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the said United States and His Britannic Majesty, which provides "that no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages, or carrying places, on either side, for the purpose of being immediately re-embarked, and carried to some other place or places."

Mr. Gore flatters himself that, if his lordship should take the trouble to look into the article referred to, he will see that such claims derive no support from the most liberal construction of the terms relied on, namely, the right to carry goods, exempt from duty, "over portages or carrying places;" and that these words, so used, can never intend other cases than where the waters forming a boundary between the parties become unnavigable, and where a transit by land is thence required and resorted to, in order to re-enter the common waters where they are again navigable.

While the United States are actuated by the most sincere and earnest desire to give every facility to the trade and commerce of the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, not inconsistent with a due regard to the rights of their own citizens, and the safety of their revenue, they have been obliged to resist, as incompatible with these, pretensions so unauthorized, and must speedily make such regulations in this respect, as the security of their public revenue renders indispensable; not, however, interfering, in the smallest degree, with the rights of His Britannic Majesty's subjects, under the stipulations of said treaty, which will always be held sacred by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Gore has also the honor, according to the instructions of his Government, to represent to Lord Hawkesbury, that the Congress of the United States, with a view to render the intercourse as convenient and free as possible to their citizens and the subjects of His Britannic Majesty living in the north and northwestern boundaries of said States, and in the British provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and thereby promote a good understanding between the inhabitants thereof, by removing all impositions on the vessels of either trading there, at their last session passed an act to exempt from tonnage duty all vessels, whether British or American, not above fifty tons burthen, trading between the ports of the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States, and the British provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

He is also directed further to represent to His Majesty's Government, that vessels of the United States, in the British ports, within the same waters, are subject to a duty of six cents per ton. The disposition manifested by His Majesty's Government to concur in equalizing the situation of vessels of the two countries, and to do it rather by abolishing than assimilating the duties on them, raises an expectation, on the part of the President of the United States, that His Majesty's Government will be disposed to place vessels belonging to citizens of said States, in such British ports, on an equality with those of the subjects of His Majesty in the ports of the United States within said waters.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, September 28, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to transmit, herewith enclosed, minutes of what he took the liberty to suggest, in conversation with his lordship this morning, relative to the unascertained boundaries between the United States and the possessions of His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. Gore requests his lordship will please to consider them, conformably to his declaration then personally made to his lordship, as intended to afford a general idea of the views of the President of the United States on the subject to which they relate, rather than containing proposals not liable to modification, at the will of the American Government, or its representative; it being distinctly understood that the same may be altered as reflection shall suggest to Mr. King, or any other person to whom the negotiation may be committed, at a future day, should it not be finished by this gentleman in the ensuing winter, of which, however, Mr. Gore will not permit himself to doubt, as so many reasons concur to evince the fitness of the present time for adjusting and establishing, for the mutual benefit of the parties, the boundaries referred to; which, being left open and unsettled, until, as the natural and almost inevitable consequence of such a state of things, private gain and individual passion shall intermingle themselves in the question, will prove the most fruitful source of difference and misunderstanding between two nations whose essential interests demand the most amicable and friendly intercourse.

MINUTES, &c.

Boundaries from the mouth of the St. Croix, through the Bay of Passamaquoddy, and to the Atlantic ocean.

Beginning in the middle of the river St. Croix, at its mouth; thence, direct to the channel between Pleasant point and Dear island on the east and north, and Moose island and Campo Bello on the west and south, and round the northeastern point of Campo Bello island, to the bay of Fundy.

Boundaries between the United States and New Brunswick.

In tracing and establishing the boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, there may be some question what are the highlands intended by the treaty of peace?

To run the line from the source of the St. Croix, and fix the point at which it is to terminate, no mode more proper seems to suggest itself than that of instituting a commission, and appointing commissioners, as in the fifth article of the treaty of 1794; the report of whom to ascertain and establish this part of the boundary, as in the second article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the idea that the line ought to terminate on the ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence.

The same commissioners may be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, a line drawn along the said highlands, with such reference to intermediate sources of rivers by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and best comport with the apparent intentions of the treaty of 1783.

Boundary from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi.

The second article of the treaty of 1783 supposes that the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods may be connected with the Mississippi, by running a line due west from that point, and that a line so drawn would intersect that river.

The highest source of the Mississippi is now supposed to be south of the Lake of the Woods, and, consequently, a line due west from its northwest point will not touch any part of said river.

If this be true, some provision is necessary to complete the boundary of the United States and the British possessions in this quarter, by amending the second article of the treaty of 1783 in that respect, according to the stipulations of the fourth article of the treaty of 1794.

Supposing the most northern branch of the source of the Mississippi to be south of the Lake of the Woods, as seems now to be understood, it is suggested, as consistent with justice and the mutual convenience of the parties, to establish the boundary of the United States in this quarter, by a line running from that source of the Mississippi which is nearest to the Lake of the Woods, and striking it westwardly, as a tangent, and from the point touched along the watermark of the lake to its most northwestern point, at which it will meet the line running through the lake.

Commissioners might be appointed to ascertain the local relation of the Mississippi to the Lake of the Woods, and, if as was supposed by the treaty of peace, to run the line there agreed on. But if the relative situation of these two waters be as now believed, to establish the boundary by running a line as above described.

 To the original were added the second article of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783; the fourth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, &c. of 1794, (both which articles relate to the boundaries;) and the following Extract from Mackenzie's voyage.

"The Lake of the Woods is in latitude 49° 37′ north, and longitude 94° 31′ west.

"The northernmost branch of the source of the Mississippi is in latitude 47° 38′ north, and longitude 95° 6′ west, ascertained by Mr. Thomson, astronomer to the Northwest Company, who was sent expressly for that purpose in the spring of 1798. He in the same year determined the northern bend of the Missouri to be in latitude 47° 32′ north, longitude 101° 25′ west; so that, if the Missouri were even to be considered as the Mississippi, no western line could strike it."—History of the Fur Trade, page 85.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Gore.

DOWNING STREET, October 4, 1802.

Lord Hawkesbury presents his compliments to Mr. Gore, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his note of the 28th ultimo, together with the minutes which were enclosed in it.

Lord Hawkesbury is fully sensible of the expediency of adjusting, by some definitive arrangement, the several points to which those minutes refer, and will be ready to enter into a negotiation for that purpose either with Mr. Gore or with Mr. King, within as short a period as the circumstances of the case will conveniently admit. In the mean time, it may perhaps be necessary for Lord Hawkesbury to obtain information from persons in this country on some of the subjects which are likely to be brought into discussion. But Mr. Gore may be assured that Lord Hawkesbury is desirous of avoiding any unnecessary delay, and that he will feel the sincerest disposition to terminate the negotiation in such a manner as may be reciprocally advantageous both to Great Britain and to the United States, as may tend, by removing all causes of future dispute, to improve and conciliate the harmony and good understanding which so happily subsists between the two countries, and which are so essential to their several interests and prosperity.

Extract:—The Secretary of State to Rufus King, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 16, 1802.

By the communications of the 6th day of October, received from Mr. Gore, it appears that the proposition for adjusting the boundary in the northwest corner of the United States is not relished by the British Government.

The proposition was considered by the President as a liberal one, inasmuch as the more obvious remedy for the error of the treaty would have been by a line running due north from the most northern source of the Mississippi, and intersecting the line running due west from the Lake of the Woods; and inasmuch as the branch leading nearest the Lake of the Woods may not be the longest or most navigable one, and may, consequently, favor the wish of the British Government to have access to the latter. The proposition, for these reasons, would not have been made but from a desire to take advantage of the present friendly dispositions of the parties for the purpose of closing all questions of boundary between them. As it is not probable, however, that the settlement of this particular boundary will for some time be material, and as the adjustment proposed is not viewed by the British Government in the same light as by the President, it is thought proper that it should not for the present be pursued; and that the other questions of boundary should be adjusted with as little delay as possible. In the mean time, further information with respect to the head waters of the Mississippi, and the country connected with them, may be sought by both parties; it being understood that the United States will be as free to be guided by the result of such inquiries, in any future negotiation, as if the proposition above referred to had never been made by them. Should it be most agreeable to the British Government to have an early survey instituted, with a view to a proper boundary in this case, the President authorizes you to concur in such an arrangement.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, February 28, 1803.

SIR:

I have duly received your letters of 16th and 23d December. By Lord Hawkesbury's desire, I have conferred with Colonel Barclay respecting the continuation of the boundary through the bay of Passamaquoddy, who has made no objection to the line we have proposed, though he appears to think that it would be improper to cede to us the island of Campo Bello, unless the cession should be desired by its inhabitants. No objection has been made to our title to Moose island; and, at present, I foresee nothing to impede a settlement of this boundary, except the difficulty of engaging the minister to bestow upon the subject sufficient time to understand it. With regard to the line between the source of the St. Croix and the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, I have no reason to suppose there will be any objection to its being ascertained in the way we have proposed. Not having been able to fix the attention of Lord Hawkesbury upon the subject, I am not able to give you any information concerning the line between the northwest corner of Nova Scotia and the head of Connecticut river, or between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, May 13, 1803.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the convention which I yesterday signed, in triplicate, with Lord Hawkesbury, relative to our boundaries.

The convention does not vary in any thing material from the tenor of my instructions. The line through the bay of Passamaquoddy secures our interest in that quarter. The provision for running, instead of describing, the line between the northwest corner of Nova Scotia and the source of the Connecticut river has been inserted, as well on account of the progress of the British settlements towards the source of the Connecticut, as of the difficulty in agreeing upon any new description of the manner of running this line, without more exact information than is at present possessed of the geography of the country.

The source of the Mississippi nearest to the Lake of the Woods, according to McKenzie's report, will be found about twenty-nine miles to the westward of any part of that lake, which is represented to be nearly circular. Hence, a direct line between the northwesternmost part of the lake, and the nearest source of the Mississippi, which is preferred by this Government, has appeared to me equally advantageous with the lines we had proposed.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Report of the Committee of the Senate on the foregoing Convention.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee to whom the treaty with Great Britain, signed at London, on the 12th of May, 1803, was referred, reported thereon, as follows:

That, from the information they have obtained, they are satisfied that the said treaty was drawn up by Mr. King three weeks before the signature of the treaty with the French republic of the 30th of April, and signed by Lord Hawkesbury, without the alteration of a word; and that it had, in the intention of our minister, no reference whatsoever to the said treaty with the French republic, inasmuch as he had no knowledge of its existence. But, not having the means of ascertaining the precise northern limits of Louisiana, as ceded to the United States, the committee can give no opinion whether the line to be drawn, by virtue of the third article of the said treaty with Great Britain, would interfere with the said northern limits of Louisiana or not.

[The following papers were communicated to the Senate with the foregoing report.]

Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State.

SIR: DECEMBER 16, 1803.

Some difficulty having arisen in the Senate, in considering the expediency of advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty of limits between the United States and Great Britain, signed on the 12th of May, 1803, a committee of that body has been appointed to inquire and report upon the subject.

The difficulty arises from the circumstance that the treaty with the French republic, containing the cession of Louisiana, was signed on the 30th of April, 1803, twelve days earlier than that with Great Britain; and some apprehension is entertained that the boundary line, contemplated in the third [fifth] article of the latter, may, by a possible future construction, be pretended to operate as a limitation to the claims of territory acquired by the United States in the former of these instruments.

But as the ratification, if it can be effected without unnecessary delay, is a desirable object, it has occurred to the committee that Mr. King may possibly have it in his power to give information which might remove the obstacle. I have, therefore, in behalf of the committee, to ask, whether, from any information in possession of your Department, or which may be obtained, in such manner as you may deem expedient, it can be ascertained whether the third article of the treaty with Great Britain was concluded with any reference whatsoever to that with the French republic, or with any right or claim which the United States have acquired by it.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Adams.

DECEMBER 16, 1803.

SIR:

Having transmitted to Mr. King the inquiry contained in your letter of ——, I have received the answer, of which a copy is enclosed. The Office of State possesses no further information on the particular point in question with the committee.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Rufus King to the Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, December 9, 1803.

SIR:

The draught of the convention with Great Britain respecting boundaries, having been settled in previous conferences, was drawn up and sent by me to Lord Hawkesbury on the 11th of April; on the 12th of May the convention was signed, without the alteration of a word of the original draught; and, on the 15th of May, the letter of Messrs. Livingston and Monroe, (a copy of which was annexed to my No. 100,) announcing the treaty of cession with France, was received and communicated by me to Lord Hawkesbury. At the date of the signature of the convention with Great Britain, I had no knowledge of the treaty with France; and have reason to be satisfied that Lord Hawkesbury was equally uninformed of it. It results, that the convention with Great Britain was concluded without any reference whatsoever to the treaty of cession with France.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your most obedient faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

SECRETARY OF STATE.

[The following resolution was passed by the Senate.]

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 9, 1804.

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the convention between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, for fixing the boundaries between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at London, May 12, 1803, with the exception of the fifth article.

MOROCCO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 4, 1803.

NOVEMBER 4, 1803.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

By the copy, now communicated, of a letter from Captain Bainbridge, of the Philadelphia frigate, to our consul at Gibraltar, you will learn that an act of hostility has been committed on a merchant vessel of the United States, by an armed ship of the Emperor of Morocco. This conduct, on the part of that Power, is without cause and without explanation. It is fortunate that Captain Bainbridge fell in with and took the capturing vessel and her prize. And I have the satisfaction to inform you, that, about the date of this transaction, such a force would be arriving in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, both from the east and from the west, as leaves less to be feared for our commerce, from the suddenness of the aggression.

On the 4th of September, the Constitution frigate, Captain Preble, with Mr. Lear on board, was within two days' sail of Gibraltar, where the Philadelphia would then be arrived with her prize, and such explanations would probably be instituted as the state of things required, and as might, perhaps, arrest the progress of hostilities.

In the mean while it is for Congress to consider the provisional authorities which may be necessary to restrain the depredations of this Power, should they be continued.

TH: JEFFERSON.

U. S. FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA, east of Malaga about ten miles,

MONDAY, August 29, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

I wrote you from Gibraltar on the 24th inst. mentioning that we should sail the next morning for Malta.

Hearing at the Rock that two Tripolitans were off Cape de Gatt, made me proceed with all expedition to examine that part of the Spanish coast. On the 26th, it blowing very fresh, at 8 P. M. being nearly up with Cape de Gatt, fell in with a ship carrying only her foresail, which had a brig in company, under the same sail. It being night, and her guns housed, prevented an immediate discovery of her being a cruiser. After hailing for some time, found that she was a vessel of war from Barbary. On which information, I caused her boat to be sent on board the frigate Philadelphia, with her passports, from which I discovered that she was a cruiser belonging to the Emperor of Morocco, called Meshboha, commanded by Ibraham Subarez, mounting twenty-two guns, and manned with one hundred men. By not making ourselves known to the officer who came on board, he confessed that the brig in company was an American, and had been with them three or four days; was bound to some port in Spain; had been boarded by them, but not detained. The low sail the brig was under induced me to suspect that they had captured her, notwithstanding their having your passport, which it must appear from the sequel was only obtained to protect them against the American ships of war. I sent my first lieutenant on board, to examine if they had any American prisoners. On his attempting to execute my orders, he was prevented by the captain of the cruiser. This increased my suspicion, and I sent a boat with armed men to enforce my intentions. After they were on board, they found Captain Richard Bowen, of the American brig Celia, owned by Mr. Amasas Thyer, of Boston, and several of his crew, who were taken the 17th inst. from Barcelona, bound to Malaga, within two or three leagues of the Spanish shore, and about twenty-five miles to the eastward of Malaga. The captain and the crew they had confined below deck, which they always did when speaking a vessel. After making this discovery, I instantly ordered all the Moorish officers on board the frigate, for I made no hesitation in capturing her after such proceedings on their part, and violation of the faith of passports, which ought to be sacred. Owing to the high wind and sea, it took me the greatest part of the night to get the prisoners on board, and man the prize; which detention occasioned losing sight of the brig. The following morning, discovering many vessels in divers directions, the day was spent by the frigate and prize in chasing to find the captured brig. About 4 P. M. made her coming round the Cape de Gatt from the eastward, standing close in shore for Almeira bay, owing to the wind being very fresh. We were going slow in approaching her: the greatest exertions were made by Lieutenant Cox, in towing and rowing the prize. Fortunately, the wind increased in the evening, and we recaptured her at 12 o'clock at night. The Moors confessed that they came out cruising for the sole purpose of capturing Americans to be sent to Tangier. I have received a paper from them, written in Moorish, which they say is their authority from the Governor of Tangier for so doing. I enclose this to John Gavine, Esq. with a particular request to have it safely conveyed to you, that you may be informed of the circumstances, and act accordingly. I believe the Governor of Tangier is much disposed for hostilities with the United States: the Moorish prisoners accuse him as the sole cause of their present situation. I sincerely hope that this capture may be productive of good effects to the United States with the Emperor, who may be assured that if he unjustly goes to war with the United States he will lose every large cruiser he has; and God grant that it may not in the least prove a disadvantage to you. My officers and self have made it a marked point to treat the prisoners not only with the lenity that is due from humanity, but with particular attention of civility, to impress on their minds a favorable opinion of the American character. That you may receive this information as early as possible, I despatch my boat on shore at Malaga, to request W. Kirkpatrick, Esq. consul, to forward it by express to Gibraltar. I shall be extremely anxious to hear from you, as also for the arrival of Commodore Preble, to receive his instructions relative to the captured ships. I am bound to Gibraltar bay with the prize, but am fearful we shall be detained for want of an eastwardly wind.

I am, &c.

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

JAMES SIMPSON, Esq.

MOROCCO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 5, 1803.

DECEMBER 5, 1803.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the act of hostility mentioned in my message of the 4th of November, to have been committed by a cruiser of the Emperor of Morocco on a vessel of the United States, has been disavowed by the Emperor. All differences in consequence thereof have been amicably adjusted, and the treaty of 1786 between this country and that has been recognised and confirmed by the Emperor, each party restoring to the other what had been detained or taken. I enclose the Emperor's orders given on this occasion.

The conduct of our officers, generally, who have had a part in these transactions, has merited entire approbation. The temperate and correct course pursued by our consul, Mr. Simpson, the promptitude and energy of Commodore Preble, the efficacious co-operation of Captains Rodgers and Campbell of the returning squadron, the proper decision of Captain Bainbridge, that a vessel which had committed an open hostility was of right to be detained for inquiry and consideration, and the general zeal of the other officers and men, are honorable facts which I make known with pleasure. And to these I add, what was indeed transacted in another quarter, the gallant enterprise of Captain Rodgers, in destroying, on the coast of Tripoli, a corvette of that Power of twenty-two guns. I recommend to the consideration of Congress a just indemnification for the interests acquired by the captors of the Mishouda and Mirboha, yielded by them for the public accommodation.

Know all those who shall see this noble writing—all our Governors—those encharged with our affairs, and captains of our vessels, that the American nation are still, as they were, in peace and friendship with our person exalted by God.

Their vessels are safe both at sea and in port, and so are their merchants; and you are not to disturb the peace between us and them. What has happened with their and our vessels, has only been an affair among the vessels; but the said nation continues respected as they were with us, and under all security, and equally so their vessels.

Wherefore, we hereby order that all those of our Governor; those encharged with the command of our ports, and captains of our vessels who shall see this writing, that they act in all respects for the fulfilment of this order, and that they do not deviate therefrom; those who shall contravene it will be punished with a severe punishment.

This order was given on the 21st Chemadi, the second in the year 1218, (9th October, 1803,) and at last we are in peace and friendship with the said American nation, as our father (to whom God be merciful,) was, according to the treaty made on the first day of Rhamadan, in the year 1200.

Our servant the Governor Ben Abdel Sadak, and all officers of our port of Mogadore: May God assist you. Peace, with the mercy and blessing of God, be with you.

Now know ye, that the Almighty having reconciled what had happened with the American nation because of the acts of the vessels, and that we are now, as we were before, with them in peace and friendship, as settled with our father, (to whom God be merciful!)—Take care—take care that none of you do any thing against them, or show them any disrespect or disregard, for they are, as they were, in friendship and in peace, and we have increased our regard for them, in consequence of the friendship they have manifested to our person, which God has exalted. And we order that you be careful and diligent in all their concerns, and we order that you do well with their vessels and with their merchants. Peace be with you all.

IMPRESSMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 5, 1803.

DECEMBER 5, 1803.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the desire of the Senate, expressed in their resolution of the 22d of November, on the impressment of seamen in the service of the United States by the agents of foreign nations, I now lay before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, with a specification of the cases of which information has been received.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 2, 1803.

SIR:

Agreeably to a resolution of the Senate, passed on the 22d of last month, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before them such information as may have been received relative to the violation of the flag of the United States, or to the impressment of any seamen in the service of the United States, by the agents of any foreign nation, I do myself the honor to transmit to you the enclosed abstract of impressments of persons belonging to American vessels, which, with the annexed extracts from the letters of some of our agents abroad, comprises all the information on the subject that has been received by this Department since the report to Congress, at its last session, relative to seamen. To the first mentioned document I have added a summary, showing the number of citizens of the United States impressed, and distinguishing those who had protections as citizens; those who are stated to be natives of the British dominions, and not stated to be naturalized as citizens; and those of all other countries, who are equally not stated to have been naturalized in the United States.

Another source of injury to our neutral navigation has taken place in the blockade of Guadaloupe and Martinique, as notified in the annexed letter from Mr. Barclay, Consul General of His Britannic Majesty for the eastern States.

Besides the above, I have received no official information of any material violations of our flag during the present European war, except in the recent aggressions of the Emperor of Morocco.

With very high respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Abstract of impressments of seamen belonging to American vessels, by the agents of foreign nations.

Edward Bass, a native of Philadelphia, impressed at London some time in March or April last, and put on board of the Mars. This man had been impressed into the British service during the late war, and was confined therein until peace. Upon the breaking out of war again, as he was on the point of departing for this country, he was impressed a second time into the British service. He was without a custom-house protection.

Robert Carter Gilliam, native of Sussex county, Virginia, impressed from the American vessel Warren, then lying at the port of London, in March or April last. He was without a protection.

John Leland Wade, native of Bristol county, Massachusetts, (having lost his protection,) was impressed at Liverpool in April last, from the brig Mahela Winsor, and put into the Courageux.

William Wall, Henry Clark, and James Clark, Irishmen, not stated to be citizens of the United States, impressed at London the 10th May, from the American ship Industry. No protections.

Christopher Tillinghast, native of North Kingston, Rhode Island, impressed into the British ship Loire, off Ireland, on the high seas, on the 20th May, from the American ship Sterling. Without a protection.

John Robberts and John Backham, the former a Dane, and the latter a Swede, impressed on the 25th May, in the North sea, from the American ship Shepherdess, John Bryan, Master, into the British frigate Amelia, Lord Proby, master. Without protections.

Barnabas Otis, junior, native of Plymouth, Massachusetts, impressed on the 29th May, in the English channel, into the British frigate Immortalité, —— Owens, commander, from the American brig Hannah. No protection.

Samuel Wilson, a native of Maryland, Andrew Sampson, and Peter Thompson, natives of Curacoa and Norway, but American citizens, impressed on the 31st May, 1803, from the American ship Martha, Henry Waddel, master, at London. Without protections.

William Brown, a citizen of the United States, impressed at Cuxhaven, on the 5th June, from the American schooner Astrea, and put into the British frigate Amethyst. He had a protection.

John Daniel Kessler, John Anderson, and Michael Jones, impressed on the 6th June, from the American ship William and Jane, off the port of Cork, and put into the British ship Loire. It is not stated that they are American citizens, or that they had protections.

Richard Rodman, on the 7th June, 1803, impressed at Hull, England, into the British service, from the American ship Atlas, Sweeny Wilson, master. It is not stated whether he had a protection, or of what country he is a citizen.

Dennis Sweeny, a native of Ireland, and without a protection, impressed on the 7th June, in the North sea, into the British frigate Amelia, Lord Proby, master, from the American ship Washington.

William Ireland, native of Suffolk county, New York, impressed from the American ship Alknomac, John Gore, master, at Falmouth, Jamaica, by a pressgang belonging to the Desiré, Captain Ross, or the armed brig Racoon, though he showed a protection given by the collector at New York, dated 26th April last. This impressment was made on the 22d June last.

John Dirks, Peter German, and James Peterson, natives of Denmark, impressed, on the 29th June, from the barque Pallas, an American vessel, then lying at London. They had no protections.

Hiram Chaples, (a native of New York, but it is not stated that he had a protection,) was impressed on the 3d day of July, from the American ship Charleston; Joseph Wyer, master, about twenty leagues from Sandy Hook, into the British frigate Cambrian.

Joseph Simonds, and Sylvester Pendleton, native Americans and residents of New York, and John Table, a black man, impressed about the 7th July, off the Texel, from the American schooner Recovery, Josiah Shackford, master, into the British sloop of war Harpy, Edmund Heywood, commander. Without protections.

Ephraim Vanduser, an American citizen and native of New York, with a protection as such, impressed, from the schooner Perseverance, Daniel Coyle, master, on the 18th July, off Tiberoon, into the British sloop of war Snake.

Josiah Hunt, native of Newburyport, Massachusetts, impressed the 17th July last, from the American brig John, Jonathan Titcomb, into the British ship Emerald, then in sight of Martinico. Without a protection.

John Whiting, native of Gloucester, Massachusetts, impressed at the same time, from and into the same vessel. No protection in this case.

Nathaniel Keene, an American citizen, who had been in slavery at Algiers, and who had a protection, which he left, through forgetfulness, at New York, impressed on the 18th July, at Folkstone, into the British service, from the American ship Maryland, John Wickham, master.

Joseph Stevens, an American citizen, with a protection as such, impressed from the schooner Perseverance, Daniel Coyle, master, on the 18th July, off Tiberoon, into the British sloop of war Snake.

William Evans, an Englishman, without a protection, and Thomas Challis, an American citizen, impressed at Cork, on the 19th and 26th June, from the American ship Joseph, James Jameson, master.

Joseph Emerson, native of Lincoln county, Massachusetts, impressed from the American schooner Harriet, Nathaniel Knight, master, into the British schooner St. Lucia, Shipley, master, then lying in the road of Basseterre, on the night of the 20th July. No protection.

Benjamin Eldridge and William Finney, natives of Falmouth, Massachusetts, impressed on the 20th July from the American schooner Hannah, in the road of Basseterre, into the British schooner St. Lucia, Shipley, master. No protection.

Three seamen, names unknown, belonging to the American vessel Mark and Mary, John Mooklar, master, were impressed, on the 29th July, into the Emerald, British vessel, Captain O'Brien, near the north end of Martinico, though the vessel from which they were taken was then in a leaky condition. Under these circumstances, Captain Mooklar was ordered to leave the coast of Martinico, as the island was blockaded, and he put into Dominica, but could stay there only a very short time, from the violence of the sea, which set into the harbor. He again put to sea, and before his return to Dominica sustained considerable loss in the washing overboard a great part of his deck cargo, which consisted of lumber. One of the men impressed had a custom-house protection.

William Whipp, native of New Haven, Connecticut, and John Simpson, of Virginia, impressed into the British sloop of war Sylph, July 30th, 1803, on the high seas, from the American ship Phaeton, —— Boush, master. No protections.

George Arnold, native of Great Britain, and John Williamson, a Swede, both without protections, impressed the 31st July, on board the British frigate Cambrian, William Bradley, commander, from the American ship Venus, Lemuel Bruce, master, upon the high seas.

Two seamen, citizens of the United States, and possessed of protections as such, which they showed to the British officers, impressed into the British frigate Boston, Captain Douglas, just after she had passed the territorial line of the United States, about the last of July.

William Liddle, it is not stated whether he be a citizen of the United States, impressed from the Juno, the 3d August, on her passage from Norfolk to Amsterdam, into the British frigate Thetis.

John M'Evoy, (an Englishman, and without a protection,) impressed from the American brig Paisly, John Jackways, master, on the 9th August, into the British frigate Boston, Captain Douglas, off the Chesapeake.

James Farnish, mate, and Neil Lang, seaman, of the American brig Drake, on her voyage to Barbadoes, were impressed the 12th August last, upon the high seas, into a British frigate, name of which is not known. The crew which remained in the Drake were found to be too weak for working her; in consequence of which, the captain was obliged to put into Antigua, the nearest port that he could make, to the great loss of the adventure.

David Kitchell, a native citizen of the United States, at the mouth of Delaware bay, was impressed into the British ship Leander, captain Cain, the 22d August, 1803, from the American sloop Hiland, John Hand, master, on a voyage from Philadelphia to Alexandria. Kitchell, it is believed was without a custom-house protection.

Oliver Harris, native of Boston, on the 14th August, was impressed into the British ship Blenheim, from the American schooner Harrie, near the island of Martinique. No protection in this case.

Charles Tracy, an American citizen, impressed on the 25th August from the ship Marion, William D. Seton, off Delaware, into a British frigate, name unknown. No protection.

James Davis and Henry Wood, black men, impressed at Liverpool, on the 1st September, from the American ship Chatham. No protections.

Samuel Robinson, an American, with a protection, Christian Moldenham, and Christian Lowman, Danes, with Danish protections, impressed the 5th September, on the high seas, from the American ship Flora, Caleb Harrison, master, into the British frigate Cambrian.

Thomas Doyle, native of Philadelphia, and a seaman belonging to the American brig Hector, impressed at Lisbon, the 6th September, into the British sloop of war Bittern, then at that port. Doyle had a protection.

Samuel Watt, Andrew Pace, and John Davis, the former having a protection as an American citizen, and the two latter being natives and subjects of Great Britain, were impressed on the 11th September from the American ship Charlotte, Thomas Hasam, master, about ten miles east of Cape May, into the British sloop of war Driver.

James Matthews, chief mate of the schooner Amazon, John Murray, master, impressed on the 14th September, 1803, into the British armed brig Geochi Pine, in the West Indies. No protection.

William Watson, a native of Connecticut, and with a protection, impressed the 29th September from the American ship Ontario, Seaman Weeks, master, into the British frigate Cambrian, upon the high seas.

Thomas Cook and George Wilson, the former a native of New York, the latter of Scotland, both without protections, impressed October 1st from the ship American Packet, Solomon Swain, master, at sea, about eight leagues from the lighthouse at Sandy Hook, into the British frigate Perseverance.

Henry Cobb, native of Falmouth, Massachusetts, impressed into the Loire, British ship. It is not stated when, or whether he had a protection.

Daniel Walker, native of Philadelphia, impressed from the American ship Fox, into the British frigate Boston. No protection, and the time of impressment not stated.

Jesse Dillings, native of Wethersfield, Connecticut, impressed into the Dreadnought, British ship. No protection; time not stated.

Richard Johnson, native of Middletown, Connecticut, impressed into the British service. No protection; time not stated.

Joseph Mace, native of Newburyport, Massachusetts, impressed into the British ship Isis. No protection; time not stated.

Samuel Hills, native of Providence, R. I. impressed into the English ship Britannia. He had a protection. Time not stated.

Henry Kipp, a native of Hamburgh, and a naturalized citizen of the United States; impressed into the British frigate Endymion from the American ship Eagle. No protection; time not stated.

William Chandler, a British subject, taken into the English service at Falmouth, Jamaica, from the American ship Anna, Caleb Johnson, master. No protection.

William Fegarie, belonging to the American brig Sally, claimed by the French at St. Pierre, Guadaloupe, as a citizen of France, and kept as such. Time not stated.

Nicholas Bullea, by birth a Frenchman, impressed into the service of France, from the American brig Joseph, at St. Pierre. Time not stated.

John Nicholson, a black man, with a certificate of freedom, impressed from the American brig Canton, at Surinam, on the 5th October, into a Dutch frigate.

Summary of impressments by the British from American vessels.

Forty-three impressments of citizens of the United States appear to have been made, of whom twelve had protections.
Ten of natives of the British dominions, and not stated to be naturalized as American citizens; and Seventeen of all other countries, who are not stated to have been naturalized in the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 2, 1803.

Extract of a letter from James Maury, Esq., Consul of the United States at Liverpool, to the Secretary of State.

MARCH 24, 1803.

"I had the honor to write to you on the 25th ultimo, since which the alarm of war has occasioned a great press for seamen. Many of ours, confident, as I suppose, in the continuance of peace, had not taken the caution, before leaving home, to be furnished with regular documents of citizenship, which exposes them to impressment."

Extract of a letter from John W. Fox, Esq., Consul of the United States at Falmouth, to the Secretary of State.

MAY 14, 1803.

"The impress is very severe. The citizens of the United States are not molested; two or three, without protections, and on board British ships, have been taken. I have made application for their release, but it is necessary that the seamen should bring certificates of their citizenship with them, otherwise they will run great risk of being impressed."

Extract of a letter from Wm. Savage, Esq. agent of the United States, for the relief and protection of their seamen at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State.

"There has been a hot press throughout this island. In this port about sixty seamen have been taken out of American vessels; immediately after which, I made application to the admiral, who liberated the American citizens. Some few vessels on the north side have lost their men, and have experienced distress from the measure. The names of the persons impressed I have a minute of, and on the arrival of the frigates, in which they are, I shall make application for their discharge.

OCTOBER 20, 1803.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter which I yesterday received from Commodore Hood, commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships of war on the windward station, notifying the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe by the squadron under his command.

I have the honor, &c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

CENTAUR, OFF MARTINIQUE, July 25, 1803.

SIR:

I beg you will have the goodness to acquaint the American Government, and agents of neutral nations, the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe are, and have been, blockaded by detachments of His Majesty's squadron, under my command, since the 17th June last, that they may have no plea for attempting to enter the ports of those islands. By your acknowledging the receipt of this, you will greatly oblige, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL HOOD,
Commodore and Commander-in-chief.

THOMAS BARCLAY, Esq. Consul General, &c.

8th CONGRESS.] No. 187. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 21, 1803.

DECEMBER 21, 1803.

To the Senate of the United States:

On the 11th of January last, I laid before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a convention with Spain on the subject of indemnities for spoliations on our commerce committed by her subjects during the late war; which convention is still before the Senate. As this instrument did not embrace French seizures and condemnations of our vessels in the ports of Spain, for which we deemed the latter Power responsible, our minister at that court was instructed to press for an additional article comprehending that branch of wrongs. I now communicate what has since passed on that subject. The Senate will judge whether the prospect it offers will justify a longer suspension of that portion of indemnities conceded by Spain, should she now take no advantage of the lapse of the period for ratification. As the settlement of the boundaries of Louisiana will call for new negotiations on our receiving possession of that province, the claims not obtained by the convention now before the Senate may be incorporated into those discussions.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary, &c. at Madrid, dated

MARCH 8, 1803.

The convention signed with Spain in August, though laid before the Senate at an early day, had no question taken on it till the close of the session. It was then postponed till the next session, which is to commence in November. More than a majority, but less than two-thirds, which the constitution requires, would have acquiesced in the instrument in its present form; trusting to the success of further negotiations for supplying its defects, particularly the omission of the claims founded on French irregularities. But it is understood that it would have been a mere acquiescence; no doubt being entertained that Spain is bound to satisfy the omitted as well as the included claims. In explaining, therefore, the course taken by the Senate, which mingles respect for the Spanish Government with a cautious regard to our own rights, you will avail yourself of the opportunity of pressing the reasonableness and the sound policy of remodelling the convention in such a manner as to do full justice. I need not repeat the observations heretofore made on the Spanish responsibility for the conduct of French citizens within Spanish jurisdiction; but it may be of use to refer you to the enclosed copy of a royal order issued by the Spanish Government in 1799, which will enable you to remind them of their own view of the subject at that time. In this document it is expressly declared, that the French consular jurisdiction was not admitted, and that French consuls in Spanish ports were in the same condition with those of every other nation. After such a declaration against the authority of French consuls, the Spanish Government would be chargeable with no less disrespect to the French republic than to itself, in saying that Spain was not left at liberty to prevent an exercise of the usurped authority; and, if at liberty, she is indisputably answerable for the consequences of not preventing it. A document, which I add, will explain the just sentiments entertained by the Batavian Government during the same period, in relation to a case turning on the same principle.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary, &c. at Madrid, dated

As the convention you signed with Spain will be now submitted to further negotiation, it will be proper, in addition to the general remarks contained in preceding letters, to suggest some particular alterations which are calculated to remove doubts, and to provide for its convenient execution.

1st. The words "excesses of individuals," in the caption of the convention, are liable to exception. The term "excesses" has not a definite meaning in the sense in which it is here used, and "individuals" might be restricted at least as a purely English word to private citizens or subjects, as distinguished from those who are vested with public authority. The English part of the caption in the words quoted uses the preposition of in lieu of the Spanish words cometidas por, which are preferable.

It is believed that the form of words, "who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it," &c. would be an improvement of importance.

2d. From the first section, it would seem that the fifth commissioner is to be appointed by the common consent of the two nations, or, in case of disagreement, by lot from two persons, one of whom is to be named by each nation. The formation of the Board would be very much facilitated by substituting the agency of the commissioners on each side, in the appointment of the fifth commissioner either by consent or by lot.

3d. To equalize the compensation of the commissioners, to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Board, and to obviate the case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of either of them, the eighth article of the British treaty will serve as an approved model.

4th. It would be desirable to add the words "justice, equity," before the laws of nations, &c. in the close of the second article, and a clause to the oath, whereby the commissioners should engage not to sit at the decision of a case in which they might as individuals be directly or indirectly interested.

5th. The third article limits the term within which claims are to be made to eighteen months; but the Board should be vested with a power to extend it further in special cases, so as not to exceed two years in all. The close of this article admits of the same alteration as was suggested above with regard to the caption.

6th. A criticism, perhaps an unfounded one, having been made upon the word testimony, used in the fourth article, as if it were restricted to parole deposition, it may not be amiss to change it for the word evidence, or to couple them, so as to read "all testimony and evidence, the authenticity of which," &c.

A perseverance in our claims, grounded on the wrongs permitted to be done by French cruisers and tribunals, it is expected will produce a correspondent alteration in the whole convention, and a retrenchment of the sixth article. It will be obvious to you how convenient it will prove if you can terminate your negotiation so as to produce the requisite modifications of the convention in season to preclude its reconsideration in the Senate, at their next session, in its present shape.

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

I find, by your letter of the 22d March, that the convention signed with this country is to be submitted to further negotiation, on the ground, I suppose, principally, that it did not include the claims for French captures. Your letters, to which the only one I have received refers, have not yet come to hand, and therefore I only know it is to be submitted to further negotiation; and that, with some alterations respecting the mode of appointing to vacancies in the commission; extending the time at the discretion of the Board to two years; equalizing the compensation; altering the terms "excesses of individuals," and the expression respecting testimony. I am to persevere in obtaining redress for the French captures and wrongs permitted to be done by French cruisers and tribunals, which will certainly produce, if obtained, an alteration in the whole convention. I have been some time endeavoring, in every conversation I have had, to obtain the promise to include the arbitration of the French captures, but without effect: for it may be necessary here to state, that, although Mr. Cevallos did positively, in one of his letters last summer, promise to include them, if I would add the words "segun los principios que constituen la moralidad de las acciones," yet that very day, or a very short time after, when I had some inclination to add the words, and take the clause with that addition, he flew the way, and would not agree to it. I was, therefore, obliged to take the convention, such as it was, or none at all; and as it gave up nothing, secured very important and extensive claims, and opened the door to others, I always hoped the Senate would have ratified it conditionally, striking out the sixth article, and annexing one including the claims for French captures and condemnations, and ordering me, in very strong and decisive terms, to tell the Government here that they were determined to have the whole or none. Had this been done, I believe they would consent, and, as I suppose, the arbitration for the French captures and condemnations not being included was the principal objection to ratifying it at the present session, I shall now take that ground, and insist upon their being included, even if I am obliged to add the words he proposed to annex, and which I have already quoted. I shall also consider myself as not at liberty to sign any convention which does not include them in some manner that I think may be acceptable; but as this subject is one of the most grating and disagreeable that can be to the Spaniards, and as they consider it so extremely hard to be obliged to pay for the French condemnations, I wish to know your positive instructions, whether I am to make them an indispensable part of the convention, and not to sign or agree to any which does not include them in some shape. This is the ground I take at present; and as the Spaniards are not very quick in any of their negotiations, and are particularly crowded with business at this time, when they expect war between France and England, and of course that they will be involved, it is not improbable your instructions may reach me before I conclude the business. Should war take place, it is then very probable I shall succeed, and I shall govern the style of my representations by the probability or improbability of a rupture.

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

DEAR SIR: MADRID, August 2, 1803.

My last despatches, and those which preceded them, will have conveyed to you the propositions I submitted to this Government on the subject of our claims, and particularly the captures and condemnations by the French; they will also have informed you of the anxious manner in which I have been expecting the arrival of Mr. Monroe since the 20th of May, hopeful that the instructions he would bring might enable me to add such offers, or bring the question of the spoliations by the French in some manner before this Government, to tempt them to accede to our propositions. After waiting until nearly the beginning of this month,* I received a letter from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Livingston, acquainting me with the cession of Louisiana; and another from Mr. Robert Livingston yesterday, saying that Mr. Monroe was gone to London, to reside there as minister from the United States. In consequence of this, I have again pressed upon this Government a decision with respect to the French captures and condemnations, and have desired an audience on Tuesday.

While I expected Mr. Monroe, and supposed that, in treating respecting Florida, something could have been proposed which might have induced this Government to include our claims for French spoliations and condemnations, notwithstanding I had, in pursuance of your instructions, brought them forward, I forbore to push them, lest I might injure the other and more important parts of the negotiation; but the moment I received official information from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Livingston that Louisiana was ceded, and that they considered the cession as including West Florida, and that Mr. Monroe was not coming, I then pushed the new propositions respecting our claims, in that positive and decided manner which the circumstances of Europe, and the particular situation of Spain, seemed to me to warrant. In my letter (No. 1) you will perceive the manner in which the new propositions were submitted, and the copy of the new convention; these went in the last despatches. After waiting for some time to see whether Mr. Monroe would arrive with the extraordinary commission, and finding it doubtful, I wrote the letter (No. 2); and immediately on being informed that Mr. Monroe would not come, I demanded an audience of Mr. Cevallos, the Secretary for the Foreign Department, in which I went over the whole ground of our difference in opinion, and repeated to him, at length, not only all the arguments used in my letters, but such others as occurred in the course of conversation, or as I thought the particular and doubtful situation of Spain at present warranted.

I entered fully into the impropriety of Spain's having suffered her ports to be used for the purpose of equipping privateers to cruise upon our vessels, and bringing them in as prizes, and permitting the consuls of France to condemn them; by which means her territorial sovereignty was not only violated, but her ports, which we ought to have considered not only as the ports of a neutral and a friend, but of a nation in treaty with us, were, by that means, converted into those of an enemy. For what could France do more with her ports against us than equip and man privateers in them, and bring in and condemn our vessels? Spain did not permit us to do so; and if she had offered it, she well knew the offer was of no consequence to us, because the distance from the United States, and the contiguity of the French coasts created a difference in the exercise or use of the permission which made it extremely important to the one, and of very little consequence to the other. That there can be no doubt that any nation which lends the aid of its ports for the purpose of arming privateers, aids in annoying the commerce of those against which these privateers are intended to cruise: that, further, any nation which vests within its dominions a foreign tribunal, with the power of condemning and selling the property of a neutral nation, assists in depriving the citizens of that nation by force of their property. Hence, it would seem, a permission to arm privateers, and sell prizes, granted to one belligerent Power, is inconsistent with the impartiality due to both by a nation which professes to be neutral; that it would not destroy the argument to say the same privileges might be granted to both; that, in our late differences with France, it could not, for the United States never suffered their public or private vessels to capture the merchant ships of France, and, it is believed, in no instance could the privilege operate equally in favor of two nations: from their maritime strength, local situation, or other cause, the one must always benefit by it more than the other; hence, one of them must be materially injured, if it was granted to both. For example, suppose Spain and Russia were engaged in war; would the United States do them equal justice by opening her ports for the arming of their privateers, and the sale of their prizes? Nobody would suppose she did, when he recollected that all, or nearly all, the rich commerce of Spain passes before the ports of the United States, and that Russia has no commerce in that quarter of the world. Again, if unfortunately there was a war between the United States and Spain, would England do equal justice to both, if she opened the port of Gibraltar to both, for the purpose of arming privateers and selling prizes? Certainly not; for, by doing so, she would give to the United States the most advantageous position from whence to annoy the commerce of Spain; and to Spain she would give the use of a port three thousand miles distant from the United States, and not more useful to her than her own on the Mediterranean.

From these and other examples, I endeavored to convince him how peculiarly Spain is situated, and how important it is to her to put an end to a practice so contrary to the principles of justice and strict neutrality. I repeated to him that these observations, together with those which have been, from time to time, during the last four years, offered by my predecessor and myself to the consideration of His Majesty, are believed to be sufficient to entitle us to demand compensation from His Majesty for the property wrested from us by those whose actions he had a right, and most certainly the power, to control: that the respect which the Government of the United States had for His Majesty had induced them to urge the point, which they considered as a point of national honor, with the greatest moderation, as was proved by their offering to refer the question to arbitration, although they were perfectly conscious of their right to demand payment without a reference, of which they had given a proof before they had become interested themselves. But that if Spain will not agree to the principle of neutral right, and chooses to adopt, as a part of her public law, the practice of opening her ports for the arming of privateers and selling of prizes, I am sure the United States would, in point of mere interest, be benefited by following the example, after obtaining compensation for the losses they have already sustained.

* It seems probable that this date, and the following, are advanced, and that this part of the letter was written in July.

In order to meet the observations he made before, that His Majesty was not, by the law of nations, liable for the condemnations by the French consuls, I repeated to him the observations of Vattel, in his 3d book, and particularly in the paragraphs sect. 15, 95, 97, 102, and 104; and endeavored to show him how incompatible these aggressions were with the duties therein enjoined to neutrals; that, at the time Vattel and others had written on the laws of nations, no such case had occurred; no such new, extraordinary, or unwarrantable attempts had been made to erect, within any country, tribunals independent of its authority. I endeavored to impress upon him the manner in which our Government had defeated a similar attempt upon them at an earlier period of the war, well knowing that, to permit such an exercise of the rights of war within their cities, would be to make their coasts a station of hostility. To show him that we did not stand alone in our opinions on this licentious attempt to exercise the rights of war within neutral countries, where no such rights have ever before been exercised, I read and explained to him the doctrines laid down in the English Court of Admiralty, by Sir William Scott, in the celebrated case of the Flad Oyen, Martensen, master; and which, as you no doubt have seen, I shall not trouble you with repeating. I concluded with informing him that our Government considered this as a point of national honor, which they could never relinquish; that, as war had again commenced between Great Britain and France, the decision of Spain on this subject was become now indispensable; that we knew not to what other parts its flames will soon extend; that our commerce must never again be exposed to similar depredations, and that our Government were determined, upon this occasion, to show how far they would protect it; that, having arranged all their differences with France and England, it now rested solely to do so with Spain; that, to do this, they had offered an equal and amicable arbitration, and that I had waited with great patience for their decision; that, however, being now instructed to transmit His Majesty's answer, so that it might be received by the meeting of Congress, the period had arrived when I could delay no longer applying to his excellency for a prompt and decisive one, which I was hopeful he would give me in a few days, as I had two American gentlemen only waiting to take it to America.

In his answer, he went over the old ground, that Spain, not having authorized, but expressly forbidden, the exercise of this power by the French consuls, was not, in his opinion, liable to make reparation; that the more he had considered the subject, the more he was convinced; and that, in his view of it, the quotations I had made from Vattel did not apply; that, since the last year, he had been informed, from the best sources, that many leading men in our (the American) Government were in sentiment with him that Spain was not liable; and that even some of our best informed lawyers had given the same opinion. I replied, it was incredible to me that any men of information, whether in our Government or among our gentlemen of the bar, could have given such an opinion; that, if they had, I had never heard of it; that it was always safest for his excellency to take the sentiments and views of our Government, as they respected Spain, from me; that I could assure him every branch of our Government was not only decided in their opinion as to the liability of His Majesty to make compensation, but determined never to relinquish it, at least so far as to insist upon its being included in the arbitration; that the Senate not having ratified the convention, ought to be full proof of their determination upon this subject; that it was time our Government should know His Majesty's decision, and I must request to have it by the day Mr. Young sailed. He said that was impossible, as the royal feasts, and other occupations of His Majesty, for this month, in which he was obliged to attend him, would put it entirely out of his power; but that he would give it as soon as he could. I then informed him that I considered it as my duty to write, and asked him, "whether I was to transmit to our Executive, as His Majesty's final decision, that he could not consent to include in the convention the captures and condemnations by the French and their consuls." He hesitated, and said no. The serious manner in which I put this question seemed to have affected him. He added, "The subject, with your representations, are now before His Majesty, and I will state what has passed further this evening;" at the same time assuring me I should have a very speedy answer. He then went on to converse with me on the subject of the cession of Louisiana by the French to us, in which he expressed an opinion so important and extraordinary, that I made a point of transmitting it to you by the post the next day, by the route of Lisbon, and which, I trust, you will soon receive. The substance was this: that, in the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France, there was a secret article that France should never part with Louisiana, except to Spain; that if she (France) should ever wish to dispose of it, Spain should always have the right of pre-emption; from which he argued that France had not the right to make such cession without the consent of Spain, and that he was astonished our commissioners had not applied to their Government to know the actual terms upon which France was to receive Louisiana, and, in fact, to examine their title. I answered him by saying that he could not be more astonished at their not doing so than I was at his remark; that he well knew Mr. Livingston and myself had been applying for upwards of a year, incessantly, to the Governments of France and Spain, to know if Louisiana was ceded, and upon what terms; that, for more than a year, the most guarded silence was observed by both, and that, at last, when Spain had answered and avowed the cession, not a word was mentioned in his (Mr. Cevallos's) letter to me of any secret article; that the letter only avowed the cession, and that it had been made subject to the conditions of our treaty; that I had transmitted this to Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe; and I asked him whether, after the sight of this letter from him, acknowledging the cession, they could for a moment doubt the perfect right of France to sell. I then further asked him whether, if Spain still continued in possession, and our Government ratified the treaty, there would be any hesitation on the part of His Majesty to give us the possession: to which he made no positive reply, nor could I bring him to do so during the whole evening. I could easily discover, in the course of it, that there exists at present much uneasiness, on the part of this court, with respect to the conduct of France in the sale of Louisiana, and particularly in the opinion held by our commissioners, that it includes West Florida, which both Mr. Cervallos and the Prince of Peace expressly deny, and on which I wrote you a separate letter, containing my conversation with them on this subject.

AUGUST 30.

Not receiving the answer of the Secretary as soon as I expected, and anxious to transmit you the result, I followed the court to San Ildefonso, and had another conference with him on the 24th instant. In this he informed me he was sorry so much delay had been occasioned in his reply; that it was owing to the removal of the court, and the particular urgency of the moment, alluding, I suppose, to the state of things occasioned by the war; that, however, the answer was prepared, and would be transmitted the following day; that I would perceive in it the two grounds upon which His Majesty conceived he was not liable to make compensation for the French condemnations; and that several very respectable and learned gentlemen in the law in the United States had expressed the same opinion, a copy of which he would send me enclosed in his reply: the grounds were, the inability of Spain to prevent it, and the general relinquishment of our claims to France for every thing done by Frenchmen, so far as respects the seizure of our vessels or their condemnation; and that he was convinced, when our Government came to see these opinions, and to reconsider the question, they would think, with His Majesty and his ministers, that Spain was only liable for the acts of her own subjects, except, indeed, in the violation of their territory by foreign cruisers, which, he said, he had no objection to admit, considering it as a distinct question from that of the condemnations. I told him I believed our Government would be not a little surprised to find Spain resorting to the plea that she was not able to prevent it; that, if he pressed this argument, if he contended she was not then a free agent, and, of course, not a responsible one, and could prove it to be so, it only remained for me to transmit this reply to you for your future directions; that the relinquishment he spoke of to France has nothing to do with our claims on Spain; that we never considered ourselves as having any right to demand compensation from France for these violations of the territory and sovereignty of Spain by the cruisers and consuls of France; that they were by no means included in the claims relinquished, but were as distinct and separate as claims could be; that we had received from France a very valuable compensation, in her consent to dissolve the treaties of commerce and alliance previously existing between the two nations—an alliance by which we were bound to guaranty her islands in the West Indies, and to be liberated from which was inestimable to the United States; that from Spain we had hitherto received no compensation, and that it would be found a great part of these claims had originated since the date of the French convention; that I still hoped he would consent to include them in some way, convinced that, if they were not provided for, our Government would remain extremely dissatisfied; that, merely from motives of conciliation, I would consent to insert them, with the addition of the words he offered the last year, "segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones." He said he was rather of opinion, from the intelligence he had received from the United States, that the thing would now be viewed in a different light, and that our Government would not insist on so hard terms, even if they had the right, as to call upon them for condemnations which they could not prevent, and not one shilling of the proceeds of which went into the pockets of His Majesty or his subjects; that he never meant, the last year, in what he said respecting the arbitration, subject to the limitation of "segun los principios, &c.," to apply it to the condemnations of the French consuls, or to have left it to the commissioners to decide upon them, but only to the violations of territory; and that, had I admitted the limitation, he would have expressly excepted the condemnations; that, for the acts of his own subjects and the violations of territory by foreign cruisers, His Majesty had been always ready to arbitrate, as appeared by his letters to me of the last year; that he wished me to transmit the reply he would send me, with the opinions of the American lawyers on the subject; and that he did not doubt their future instructions to me would be such as would tend to promote the harmony and good understanding of the two Governments.

On the morning following, he sent me the enclosed answer to my several verbal and written applications, accompanied by an opinion, which I also enclose, given by Messrs. Ingersoll, Rawle, McKean, Duponceau, and Livingston, on an abstract question submitted to them, as I suppose, by the order of this Government. I considered it proper to transmit Mr. Cevallos an answer, in which you will find most of the arguments insisted upon which had been before used, and in which I object to the statement submitted to our lawyers, as not expressing either fully or truly the state of facts: that, in relinquishing our claims on France, we had done so for a valuable consideration, and that, in so doing, we had by no means relinquished our claims on Spain, as they were separate and distinct; that, for the truth of this, we referred him to the letters of my predecessor, by which, it appears, the Government of Spain were continually warned of the illegality of the captures and condemnations, and informed that His Majesty would be held liable to make compensation; that, in resorting to the plea that Spain could not prevent it, it was incumbent on her to show that she really could not, either by force or influence, do so, and that she had exerted herself, as far as she was able, to effect it; that, after all, if it was true she could not prevent it, but, to avoid a war, or a renewal of the war, with France, was under the necessity of submitting to it, and of sacrificing to the preservation of peace the commerce and property of the citizens of the United States, on every principle of justice and national honor she ought now to make compensation; that the tacit sacrifice of the property of our citizens was the price she paid for a peace, inestimable to her in every respect; and that, in my judgment, she ought now most cheerfully and gratefully to submit to our proposition for an arbitration, rejoicing that we have been so moderate as to acquiesce in this mode, and not to demand, not only immediate compensation for the losses, but satisfaction for the injury to our national honor; that it should be recollected, the opinions of gentlemen of the law, however respectable as professional men, were not to direct our Government; that they were supposed to be the best judges of our public rights, and had alone the authority to treat respecting them, and, when necessary, to devise the means of asserting and protecting them; and that even the opinions he produced could easily be proved to be in our favor.

As I cannot now expect that Spain will agree to include the claims for the condemnations by the French consuls, it will remain for you to direct what is best to be done. You will consider how far her plea that she could not prevent it entitles her to consideration, and whether it appears, in any of our applications to the French Government previously to the signing of the convention of 1800, we applied to them for compensation for the captures and condemnations by the French privateers and consuls within the territory of Spain, or included them in those claims which were afterwards relinquished. In determining this, much will depend upon the correspondence of our envoys or commissioners who made the convention with the French envoys, and I will thank you for the necessary information, and copies of such of the letters respecting the claims as may be proper.

From the above, you will see the state of the negotiation, and with what anxiety this Government wish to avoid inserting the claims for the condemnations by the French. I have no doubt Mr. Yrujo has been very industrious on this subject in the United States, and Mr. Azzara in Paris, in endeavoring to collect all the intelligence they can, to prove that we considered these as claims on France; that our commissioners had urged them as such; and that they are included in the general relinquishment to that nation. As I do not believe this to have been the case, I have continued to urge them as separate claims, which could be alone made on this Government; and you will perceive, by my letter to Mr. Cevallos, that I do not by any means agree with him, or acquiesce in his doctrines. Upon the whole of this business, it appears to me, that, in the present state of Europe, it would be politic in us to endeavor to arrange all our claims on Spain, by conditionally ratifying the convention already sent, striking out the sixth article, and inserting one including such of the claims for French captures and condemnations as you are determined to insist upon, and accompanying it with a specific offer to Spain to purchase Florida, or such part of it as now remains to her; for, on the subject of the limits of Louisiana and Florida, I am otherwise apprehensive we shall have some difficulties. Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe officially informed me they considered West Florida as included in the cession. This the Prince of Peace and Mr. Cevallos strongly deny; and, unless we can come to some agreement with Spain for the cession of all their claims on Florida, we may, as I have observed, have some difficulties with them. This appears to me, also, to be the best time, for Spain must eventually be involved in the war; and, cut off from her resources in South America, her trade destroyed, and her country without bread, a sum of money would go a great way in tempting her to sell. We are now, also, sure of the influence and assistance of France in persuading them to do so; for General Bournonville, the French ambassador, told me lately he had received orders from his Government to promote, as far as he could, a disposition in this court to sell Florida to the United States. Notwithstanding Mr. Monroe has not come on, I am continually conversing with the leading men here on this subject, and keeping it constantly in their view; but, not conceiving myself now authorized to make any explicit offer, and not knowing exactly what proportion of West Florida you will insist upon as ceded to the United States by France, I wait your further instructions, which I request may be as particular and as explicit as possible; not wishing, in affairs of so great pecuniary importance, to have too much left to my discretion. I take the liberty to recommend the bearer, Major Young, to the President and yourself, as an excellent and deserving public officer. Please present me in the most respectful and affectionate manner to the President, and believe me, with sincere regard and affectionate respect, dear sir, yours truly,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, May 23, 1803.

I have the honor to inform your excellency that, after the most mature reflection and deliberation, the Government of the United States are of opinion, they cannot, consistently with the honor of their Government, or those interests of its citizens which it is their duty to support, consent to any convention with His Majesty for the arbitration in settlement of their respective claims, which shall not include the arbitration of all the claims arising, as well from the acts of Spanish subjects, as those of aliens or foreigners within the Spanish territory, contrary to the laws of nations, or the treaty existing between His Majesty and the United States, and that in order to allow time for including this class of claims, they have postponed coming to any decision on the convention formed between your excellency and myself, until the next session of the Senate, in November. In consequence, therefore, of their precise and positive instructions, I now submit a new convention which they expect His Majesty will consent your excellency should sign, for the following reasons: That your excellency has already agreed to arbitrate all the acts of Spanish subjects, contrary to the treaty and the law of nations, and all the infractions of the Spanish territory by foreign privateers; and in your excellency's letter of the 26th June, did positively agree to insert all the other claims arising from the acts of aliens, if I would consent to insert after the words "ó de otros," the words "cuyos excesos puedan imputarse al Gobierno Español segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones y su responsabilidad."

As it was unusual to insert expressions of this kind, and I did not conceive my instructions as warranting it, I objected at that time to the insertion, and preferred trying the opinion of our Government on a convention confined solely to the acts of Spanish subjects, and leaving the question respecting those of aliens to future negotiation. It is, however, the opinion of our Government, that, when the two Governments go to the expense and trouble of constituting this Board, it ought at once to be authorized to consider and decide upon all their mutual claims.

From the dispositions, or rather assent, at first manifested by your excellency, and on perusal of your letters, a more favorable as well as speedy issue was expected to this negotiation by our Government, and it is still hoped and expected, that modifications may be devised that will make the contested article satisfactory to Spain, without being unjust to the United States.

The true object is to give to the Board a power that will reach every description of cases. According to information received from time to time, it appears that losses have been sustained by citizens of the United States: first, on the high seas; secondly, within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain herself; thirdly, within the jurisdiction of her colonies: that they have proceeded, first, from Spanish subjects; secondly, from others within Spanish jurisdiction: that they have been contrary either, first, to the treaty of 1795; or, secondly, to the law of nations; or, thirdly, to substantial justice. It is desirable, therefore, that a stipulated provision for repairing these injuries should be so expressed as to be commensurate with this view of the cases; or, if this extent cannot be explicitly given to the provision, that it should be as little narrowed as possible.

The objection made to giving the Board cognizance of the wrongs committed by aliens within the jurisdiction, and, consequently, within the temporary allegiance of the King of Spain, is clearly open to the reply I made to it. The authority which every sovereign has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction, makes him responsible to others for their conduct, as much, and for the same reason, as he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects. This is a doctrine too well established, both by reason and by public law, to be questioned. The United States have pursued it in practice, as well as in discussion; and may, therefore, with the more energy claim the benefit of it. The remark of your excellency, that the stipulation on this subject, in our treaty of 1794, with Great Britain, implies that, without such a stipulation, the law of nations would not have imposed on the United States the responsibility assumed, admits of a double answer. The United States acquiesced in the doctrine before the treaty was made; and the stipulation in the treaty, like numerous stipulations in other treaties, was not meant to supersede the rule of public law, but to acknowledge and explain it.

It is not denied that there are certain exceptions to the authority over those within a temporary, which do not apply to the authority over those within a permanent, allegiance; and so far there may be exceptions to the responsibility of the sovereign also. But none of these exceptions belong to the cases in question. In the equipment of privateers, and the condemnation of prizes, in Spanish ports, the King of Spain had the same authority to restrain aliens as he had to restrain his own subjects from illegal acts towards other nations. Having this authority, his duty to other nations required him to exert it; and, failing in this duty, he made himself answerable to those injured by the failure.

The losses sustained by Americans from aliens, and for which Spain is held answerable, have proceeded, first, from condemnations within her jurisdiction; secondly, from equipments within her jurisdiction known to be against the American trade; thirdly, from equipments ostensibly made against the enemies of Spain, but turned against the United States; fourthly, from captures only within the limits of Spanish jurisdiction.

With respect to the first two cases, it is clear that the Spanish Government had not only the right but the power to interpose effectually; and is, consequently, bound to repair the consequences of her omission. With respect to the fourth case, the violations of her territory might be less under her control, where the prizes were not carried into her ports. Still, however, with the right accruing to her against the aggressors, accrues, at the same time, the right against her to the sufferers.

It is my duty to inform your excellency, and my instructions direct me to do so, that the course pursued by the Senate of the United States, in postponing the decision on the convention until the next session, in order that His Majesty should have time to consent to incorporate and include the arbitration of the claims arising from the acts of aliens within the Spanish territories, while it maintains a cautious regard for our own rights, exhibits, at the same time, great respect for the Spanish Government. Every branch of our Government is of opinion that the arbitration of these claims ought to be included, and that, by the law of nations, Spain is clearly answerable for the acts of aliens within her territory and jurisdiction; and, notwithstanding the time which has already been spent, and the ruinous delays which have taken place, they still rely on the well known honor of His Majesty to remodel the convention, so as to do ample justice.

But in order to remove all doubt on the subject, and to show how well founded is the right the United States have to expect that this class of claims will be admitted at least to arbitration, I am also directed to refer your excellency to the enclosed copy of a royal order, issued by the Spanish Government in 1799, which must remind your excellency of the view of your Government, and of their opinions at that time on this subject. In this document, it is expressly declared, that the French consular jurisdiction was not admitted in Spain, and that French consuls in Spanish ports were, and always have been, in the same condition only with those of every other nation.

After such a declaration against the authority of French Consuls, the Spanish Government never can say, or have they ever said, they were not left at liberty to prevent an exercise of the usurped authority; and if at liberty she is indisputably answerable for the consequences of not preventing it. A document which I also take the liberty to add, will explain the just sentiments entertained by the Batavian Government during the same period in relation to a case turning on the same principle.

This subject has been so often, and so long before your excellency, that it is not necessary for me to go again into the other arguments heretofore used to prove to your excellency the policy and justice of the measure. Our Government relies confidently on the justice and honor of His Majesty, and on the promise contained in your letters, and particularly that of the 26th June last, in which you say you consent to the inclusion of the words "de otros," and in the arbitration of claims for damages arising from the acts of aliens, with the addition of this comment for its clear signification, "ó de otros cuyos excesos puedan imputarse al Gobierno Español segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones y su responsabilidad." The present convention is drawn in conformity with that limitation, with some few alterations of no moment, which our Government wishes for the more convenient execution of the convention, and such as your excellency can have no objection to: these are, the alteration of the caption, in which, instead of the words "excesses," &c. I have substituted "in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under colour of authority from it, or by others within the territory of either nation." An alteration in the mode of filling up vacancies in the commission, should a vacancy occur after the formation of the board, as it would prevent their going on, and be extremely inconvenient and expensive to wait the nomination from the United States of an American commissioner to fill a vacancy, which would now be the case. An article also is added to equalize the payment of the commissioners, and to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Board. We wish, also, the board to be vested with power to extend the time if they think proper in special cases, six months longer, so as not to exceed, in the whole, two years.

Your excellency will find the whole substanstially the same as the last, except with the addition of the claims for the acts of aliens, and I am particularly enjoined by my Government to request as early a decision as possible. Should your excellency not approve the form exactly as it is now sent, I will then thank your excellency to be so obliging as to favor me with one which you will sign; it being, however, necessary for me to state to your excellency that I do not consider myself as now at liberty to assent to any that shall not include the arbitration of the claims arising from the acts of aliens in the territories of each.

I repeat to your excellency my earnest request that you will be pleased to furnish me with your definitive answer for the information of my Government as early as possible, as I am particularly directed by them to endeavor to obtain and transmit it, with all the despatch in my power.

With sentiments of the most profound respect, I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient humble servant,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

[Draught of the proposed convention referred to in Mr. Pinckney's letter to Mr. Cevallos, of May 23, 1803.]

[TRANSLATION.]

A Convention between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, for the indemnification of those who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others, within the territory of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the laws of nations.

His Catholic Majesty and the Government of the United States of America, wishing amicably to adjust the claims which have arisen in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others within the territory of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the law of nations: His Catholic Majesty has given, for this purpose, full powers to his excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, Councillor of State, Gentleman of the Bedchamber in employment, First Secretary of State and Universal Despatch, Grand Cross of the royal and distinguished order of Charles the Third, and Superintendent General of the Posts and Post Offices in Spain and the Indies; and the Government of the United States of America to Charles Pinckney, a citizen of the said States, and their minister plenipotentiary near His Catholic Majesty; who have agreed as follows:

1st. A Board of Commissioners shall be formed, composed of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Catholic Majesty, two others by the Government of the United States, and the fifth by common consent; and in case they should not be able to agree on a person for the fifth commissioner, each party shall name one, and leave the decision to lot; and, hereafter, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any of those already appointed, the remaining commissioner or commissioners of the nation to which the commissioner so dead, sick, or necessarily absent belonged, shall be authorized to proceed to the appointment of another to replace him; and the new commissioner shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties; and it is agreed that the commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties, such agreement being to be settled at the time of the ratifications of this convention. And all other expenses attending the said commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the majority of the commissioners.

2d. The appointment of the commissioners being thus made, each one of them shall take an oath to examine, discuss, and decide on the claims which they are to judge, according to the law of nations and the existing treaty, and with the impartiality justice may dictate, and not to act directly or indirectly in any case in which they are directly or indirectly interested.

3d. The commissioners shall meet and hold their sessions in Madrid, where, within the term of eighteen months, or, in special cases, at the discretion of the Board, two years, (to be reckoned from the day on which they may assemble,) they shall receive all claims which, in consequence of this convention, may be made, as well by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty as by citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries sustained by them in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others, within the territory of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the law of nations.

4th. The commissioners are authorized, by the said contracting parties, to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said demands, and to receive, as worthy of credit, all testimony or evidence, the authenticity of which cannot reasonably be doubted.

5th. From the decisions of the commissioners there shall be no appeal; and the agreement of three of them shall give full force and effect to their decisions, as well with respect to the justice of the claims, as to the amount of the indemnification which may be adjudged to the las partes contratantes á satisfacerlas en especie, sin rebaxa, en las epocas y parages señalados, y baxo las condiciones que se expresaren en las sentencias de la junta.

6°. La presente convencion no tendra ningun valor ni efecto, hasta que se haya ratificado por las partes contratantes, y se cangearán las ratificaciones lo mas pronto que sea posible.

En fé de lo qual, nosotros, los infrascriptos plenipotenciarios, hemos firmado esta convencion, y hemos puesto nuestros sellos respectivos.

Hecho en Madrid, á ——, de ——.

claimants; the said contracting parties obliging themselves to satisfy the said awards in specie, without deduction, at the times and places pointed out, and under the conditions which may be expressed by the Board of Commissioners.

6th. The present convention shall have no force or effect, until it be ratified by the contracting parties.

In faith whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention, and have affixed thereunto our respective seals.

Done at Madrid, this —— day of ——.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

I have waited for some considerable time to have the favor of your excellency's reply to the representations I had the honor to make, in conformity to the orders of my Government, on the subject of the claims for captures and condemnations. I was hopeful the respectful manner in which our Government had treated the subject, by postponing their final decision until His Majesty could have time to decide on the propriety of admitting the arbitration of the claims for captures of our vessels by the French, within the territory of Spain, and condemnations in their ports, and the arguments adduced in support of the justice and equality of the arbitration proposed, would have long since convinced your excellency of the propriety of acceding to our proposition; and I am induced to flatter myself your excellency will still do so. In referring to the arguments which have been already so often and so much at length adduced in support of our claims, I shall now only say, that our Government, on a candid and deliberate review of the subject, are convinced that they never can, in honor to their nation, or in justice to its citizens, totally relinquish these claims; that they have again charged me, in the most positive terms, to request a definite and speedy answer from His Majesty. They well know that, according to substantial justice and the law of nations, they are warranted in demanding payment for all the vessels so illegally captured or condemned by the French; but, in that spirit of friendship and forbearance which has always governed their councils, and particularly as they respect His Catholic Majesty, they have forborne to make the demand for payment in the first instance, and have only asked for an equal and fair arbitration, which, it appears to me, on maturely reconsidering the subject, His Majesty will not refuse.

When two nations differ on a point like this, each equally entitled to form its own opinion, and sufficiently powerful to assert its honor and protect its rights, and each seriously determined not to relinquish them, there are no modes of terminating the difference but those of war or arbitration. Our Government, while seriously determined never to relinquish their claims, have long and amicably proposed the latter. They have again charged me to call for a definitive answer, in order that His Majesty's determination may be known before the next meeting of the Congress; I do, therefore, again most earnestly request of your excellency to favor me with a reply to the propositions I made for a new convention, and with the form of such a one as your excellency will approve, and of the terms on which you will consent to arbitrate the French captures and condemnations.

It is now uncertain whether Mr. Monroe will come on with the new commission extraordinary from our Government directed to him and myself at all, or if he should bring it, when; but if he does, its objects are entirely distinct from these claims, the urging the definitive answer to which my Government has again pressed on me in so serious a manner, that I am confident your excellency will have the goodness to favor me with as early a reply as possible.

I avail myself, with pleasure, on this occasion, to offer to your excellency the homage of the high respect and perfect consideration with which I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

Madrid, July 15, 1803.

Before your excellency gives thedefinitive answer to the propositions made to you by order of my Government —that answer which is probably to determine the relation hereafter to subsist between the two countries—I once more take the liberty of requesting you to reconsider the arguments that have been before used, and the extremely mild and moderate terms I have offered of only arbitrating claims, which the laws of nature and nations, as well as those of honor and justice, give us a right to demand compensation for, and that without reference.

Your excellency having fully conceded the point, that the French consuls had no right to exercise the power of condemning vessels in Spanish ports, I shall not trouble you with arguments on that subject; but when your excellency goes on to say that His Majesty, in having forbidden the exercise of this power by them, had done all that could be expected from him, and that he was not liable, by the law of nations, for the condemnations and sales made by the said consuls of American vesseis and cargoes, either before or after his prohiition, I not only differ with your excellency, but assert that, by the law of nations, His Majesty is expressly liabble for every condemnation and sale which the consuls were permitted to make in his dominions.

I presume your excellency will not deny that the authority which His Majesty has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction, makes him responsible to others for their conduct, as much, and for the same reasons, that he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects.

Your excellency will also allow that, unless otherwise specially provided for by treaty, according to the law of nations, the French consuls could only exercise the powers therein defined, and that the moment they stepped beyond them, and particularly to the injury of innocent aliens, trading under the sanction of a solemn treaty, it became a duty on His Majesty, not only to forbid the exercise of this unwarrantable and injurious power, but to see that his order was carried fully into effect. To merely issue an order to prohibit it, and not to see it carried into execution, is to do nothing; it operates as a delusion, because, by issuing the prohibition, you hold out an opinion to foreigners that no such a uthority exists, while, in fact, it is suffered to be executed to an extent and with a rigor never before heard of. Your excellency will not say Spain had not the power to prevent its exercise: because we well know she had, and the honor of her Government will not permit her for a moment to resort to this argument. She received the French consuls only on the footing of other consuls, and with the same privileges and powers, as she has expressly declared: if they exceeded these, to the injury of innocent neutrals, and, after being forbidden by His Majesty, still continued to do so, I presume the necessary means should have been used to prevent them. As these means were not used, and as Spain permitted them to continue the exercise of this unheard of authority, while she had the power to prevent it, and ought to have done so according to that principle of the law of nations which declares, that "qui non prohibet quando prohibere possit jubet," His Majesty is to be considered as much liable, in every respect, for these condemnations and violations of territory, as if they had been done by his own subjects, or by his own express authority.

In the equipment of privateers, and the condemnation of prizes in Spanish ports, His Majesty most surely had the same authority to restrain aliens as he had to restrain his own subjects from illegal acts towards other nations. Having this authority, his duty to other nations required him to exert it; and, failing in this duty, I am charged by my Government to repeat it to your excellency, as their decided opinion, that His Majesty has made himself liable to make reparation.

I beg leave to refer your excellency to the general representation made by my predecessor on this subject, on the 24th of January, 1800, and to those made by myself since my arrival, and to the rules established by Vattel, b. 3, §15, 95, 97, 102, and 104, which show how incompatible these aggressions are with the regulations prescribed by the law of nations for the government of neutral countries. I shall only add, that the United States consider this question as a point of national honor which it is impossible for them to relinquish; and I can assure your excellency, with great truth, and I am charged to do so, that it is one on which every branch of our Government is decided and unanimous; that having before refused to relinquish points of national honor, either to Great Britain or to France, they are determined not to do so to Spain; convinced that, if they did, they would have soon to meet similar questions with other countries; but that, having proved, as it is their duty to do now, that our rights must be respected, we shall then have some reason to hope they will remain in future unassailed.

The arbitration of the claims for illegal captures and condemnations by the French and their consuls, however interesting before, has become now, not only extremely important, but absolutely indispensable. War has again commenced between Great Britain and France; we know not to what other parts of Europe its flames will extend; the American commerce must never again be exposed to similar depredations, and their Government must, upon this occasion, show how far they are determined to protect it. Having arranged all their differences with Great Britain and France, it now rests solely to do so with Spain; to effect this, they have offered an equal and amicable arbitration. Your excellency will do me the justice to say, I have proposed and endeavored to accomplish this with all the calmness and moderation in my power, and, perhaps, with more patience than the nature and circumstances of the case warranted. It arose from the friendship I knew my Government had for Spain, and my earnest wish to preserve the peace of the two countries. The period has now arrived when my instructions require me to delay no longer, but to apply to your excellency for a prompt and decisive answer. I made this application to your excellency verbally yesterday, and I now repeat it in writing, and I earnestly hope it may be such a one as it will give me pleasure to transmit.

If your excellency could send me such definitive answer by the 20th instant, I will be obliged, as the American consul for Madrid leaves this on the 22d for the United States.

With sentiments of the most profound respect and perfect consideration, I have the honor, &c. &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State, &c. &c.

Mr. Cevallos to Mr. Pinckney.

San Ildefonso, 23 de Agosto, 1803.

Muy Senor mio:

En el prospecto de convencion ó tratado relativo á indemnizaciones que pase á V. S. de orden del Rey, se presto S. M. á todas las condescendencias que le inspiró su constante deseo de mantener la mejor inteligencia y mas perfecta harmonia con los Estados Unidos; pero V. S. creyó no obstante deber pretender e insistir siempre en que la España se debia renonocer responsable por todos los daños que los corsarios Franceses ocasionaron á los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos, violando el territorio Español.

Sin embargo es mui facil hacer ver, y convencer plenamente, que semejante pretencion no está de acuerdo con el derecho de las naciones; que los exemplares que pueden citarse en su apoyo, siendo producidos por circunstancias politicas del momento, no se deben traher á conseqüencia para que sirvan de norma, ni menos pueden alterar los principios invariables del derecho natural; y que tampoco es conforme dicha pretencion á las relaciones y vinculos particulares con que se ligaron las dos Potencias por el tratado de 1795. Pero reputo por inutil el entrar en discusion detenida sobre estos puntos, ya porque nada de quanto podria decir seria desconocido á V. S., ya porque en varias ocasiones hemos discutido suficientemente sobre ellos, y ya finalmente porque la España puede impugnar la referida pretencion con fundamentos particulares y peculiarmente relativos al caso en qüestion.

Si por los apresamientos que hicieron los corsarios Franceses de buques y cargamentos Americanos, con violacion del territorio Español, hubiera de recaer sobre la España alguna obligacion á pagar indemnicaciones, nunca podria ser mas que una obligacion accesoria y condicional, y de la misma naturaleza que la de una fianza, hipoteca, ó prenda, cuya fuerza desaparece luego que el principal deudor satisface su obligacion, ó se le condona por el acreedor, renunciando este su derecho. Siendo esto indubitable, no lo es menos el que los Estados Unidos, habiendo renunciado, por la solemnidad de una convencion en favor de la Francia, principal deudor, el derecho que tenian á reclamar indemnicaciones por los perjuicios referidos, debe desaparecer la obligacion de la España, á quien á lo mas solo puede considerarse como hipoteticamente responsable.

Que los Estados Unidos han renunciado, en favor de la Francia, el derecho que podian tener á exigir, indemnicaciones por los perjuicios que experimentaron de parte de los corsarios Franceses, es un hecho fuera de toda duda, despues de la convencion concluida entre las dos Potencias el 8 Vendemiaire, del año 9, cuyo articulo segundo es como sigue:

" Les ministres plénipotentiaires des deux parties ne pouvant, pour le présent, s'accorder relativement au traité d'alliance du 6 Février, de 1778, au traité d'amitié et de commerce de la même datte, et à la convention en datte du 14 Novembre, de 1778, non plus que relativement aux indemnités mutuellement dues et reclamés; les parties negocieront ultérieurement sur ces objets dans un temps convenable; et jusqu'à ce quelles se soient accordées sur ce point, les dits traités et convention n'auront point d'effet."

2°. Se presento la dicha convencion al Senado de los Estados Unidos para su ratificacion. El Senado, tal vez, con el fin de cerrar á la Francia la puerta para que no pudiese renovar los tratados citados en el articulo segundo, no quiso ratificarla, si enteramente, no se suprimia el articulo segundo, y hecha esta supresion la ratificó; informado de lo qual el Gobierno Frances la ratificó, por su parte, en los terminos siguientes:

" Les consuls de la république ayant vu et examiné la convention conclue, arrêtée, et signée à Paris, le 8 Vendemiaire, l'an 9 de la république, l'approuvent en tout et en chaqu'un des articles qui sont contenus, déclarent qu'elle est acceptée, &c. Le Gouvernement des Etats Unis ayant ajouté, dans sa ratification, que la convention sera en vigueur pendant l'espace de huit années, et ayant omis l'article sécond, le Gouvernement de la république Françoise consent à accepter, ratifier, et confirmer la convention ci-dessus, avec l'addition qui porte que la convention sera en vigueur pendant l'espace de huit années, et avec le retranchement de l'article sécond: bien entendu, que par ce retranchement les deux états renoncent aux pretentions respectives qui sont l'objet du dit article."

Consentida esta estipulacion por el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos, resulta, por conclusion, que há renunciado perpetuamente el derecho á reclamar indemnicaciones del Gobierno Frances por los mencionados perjuicios; y asi lo informo, en el presente año, á la camara de representantes de los Estados Unidos, el committee encargado de informar sobre las solicitudes que habian presentado al Congreso varios negociantes perjudicados por las depredaciones de los Franceses.

Bien se hizo V. S. cargo en nuestra ultima conferencia del valor de esta respuesta; pero (sin duda porque á su zelo por la defensa de los intereses que le estan encargados, no le quedase el menor escrupulo de no haber tentado todos los medios que le sugeria su politica) pretendio impugnarla, queriendo imponer á la España la principal obligacion y responsabilidad, por los perjuicios que cerca de sus costas ó en sus puertos, ocasionaron los corsarios y tribunales Franceses á los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos. Mas para satisfacer á esta replica y hacer ver que la obligacion principal no podia ser sino de la Francia, bastaria solo examinar el orden que los ciudadanos perjudicados han seguido en sus reclamaciones, y el recurso que han hecho al Congreso, conociendo que por la renuncia que hizo su Gobierno en favor de la Francia, nada tienen que reclamar fuera de su pays; pero aun añadire otra reflexion y es, que sea la Francia la unica responsable por los excesos de sus corsarios, ó sea la España y la Francia juntas, si se quiere suponer; la obligacion es una, sola é indivisible, y disuelta por la renuncia de los Estados Unidos en favor de la Francia falta el supuesto necesario para la reclamacion de aquellos contra la España.

Aunque lo que dexo expuesto á V. S. es de tal fuerza intrinseca que no necesito de otro apoyo para arrastrar el convencimiento, no puedo menos de añadir á V. S. en confirmacion de lo mismo, que los jurisconsultos mas acreditados de los Estados Unidos, algunos de los quales exercen empleos baxo el Gobierno Federal, habiendoseles presentado la qüestion identica que discutimos, solo con el velo de ocultar los nombres de las tres Potencias, España, Francia, y Estados Unidos, y substituir en lugar de ellos las tres primeras letras del alfabeto para indicarlas, han pronunciado su dictamen uniforme deque la España no tiene obligacion alguna á satisfacer las indemnizaciones referidas, supuesta la renuncia hecha en favor de la Francia. Adjuntas, incluyo á V. S. copias literales de la qüestion propuesta á dichos jurisconsultos, que son de los mas celebres de Philadelphia y New York, y de las respuestas de ellos, cuyo original existe en mi poder. Por ellas verá V. S. que, en juzgar el Gobierno de España, que no es responsable á las mencionadas indemnicaciones, juzga como los letrados mas afamados del pays de V. S., y que en haber procurado consultar el dictamen de ellos, no se le puede arguir de haber ido á buscar dictamenes parciales á los intereses de la España; antes bien ha obtenido de la rectitud de dichos letrados una confesion sincera del poco fundamento en que estrivan las reclamaciones de su proprio pays en esta materia.

Concluyo asegurando á V. S. que celebraria que la solicitud de los Estados Unidos fuese de naturaleza de poder acceder á ella mi Gobierno, para poder manifestar á V. S. tambien en esta ocasion que el gabinete de España no se separa del sistema de generosidad y condescendencia con que siempre se ha conducido en quanto ha pertenecido á los Estados Unidos; y aprovecho con gusto esta ocasion de repetir á V. S. mis deseos de complacerle, y deque nuestro Señor guarde á V. S. muchos años.

B. L. M. de V. S., su mas atento servidor,

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Señor Don CARLOS PINCKNEY.

[TRANSLATION.]

ST. ILDEFONSO, August 23, 1803.

SIR:

In the project of a convention or treaty relative to indemnities, which I transmitted to you by order of the King, His Majesty yielded to all the condescensions with which he was inspired by his constant desire to maintain the best understanding and the most perfect harmony with the United States; but you have, nevertheless, thought it your duty to claim and insist that Spain ought to acknowledge herself responsible for all the injuries which the French privateers have occasioned to the citizens of the United States, by violating the Spanish territory.

It is, however, very easy for me to evince, and fully prove, that such a claim is incompatible with the law of nations; that the examples which may be cited in support of it, having been produced by political circumstances of the moment, ought not to be considered as serving for a rule, much less can they alter the invariable principles of natural law; and that as little is such a pretension conformable with the particular relations and ties by which the two nations are bound, in virtue of the treaty of 1795. But I think it useless to enter into a detailed discussion upon these points, as well because nothing which can be said would be unknown to you, as because on various occasions we have sufficiently discussed them, and also because Spain can impugn this pretension on principles which are special, and peculiarly relative to the case in question.

If by the captures which the French cruisers have made of American vessels and cargoes, by violating the Spanish territory, any obligation to pay indemnities could have fallen upon Spain, it never could have been more than an accessary and conditional obligation, and of the same nature with bail, a mortgage, or pledge, whose force is dissolved as soon as the principal debtor complies with his obligation, or is released by the creditor; the latter renouncing his right. This being indubitable, it is not less so that the United States, having renounced, by the solemnity of a convention in favor of France, the principal debtor, the right which they had to claim indemnities for the losses referred to, the obligation of Spain, who, at most, could only be considered as hypothetically responsible, must be dissolved.

That the United States have renounced, in favor of France, the right which they might have to demand indemnities for the losses which they have sustained from the French cruisers, is a fact beyond all doubt, since the convention concluded between the two Powers on the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year, the second article of which is as follows: "The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able at present to agree relative to the treaty of alliance of the 6th February, 1778, to the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and to the convention of the 14th November, 1778, nor relative to the indemnities mutually due and claimed, the parties will hereafter negotiate upon these subjects at a convenient time; and, until they shall be agreed upon this point, the said treaties and convention shall have no effect." Secondly, the said convention was presented to the Senate of the United States for their ratification. The Senate, perhaps, with a view to shut the door against France, in order that the treaties cited in the second article might not be renewed, was not pleased to ratify it without the total suppression of the second article: and, this suppression being made, it ratified it. The French Government, being informed of this, ratified it, on their part, in the following terms: "The Consuls of the republic, having seen and examined the convention concluded, agreed upon, and signed at Paris, on the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year of the republic, approve it in all and every of the articles therein contained, declare that it is accepted, &c. The Government of the United States having added in its ratification that the convention shall be in force during the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition which declares that the convention shall be in force during the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That, by this retrenchment, the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." This stipulation having been agreed to by the Government of the United States, it results, as a consequence, that it has renounced forever the right to claim indemnities from the French Government for the aforesaid damages; and thus it was reported, in the present year, to the House of Representatives of the United States, by the committee appointed to consider the petitions presented to Congress by sundry merchants who suffered by the depredations of the French.

In our last conference, you seemed sensible of the weight of this reply; but (doubtless in order that, from your zeal for the defence of the interests confided to you, the smallest scruple might not remain of your not having attempted all the means suggested by your political skill,) you endeavored to impugn it, by striving to lay upon Spain the principal obligation and responsibility for the losses which, near her coasts, or in her ports, the French privateers and tribunals have occasioned to citizens of the United States. But to satisfy this reply, and to evince that the principal obligation can remain only with France, it will be sufficient merely to examine the course which the citizens injured have pursued in their claims, and in the application they have made to Congress, whereby they acknowledged that, by the renunciation which their Government made to France, they were deprived of the right of making a claim any where but at home; but I will, nevertheless, add another reflection, which is, that, whether France is alone responsible for the injuries done by privateers, or Spain and France jointly, if you choose to suppose it, the obligation is one, sole, and indivisible, and dissolved by the renunciation of the United States in favor of France; and thus fails the supposition necessary for their claim against Spain.

Although what I have remarked to you is of such intrinsic force that it needs no other support to arrest conviction, I cannot omit adding to you, in confirmation of the same, that the most esteemed lawyers of the United States, some of whom hold offices under the Federal Government, having had the same question which we are discussing presented to them, with only a concealment of the names of the three Powers, Spain, France, and the United States, and a substitution in their place of the first three letters of the alphabet to indicate them, have given their opinion uniformly that Spain is under no obligation to satisfy the indemnities referred to, on the supposition of the renunciation in favor of France. Annexed, I enclose to you literal copies of the question proposed to the said lawyers, who are among the most esteemed of Philadelphia and New York, and of their answers, the original of which is in my hands. By them you will see that the Government of Spain, in judging that it is not responsible for the said indemnities, judges as do the learned in highest repute in the United States; and that, in having endeavored to consult their opinion, it cannot be argued that they procured opinions partial to the interests of Spain. It has rather obtained, from the rectitude of the said learned, a sincere confession of the slender foundation on which the claims of their own country on this subject rest.

I conclude, by assuring you I should be glad if the request of the United States were of such a nature that my Government could accede to it, in order to manifest to you equally on this occasion that the cabinet of Spain does not depart from the system of generosity and condescension with which she has always acted in whatever relates to the United States; and I improve, with pleasure, this occasion to repeat to you my desires to please you, and that our Lord would guard you many years, &c. &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.

ABSTRACT QUESTION.

The Power A lives in perfect harmony and friendship with Power B. The Power C, either with reason or without, commits hostilities against the subjects of the Power B, takes some of their vessels, carries them into the ports of A, friend of both, where they are condemned and sold by the official agents of Power C, without Power A being able to prevent it. At last a treaty is entered into, by which the Powers B & C adjust their differences, and in this treaty the Power B renounces and abandons to Power C the right to any claim for the injuries and losses occasioned to its subjects by the hostilities from Power C.

Quere.—Has the Power B any right to call upon Power A for indemnities for the losses occasioned in its ports and coasts to its subjects by those of Power C, after the Power B has abandoned or relinquished, by its treaty with C, its rights for the damages which could be claimed for the injuries sustained from the hostile conduct of the Power C?

Answer. We have considered the above case, and are of opinion that, on the general principles of the law of nations, the Power A is not liable to the Power B for acts done upon the vessels belonging to the subjects of Power B, by the Power C, within the ports of A, the latter not being able to prevent it. Nations are not, any more than individuals, bound to perform impossibilities.

But even leaving impossibilities out of the question, and admitting that the Power A could have prevented the injury which was committed by the Power C, but refused or neglected to do it, we are of opinion that, if the Power B has released or relinquished the same injury to Power C, in that case the Power A is no longer liable to any responsibility in damages on account of its acquiescence.

1st. Because it appears to us that, in the present case, the Power C is to be considered as the principal party, and the Power A merely as an accessory, and that it is in that relation to each other that their several acts and their respective liability to the injured party is to be considered: now, it is in the nature of all accessory things that they cannot subsist without the principal thing; and the principal trespass being done away by the release to C, the accessory offence of A must be done away likewise, according to the well known maxim of the law accessorium sequitur principale.

2d. Because a release or relinquishment of a right implies in law the receipt of satisfaction, and it is contrary to every principle of jurisprudence for a party to receive a double satisfaction for the same injury; and here the injury received by B from C and from A is essentially the same: the act of those two Powers were indeed different, but the effect which they produced was the same, and that effect only can be the object of compensation in damages.

3d. Because if the Power A could be compelled to make satisfaction to Power B for the injury which the latter has released or relinquished to C, that release or relinquishment would be defeated to every useful purpose, as the Power C would be liable to the Power A for the same damages from which it was intended to be discharged by the release of B. Now a release, as well as every other contract or engagement, implies that nothing shall be done by the grantor directly or indirectly to defeat its bona fide intent or effect. If, therefore, the claim preferred by B upon A will, if admitted, indirectly defeat the release granted to C, such claim must be pronounced to be illegal.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the release granted by the Power B to the Power C operates also a release to the Power A, for its participation in the injury which was the object of that release.

PHILADELPHIA, November 15, 1802.

Answer of the Attorney General of the District of New York to the same Question.

According to the above statement, I should have no doubt that B, having abandoned its rights to indemnity against C, would have no claim whatever against A, more especially as the case supposes it out of the Power of A to have prevented the transaction.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, August 28, 1803.

I feel it my duty to reply to your excellency's letter of the 23d instant, which was handed to me a few days ago at the royal Sitio of San Ildefonso, the more especially as your excellency seems now somewhat to have changed the grounds of your defence. Formerly, I thought that the question between us rested upon the law of nations, and to that point I directed my arguments; but now, your excellency says, 1st, That we have received compensation; and 2d, (if I understand the application of the abstract question) That Spain was not able to prevent the injuries we suffered in her ports, from the citizens or subjects of a foreign nation. Before I enter into the discussion of these new topics, I must be permitted to observe, that they appear to me somewhat inconsistent with the first position taken by your excellency; for, if we have received compensation, it is a simple matter of fact, and at once does away the necessity of resorting to general principles, which are, unfortunately, but too apt to be misunderstood or misapplied even by those whose intentions are perfectly upright; on the contrary, if these were so evidently against us, as your excellency is pleased to say they are, I am surprised that a resort should be had to the confession that Spain was not the mistress of her ports. The tendency of these observations, and of others which might be drawn from the same source, (but that I do not wish to dilate upon the subject,) is to produce a conviction in my mind, either that your excellency apprehends that our claims cannot be resisted upon the general principles of the law of nations, or that it will, on some future occasion, be injurious to Spain to admit this doctrine. If I am mistaken, your excellency will, I hope, do me the honor to favor me with the arguments to show the application of general principles against us. Until then, I shall look upon this ground as abandoned, and endeavor to prove to your excellency that we did not, by rejecting the second article of the convention with France, relinquish our claim against Spain. It is admitted that, by this rejection, "the two States renounced the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." Now these were (so far as relates to the present discussion) the indemnities mutually due and claimed. The question, then, is, what were the indemnities mutually due and claimed? To decide upon this, we are again brought back to general principles; and until it is shown, by the application of these, that our claim upon Spain is unfounded, it cannot be said that we have received compensation from France. The abstract question submitted to the learned gentlemen of Philadelphia and New York does not fit the present case, as, in the statement made to them, it is affirmed that the Power B renounces and abandons to Power C the right of any claim for the injuries and losses occasioned to its subjects by the hostilities from Power C. Now this is taking for granted the very thing to be proved, and, consequently, any deductions drawn from such premises are inadmissible: the question ought to have been, did the Power A violate the laws of nations, by suffering the Power C to make free use of her ports in arming privateers to cruise against the vessels of Power B, and also, by suffering her to establish in the same courts for condemning and selling the said vessels when brought in as prizes? And if this is a violation of the law of nations, whether is the Power B to seek redress from the Power C or the Power A? Your excellency must admit that this is the simple question stripped of any extraneous matter; and if it is determined that the Power B has its recourse against the Power A, then no subsequent arrangement with the Power C can effect this claim, unless it expressly includes it. Does, then, the arrangement between France and the United States express the relinquishment of any claims which the latter may have upon Spain? It certainly does not, for Spain is not mentioned in this arrangement. Hence it follows, that if our claim against Spain is supported by the law of nations, or the principles of justice, it cannot be vitiated by our convention with France. Your excellency well knows that the practice of our Government, and the reclamations of my predecessor, show that we held Spain liable for the injuries we received in her ports; and this clearly proves that, by ratifying the convention with France, we meant not to relinquish our claims upon Spain; and I must suppose that your excellency did not, until very lately, think that we had done it, as I do not remember that you ever before advanced the opinion; and certainly, if it was well founded, there could not be a stronger argument against us, and I am sure it is one which would not have escaped the enlightened mind of your excellency.

There is another inaccuracy, as it applies to the present case, in the abstract question alluded to above, for it turns principally upon the inability of the Power A to prevent, within its ports, the aggressions of the Power C. This I presume could not have been the case with Spain, and the circumstance of an Algerine vessel being delivered up in Cadiz proves that it was not; but at all events, whatever might have been the inability of Spain, it was incumbent on her to make an effort proportionate to the object, and, if she then failed, her moral obligation ceased; but if, for wise and prudential considerations best known to herself, she chose not to make this effort, but rather to suffer the property of her friends to be sacrificed in her ports, this was the price which she paid for peace, and to those at whose expense the payment was made she is certainly bound in honor to make compensation. We admitted this reasoning when it operated against ourselves; for we paid the British for their vessels sold in our ports by the French, because we did not, at the time, think it prudent to use all our efforts to procure the restoration of them. This is precisely a case in point, and, having paid then, we have a better right to receive now.

I have thus endeavored to answer the objections of your excellency, and to show that nothing has been done on either side to impair that claim which accrues to us against His Majesty, from the general principles of justice, as sanctioned by the laws and usages of nations. I have so repeatedly urged the force of these principles in our favor, without receiving from your excellency more than a simple denial of my conclusions, that I cannot suppose it would be useful to say any thing more as to that point. It now only remains for me to inform your excellency, that I shall forward to the United States the letters which have passed between us, and also a detail of our conversations, that my Government may have this subject before them, as fully as it is in my power to place it. They will then determine what it is proper for them to do: but I cannot close this letter without reminding your excellency of the unpleasant situation in which they will be placed. Convinced that it can neither be the interest nor the intention of His Majesty to injure them, they will yet see with regret that, for some years past, the conduct of Spain has not been altogether as friendly towards them as they could have wished. I will not probe too deeply into the subject; but I feel it my duty to tell your excellency, that, in my opinion, something must be done on the part of His Catholic Majesty to adjust our well founded claims in an equal and honorable manner, or I fear he will lessen the friendship of the people and Government of the United States, which has hitherto been sincere and respectful; and I do hope that His Majesty will direct his minister in the United States to make to our Government some conciliatory propositions, which may tend to preserve a friendly and harmonious intercourse between our two nations; or, if it is more agreeable to His Majesty to make me the organ of these communications, I beg your excellency to believe that it would not be possible to impose on me a more pleasing task, for it is my most anxious wish to prevent a misunderstanding between our two countries, connected together by mutual wants, and freed from the jealousies of a rival commerce, or interfering or rival productions.

With sentiments of the most profound respect and perfect consideration,

I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant.

8th CONGRESS.] No. 188. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE—PRIVATE ARMED VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 1, 1805.

To the Senate of the United States: JANUARY 31, 1805.

According to the desire expressed in your resolution of the 28th instant, I now communicate a report of the Secretary of State, with documents relative to complaints against arming the merchant ships and vessels of the United States, and the conduct of the captains and crews of such as have been armed.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President of the United States has been pleased to refer the resolution of the Senate of the 28th instant, requesting that there may be laid before the Senate such documents and papers, or other information, as the President should judge proper, relative to complaints against arming the merchant ships or vessels of the United States, or the conduct of the captains and crews of such as have been armed, has the honor to annex hereto:

1st. A copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by the envoy of Great Britain, dated on the 31st of August last.

2d. An extract of a letter to the same, from the late chargé d'affaires of France, dated 6th May last, which was preceded and followed by other letters and conversations of the same gentleman, urging the subject upon the attention of the Government. It has been also urged, by the present minister of France, in his interviews with the Secretary of State.

Of the enclosures alluded to in the aforesaid letter and extract, the only authenticated statement, relative to the conduct of American private armed vessels, which has been received at this Department, is contained in the annexed letter from Mr. George Barnewall, of New York, and the document accompanying it.

All which is repectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 21, 1805.

No. 1.

Mr. Merry to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, August 31, 1804.

SIR:

I have received information respecting several vessels which have of late been armed in, and have sailed from, the different ports of the United States: some loaded with articles contraband of war, (gunpowder is said to be the general article,) others with cargoes of innocent goods, and others again in ballast. After the diligent inquiry which it has been my duty to make on so important a subject, I think that I can have the honor of stating to you, with certainty, that several vessels of the above description, which are mentioned to be schooner rigged, have sailed lately from the port of Baltimore, whilst others, of a larger size, even ships of considerable burthen, and completely equipped for war, have sailed from the port of Philadelphia, bound to the possessions of His Majesty's enemies in the East as well as West Indies. It is said, that the object of some of these equipments is to force a trade with the blacks in the island of St. Domingo; in which attempt, the public prints have stated so circumstantially, as to leave no doubt on the subject, that two American vessels have been captured by French cruisers, after making resistance; but I have strong reason to believe that the destination of others, particularly from the port of Philadelphia, has been with cargoes of contraband articles to the enemy's possessions in the East and West Indies. Let their destinations, however, be what they may, it cannot, I conceive, but be justly considered, that such armaments, on the part of the citizens of a neutral State, must be attended with consequences prejudicial to a belligerent Power, and may therefore be deemed rightly as offensive; for which reason, the law of nations has stated one of the first obligations of neutrality to be, that of abstaining from all participation in warlike expeditions. The armed vessels alluded to may become the property of the King's enemies, either by capture at sea, or by purchase in the ports to which they are destined, and are thus in readiness to be converted immediately into instruments of hostility against His Majesty; whilst, in another point of view, they are calculated to protect the vessels, when they are loaded with contraband articles, against the lawful search and detention of a lawfully commissioned cruiser, when the latter shall happen to be of inferior force. Indeed, I conceive that it may not be giving too great an extent to the principle of the law of nations, without attending to the nature of the cargo, to consider the very arms, ammunition, and other implements of war, with which such vessels are furnished, as contraband articles, when the vessels have been thus equipped without the authority of the nation to which they belong.

I understand, sir, that the armaments in question have, in fact, taken place under no commission or authority whatever from the Government of the United States. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to have the honor of making you acquainted with the information that has reached me on this subject; and if the observations which I have taken the liberty to make upon it should happily be conformable to the sentiments of the American Government, I can safely trust to their justice, as well as to their jealousy of observing the most strict neutrality in the present war, to take such measures as shall appear to them the most proper for suppressing the illegal proceedings complained of, on the part of those individual citizens of the United States who shall appear to be concerned in them.

I have the honor to be, with high respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ANT. MERRY.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

No. 2.

Extract of a letter from the Chargé des Affaires of France, dated May 7, 1804, and addressed to the Secretary of State.

[TRANSLATION.]

The undersigned is informed, in a manner which leaves him no room to doubt it, that the American merchants who pursue this commerce, [meaning the commerce with St. Domingo,] publicly arm, in the ports of the United States, vessels which are intended to support, by force, a traffic contrary to the law of nations, and to repel the efforts which the cruisers of the French republic are authorized to make, in order to prevent it. These armaments have also for their object to cover the conveyance of munitions to the revolted of that colony. The Government of the United States cannot be ignorant of these facts, which are public: the consequences thereof have already been manifested in the West Indies, where the public papers advise that there have been actions between the French cruisers and American vessels carrying on this commerce.

In considering the matter merely under the view of the law of nations, it is manifest that American citizens, under the very eyes of their Government, carry on a private and piratical war against a Power with which the United States are at peace. The undersigned would be wanting in his duty if he did not vindicate, under such circumstances, the rights and the dignity of his Government, which are openly injured; and if he did not call the attention of Mr. Madison to the disagreeable reflections which the French Government would have a right to make, if the silence of the local authorities, respecting acts of this nature, should be imitated by the Government of the United States.

The French Government certainly could not see, without a profound regret, that, after having given to the United States the most marked proofs of the desire to place the good understanding of the two nations upon the most immoveable foundations, by abandoning national interests, which might have eventually produced collisions, individual interests should now be permitted to compromit this good understanding. Its regret would be still much greater, if, when the dignity and the safety of France are openly injured in the United States, by their citizens, the American Government should preserve, respecting these violations, a silence, which would appear to offer an excuse, and even a sort of encouragement, to all the excesses which cupidity may attempt. Besides that, the peace of the two nations cannot but be seriously compromitted by the proceedings of the individuals, and by the reprisals to which they must necessarily lead: this state of things would infallibly tend to diminish the amicable dispositions which the two Governments wish to cultivate.

NEW YORK, September 6, 1804.

SIR:

The sufferings of innocent individuals induce me to the liberty I now take of submiting the following statement to your consideration:

In the month of June last, I despatched the ship Hopewell, Preserved Sisson, master, and the brig Rockland, —— Akens, master, with suitable cargoes, destined for Aux Cayes, in the island of Hispaniola; the former armed for defence with twelve six pound cannon and two twelve pounders with small arms, &c.; a crew of thirty-five in number, besides passengers: the latter with eight six pounders, small arms, &c., and a crew of twenty in number, besides passengers. Both these vessels were regularly cleared at the custom-house of this district, and sailed on their intended voyage on the 17th of June. In the prosecution of which, they were met with and captured by a privateer belonging to individuals of the island of Guadaloupe, whither they were carried, and their crews put into close confinement. I beg leave to refer you to the document enclosed for the particulars of the situation in which those unfortunate men are placed; and have the honor to be, &c.

GEO. BARNEWALL.

JAMES MADISON, Esq. &c. &c.

GUADALOUPE, POINT PETRE, July 26, 1804.

SIR:

No doubt ere this you have heard of the capture of the Hopewell and brig Rockland. Owing to S. W. and S. S. W. winds, was obliged to go to the eastward of Bermuda, in lat. 27° 38′, long. 61° 57′, on the 30th of June, at 3, A. M. Saw a brig which appeared to be dogging us, and at daylight she bore down on us, hoisted an English ensign, and fired a gun to leeward: we were then under all the sail we could set; but finding she came up with us very fast, we hoisted American colors, and fired a gun to leeward, and shortened sail. I hailed the Rockland, and desired Captain Akens to keep on our lee bow, and near us, as I wished to speak the privateer first, and know what he was, before we attempted any thing. She was then on our weather quarter; the Rockland not keeping in her station, dropping more to leeward, and nearly on our lee quarter; the privateer was then almost within hail of us, but immediately up helm and run along side the Rockland, and commenced firing under English colors, which was returned from the brig. The privateer being between us and the brig, prevented my firing until I got in a situation to fire clear of the Rockland, which was in less than a moment, when we commenced firing to the best advantage we could: the Rockland fired only one broadside and some musketry, when she was boarded; they only left three men on board, sheered off, and gave us a broadside, and attempted to board us, but was repulsed by our quarter gun pikes and musketry; they then kept clear of our pikes, and played continually with all their men, with nothing but musketry. Our men seeing their shipmates falling, most of the landsmen quit their quarters: the privateer seeing this, attempted the second time to board us, by cutting our nettings, and overpowered us by numbers; was obliged to haul down our colors, and quit the deck, otherwise be cut in pieces; we had three killed, four badly wounded, and two slightly wounded; the first who fell was poor Mr. Bird; he was standing near me; he received one ball through his body, and one through his head, and never after spoke a word. I begged him some time before to go below, and prepare his papers: he said they were already prepared, and would not quit the deck; in consequence of which all his papers were found. It was not my intention to engage the privateer, unless I thought we were sure of getting clear; but the Rockland commencing so quick, I could not then avoid it; but even had we suffered them to board us, they would have made a prize of us; the passengers on board were sufficient to condemn us; upwards of one hundred letters were found with them directed to different parts of St. Domingo, and, among the passengers, there were two noted generals who were well known by the Frenchmen; and among Mr. Bird's papers were found instructions from Mr. Lapierre pointing out the whole plan of the voyage. Many other letters were found with Mr. Bird's papers, all of which tended to condemn the ship, which they showed me at Point Petre when I was examined.

When they boarded us, nothing saved our lives but their thinking we were English, and asked us how we dare engage under American colors; and did not believe we were Americans even after we arrived. After the Rockland was boarded we engaged the privateer close on board for forty minutes. When the black general, a passenger, found we were captured, he ran below with a pistol, with an intention to blow the ship up, and with much difficulty we prevented it. He set all the cartridges on fire in the cabin and steerage, which was in pouch tubs, and only my laying the magazine scuttle over, saved the ship and our lives. When he found he could not blow the ship up, he put the pistol to his head, and blew his own brains out. The privateer took out all the passengers, officers, and men except myself, carpenter, two boys, and one of our men badly wounded. The privateer continued with us until we arrived in this port, which was on the 17th July, and was immediately put altogether in a most miserable prison with nothing to eat but stinking beef and coarse bread, and very short even of that. They will not suffer me to see any Americans, nor have any communication with any body. There is a schooner called the Snake in the Grass, bought in New York and fitted out at Salem with five guns, taken and brought here a few days before me: one of the mates is allowed to go out at times, and this was the only opportunity I had to write. They say that orders have gone to America, that every vessel bound to St. Domingo, if taken, shall be treated as pirates. God only knows what they mean to do with us. I beg you will do all in your power to get our Government to claim us, otherwise I dont know what they may do: they seem to be inveterate against the Americans, and even told me every ship and captain's name that was armed from New York.

Captain Akens had his mate killed, and one man, and several wounded, himself wounded, and died at this place on the 22d instant.

The schooner Snake in the Grass was commanded by James Mansfield, who is also in prison, with all his men. The vessel will be condemned, although they did not fire a shot. As no protest can be made here, I thought it best to let the officers sign this letter with me. Several large privateers are getting ready to go down in the bite after the Americans. The privateer that took us was the brig Ferbriskey, Captain Antwan, with ten long French sixes, two twelve pound carronades, one long eighteen pounder, and one hundred and fifty men. The French seem to be very inveterate against the Americans, and insult us as they pass the prison. All that I can say more is to request you to do what you can with our Government, to claim us as Americans. I think the manner in which the French privateer engaged us, under English colors, will be a sufficient reason for them to claim us. All that I can say more is, that your ship and property were defended with spirit, until overpowered by numbers.

I am, sir, with respect, your most obedient servant,

P. SISSON,
MAHLON BENNET,
JAMES ROSS, Jun.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of New York, ss:

I, William Popham, Notary Public, duly admitted and sworn, dwelling in the city of New York, and having power by commission, under the great seal of the State of New York, to attest deeds, wills, and all other writings, and also to administer oaths, and grant certificates thereof, do hereby certify, declare, and make known unto all persons to whom these presents shall come, or may in anywise concern, that the foregoing is a just, true, and perfect copy of an original letter, (whereof it purports to be a copy) this day handed to me by George Barnewell, of the city of New York, merchant, in order to have a notarial copy made thereof; I, the said notary, having carefully compared and examined the said copy, with the said original letter, and found the same to agree therewith word for word, and figure for figure; and I the said notary do hereby further certify, and declare, that, upon the day of the date hereof, before me personally came and appeared Dominick Purcell, of the said city of New York, gentleman, who being by me duly sworn, did solemnly depose and declare, that he was well acquainted with the handwritings and signatures of Preserved Sisson, the master, and Mahlon Bennet, the first mate of the ship Hopewell of this port, and that he verily believes the names "P. Sisson and Mahlon Bennet," set and subscribed to the said original letter, are of the respective handwritings and signatures of the said Preserved Sisson and Mahlon Bennet; and he further deposeth and sayeth, that James Ross, Jun., who hath also signed the said original letter, sailed from this port in the capacity of second mate of the said ship Hopewell; and further he sayeth not.

DOMINICK PURCELL.

Of all which, I, the said notary, do now make this public act, that the same may serve, and be of full force and value, as of right it shall appertain.

In testimony whereof, the said Dominick Purcell hath subscribed the foregoing deposition, and, I, the said notary, have hereto subscribed my name and affixed my seal of office, at the city of New York, the twenty-first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the independence of the United States of America the twenty-ninth.

DENMARK.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 5, 1805.

FEBRUARY 5, 1805.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The Secretary of State has lately received a note from the Danish chargé des affaires, claiming, in the name of his Government, restitution, in the case of the brig Hendrick, communicated to Congress at a former session; in which note were transmitted sundry documents, chiefly relating to the value and neutral character of the vessel, and to the question whether the judicial proceedings were instituted and conducted without the concurrence of the captain of the Hendrick. As these documents appear to form a necessary appendage to those already before Congress, and throw additional light on the subject, I transmit copies of them herewith.

TH: JEFFERSON.

I, David Matthew Clarkson, at present of the island of St. Bartholomew, merchant, do most solemnly declare and swear, that I was residing in the island of St. Christopher, in the town of Basseterre, as agent for the United States, in the month of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, when the Danish brig Hendrick, Peter Scheelt, master, of Altona, was brought into that port by the United States' brig of war called the Pickering, Benjamin Hillier, commander. And I do further swear, that said brig and her cargo were libelled as a prize for a salvage by said Benjamin Hillier in the British court of Vice Admiralty at the said island, and that it was proceeded against the said brig and cargo upon the said libel at the instance of the captors, and not at the instance of neutral Captain Peter Scheelt; and in every part of the transaction of said vessel and cargo, the said captain refused to give any advice in the management of the same, alleging that, the property being neutral, he had taken the requisite steps in making such protests as would fully justify him to the owners and others concerned, and made no doubt ample recompense would be made elsewhere.

DAVID M. CLARKSON.

Before me, Andrew Bergstedt, Justiciarius in the island of St. Bartholomew, personally appeared Mr. David Matthew Clarkson, a merchant living in the town of Gustaria, island aforesaid, who, on his solemn oath, taken before me according to law, deposes and says, that the foregoing declaration which he did sign before me, does not contain any thing but what he knows to be true, that the whole tenor thereof is true, and nothing but the truth.

Done in Gustaria, on the island of St. Bartholomew, this 5th day of July, 1804, in presence of Charles Frederick Warderman and Matthew Winfield, witnesses, who have hereunto set their names, together with me, the Justiciarius aforesaid.

Perhaps Captain Scheelt never saw it or was told of it; and if he never went to that place, he could never see it.

Here before the court of justice of the Chief President of this town, on this day, John Humphreys, citizen and merchant of this town, sole owner of the Danish ship Hendrick, before commanded by Captain Peter Scheelt, made his oath and saith, that he is the sole owner of the Danish brig ship Hendrick, bought for his own account at London, and afterwards, according to the annexed charter-party, No. 1, having let this ship for the stipulated freight in the month of May, 1799, to the Hamburg merchants mentioned in said charter-party, bound on a voyage from Hamburg to Cape François, and from there back to Hamburg; that, after having legitimated himself to be sole owner of the said ship, according to the annexed Latin certificate, No. 2, and the annexed English translation thereof, No. 3, he had received due passports for such a voyage; and the abovementioned ship having set sail under the command of Captain Peter Scheelt, but has been taken and seized on such voyage by a French privateer, and retaken by the United States' ship Pickering, commanded by Benjamin Hillier, Esq. and brought to St. Kitts, where, however, the ship and cargo have been acknowledged to be neutral property; but because it had been retaken from the French privateer, the Court of Vice Admiralty has adjudicated the half of the amount of ship and cargo to be paid to the American ship of war, and the expenses to be paid by the owners of the ship and cargo; and that after the sale having been performed, the half amount has been paid to the American ship of war at St. Kitts. The damage and loss thereof arisen, consists, according to the annexed account, No. 4, after having been deducted at St. Christopher per saldo, received 2757 ‖ 6, bco. in banco 64,983 3, say sixty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-three marks three shillings banco. The freight, mentioned in this account, is, according to the annexed charter-party, No. 1, the least, and sufficiently proved by the original charter-party; the amount of the ship, like the calculated insurance premium, is, by the annexed certified copy of the original policy of insurance, No. 5; after which the ship has been taxed on 20,000 marks banco, and by the annexed bill of taxation of the sworn taxer, and ship carpenter at Altona, John Henry Wordsman, who has taxed said ship on 17,500 marks banco, to which the equipping, amounting to about 2,500 marks, is to be added; yet so the sum of 20,000 marks banco, and that also the sum mentioned in said account per saldo of 64,983 ‖ 3, is the true and very sum which he has to ask for the indemnification of his ship, as I do hereby certify as chief of this town.

Witness my proper handwriting, and approved town seal, Altona, before the court of justice of the Chief President, the 8th November, 1803.

ALTONA, June 1, 1799.

We, burgomaster and counsellors of the town of Altona, do hereby certify and declare, that this day, the 29th of the month of June, in the year 1799, appeared before us, John Humphreys, dwelling and residing in the town of Altona, and by the oath with which he has assermented his fidelity to His Majesty, our sovereign King, he made his declaration that the ship or vessel, named Hendrick, of the burden of fifty lasts of commerce, belongs to the port of Altona, and that the said ship or vessel Hendrick is truly and avowedly the property of him, the subject of His Majesty, our sovereign, only; and that the said ship or vessel is now destined to go from the port of Hamburg to the port of Cape François, in the island of St. Domingo; and further, laden with the merchandises mentioned in the manifest, in place of that of the custom-house officers, there being no custom-house in this place; and that the said deponent also declares on oath, that the said ship or vessel is belonging to His Danish Majesty's subjects only; and does not contain any prohibited goods destined for any of the parties now at war.

In witness whereof, we have ordered this certificate to be signed by the secretary of this town, and the town seal affixed thereto.

Ex commissione senatus,

S. H. GERCKEN, [L. S.] Secretary.

ALTONA, JUNE 1, 1799.

We, the abovementioned burgomasters and counsellors, do likewise attest, that Peter Scheelt, master and subject of His Majesty the King of Denmark, Norway, &c. has, by means of a solemn oath, declared before us, that to his, the said master's, knowledge, with his consent and will, nothing has been transacted, nor shall be transacted, against the contents of the abovementioned certificate; and further, that he will not misapply neither the said certificate nor the King's passport.

In fidem, S. H. GERCKEN.

[The following reports relate to the same subject.]

JANUARY 3, 1804.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted, the 26th ultimo, a report of the same committee on a motion relative to a provision for the relief of the owners of the Danish brigantine Hendrick, together with sundry accompanying documents, made the following supplementary report:

That your committee have procured from the Secretary of State the original invoice of the cargo of the Hendrick, an authentic translation of the charter-party, an account of sales of the brig and cargo at St. Christopher, and an additional amount of sales, which, together with a representation made by the agent of the Danish owners to the Danish minister resident in the United States, are herewith presented. From these documents, it is presumed that the estimate of the value of the vessel and cargo, contained in the report of the Secretary, will appear to be correct.

No other facts relative to the case having come to the knowledge of the committee since their former report, they offer to the House the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the sum of —— dollars ought to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to make such restitution as shall appear to be just and equitable to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Hendrick, and her cargo, which were re-captured by an American armed vessel in the year 1799, and sold, by order of the Vice Admiralty Court, in the British island of St. Christopher.

Representation of the agent of the Danish owners.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 8, 1803.

SIR:

In capacity of attorney in fact for the late owners of the brig Hendrick and her cargo, I think it incumbent on me to lay their case before you, and to request your interference with the Government of the United States in their behalf, having not been able to obtain the least redress during these several years past, but have been sent from the executive to the courts of justice. I, from these motives, must now trouble you for to endeavor to obtain justice, as the learned gentlemen at law insist upon, that the case is so conducted and managed by the officers of the navy and the American agent and consul at St. Kitts, as to impede all transactions at court.

The case is that of a bona fide neutral vessel and cargo taken by the French whilst going to one of their colonies, retaken by an American vessel of war, carried into a British island, and there condemned, on the very day of her arrival, for the payment of an exorbitant salvage, almost equivalent to a total loss: under such circumstances of oppression and unfair combination, and by such a mockery of legal proceedings, as render it one of those cases of flagrant injustice, which it has ever been the pride as well as the duty of Governments to redress, when they had the means in their power, which I conceive to be the case in the present instance. I have no doubt, therefore, but what your application to a Government so eminently distinguished for its love of justice as that of the United States, will not fail of meeting with the desired effect.

Permit me now, sir, to state to you the particulars of the case, and the object of the intended application to the American Government.

The brig Hendrick sailed from Altona in July, 1799, bound to Cape François, having a cargo of beer, wine, and other articles, the produce of Hamburg, Spain, and Altona, belonging to sundry shippers, all Danes and Hamburgers.

The brig was unarmed, was regularly owned, commanded, manned, and documented as a bona fide Danish vessel. The documents respecting the cargo were also perfectly regular, as being bona fide neutral property.

On the 3d of October, 1799, she was captured by a French privateer from Guadaloupe. Although those privateers captured almost every thing they met with on the high seas, yet the authorities of the island paid great respect to the Danish flag; and Danish vessels, when carried in, were generally released without delay, often with restitution of damages. The fact is notorious, and is attested by the letters of the Governor General of the Danish islands to the American Secretary of State, whereof a copy is conveyed herewith.

On the 8th she was re-captured by the United States' ship Ganges, Captain Tingey, and afterwards carried into St. Kitts, by the United States' brig Pickering, Captain Hillier, where she arrived on the 10th of the said month on which day the captain entered his protest in due form. On the same day, the captain was brought before a court of Vice Admiralty, and there examined on the standing interrogatories, as is usual in all cases of capture and re-capture; and, on the same day, the vessel was adjudged, together with her cargo, to pay a salvage to the re-captors of one-half part of the gross appraised value.

A condemnation of a neutral vessel and cargo, on the very day of her being carried into port, is I, believe, sir, a thing unheard of in the annals of civilized nations. But the manner in which this act of injustice was perpetrated, when considered in all its details, is calculated to excite a blush at the degeneracy of human nature.

I have the honor, sir, of enclosing herewith, together with the other papers relative to this case, what has been delivered as an exemplification of all the records of these proceedings, and which, I believe, does really contain all the documents that are on the files of the court in that particular case.

The first thing which is to be observed in this singular document is, that the several papers it contains are copied therein in an inverted order, whether from inattention or design I cannot positively say. The libel of Captain Tingey, which is very long and very formal, and which ought to have been placed next after the Captain's examination, is, on the contrary, placed at the end of the proceedings, immediately before the sentence. If this has not been done out of mere slovenliness in the copying clerk, it is possible that it may be connected with an attempt that manifests itself in some part of the proceedings, to make the Danish captain appear as the libellant, (as, in fact, he is in several instances thus called, though, in other places, he is properly styled as claimant,) and such he really was: for this instrument, which appears filed in his name, is a claim in form and in substance, and Captain Hillier, of the brig Pickering, who comes in after him, with a kind of petition to claim the prize as the true recaptor, calls it, in true technical terms, the claim or allegation filed by Captain Peter Scheelt in the above cause.

The object, if there be any design in the matter to make Captain Scheelt appear in the light of a libellant, would evidently tend to make it appear that Captain Tingey and Captain Hillier were forced by him into a foreign Court of Admiralty, and to argue therefrom, that, it being his own exploit, he had no right to complain of the consequence.

But, without admitting the inference, the record itself shows that there could be no foundation as to the fact: for Captain Tingey's libel does not appear in the form of an answer, or of an incidental application, as, for instance, the petition of Captain Hillier, but is the regular form of a libel introductory to a suit. Secondly, Captain Scheelt's examination on the standing interrogatories, before any other proceedings took place, exhibits him in his real situation of defendant, in a cause respecting a prize; and lastly, (and this is not the least singular circumstance displayed in these strange proceedings,) Captain Scheelt's claim, though regularly dated on the 10th of October, is marked as filed only on the 11th, the day after the sentence was pronounced. I think it strongly presumable, sir, that this claim, by which Captain Scheelt is made to demand restitution of the vessel and cargo, on a payment of a reasonable salvage, (an admission every neutral captain, of the smallest understanding, it is supposed, will readily object to, if exhibited at all, for the circumstance of its being filed after sentence pronounced seems to authorize every suspicion on that score,) was exhibited without his knowledge, or without his being apprised of the real contents thereof. It is not signed by him, but by a Mr. Carney, who styles himself his proctor, and does not appear in any subsequent stage of the proceedings.

It is, however, succeeded by an affidavit, which appears to have been signed by him, but which has no direct reference to the claim, and expresses nothing relative thereunto. Now, a claim, to be regular, must not only be signed, but expressly and directly sworn to by the party claimant; it may, therefore, be presumed that only the affidavit, but not the claim, is that of Captain Scheelt. These surmises may appear harsh, yet there is sufficient evidence on the face of these proceedings to justify every degree of suspicion. The sentence itself contains, on the face of it, the clearest evidence of combination and fraud. If credit is to be given to it, there exists no doubt but that Captain Scheelt was not heard at all, or, if he was heard in form, it was through the corrupt medium of the advocate of Captain Tingey. In order to understand this, it is necessary to copy a part of the sentence itself:

"Proclamation being made, the Court being called and seated, Mr. Mardenbrough, advocate and proctor for Captain Benjamin Hillier, his officers, &c., dispensing with the return of the monition, and agreeing on the part of the captors and recaptors to the cause now coming on, the libel or allegations was thereupon opened by Mr. Tuckett, King's counsel and advocate for the libellants, the following evidence was produced and read, viz. &c. And after hearing Mr. Tuckett fully and at large on the part of the libellants, the substance of the claim to the brig and cargo on the part of the captors, as their prize, was then opened by Mr. Mardenbrough; and the same, with the certificate of the agent and consul thereto annexed being read, and Mr. Mardenbrough fully and at large heard on the part of the captors, and Mr. Tuckett heard in reply, and it appearing to the Court, &c., the Court does decree," &c. Captain Scheelt being called in the remaining part of the sentence sometimes the claimant, and sometimes the libellant. Now, this Mr. Tuckett, the King's advocate, who is stated here to have replied to the arguments urged by Mr. Mardenbrough in behalf of the captors, was, in fact, Captain Tingey's advocate, and signed as such to his libel, claiming the vessel and cargo as his prize. Mr. Carney, who, in the former part of the proceedings, appears as Captain Scheelt's proctor, does not appear to have been heard at all. It is therefore evident that Captain Scheelt was made sport of, and that the whole matter was managed and carried on by the adversaries, and his name made use of to serve their purposes.

It would be an endless task to point out all the inconsistencies of these proceedings. Among those there is a very remarkable one, that the cause is opened in the name of the United States' frigate Adams, and that no mention is made of her throughout the remainder of the record. Another, that Captain Hillier and Captain Tingey appear to be preferring adverse claims against each other as recaptors, but that the sentence does not decide between them, though the argument is managed by their advocates answering and replying to each other; but the Court generally decrees salvage to the recaptors. It is to be remarked, also, that, by way of excuse for bringing on the trial and judgment on the very day that the vessel was carried in, Captain Hillier's advocate is stated to dispense, on the part of the captors, with the return of the monition, (while, in fact, if any one had a right to dispense with the return of that formality, it could be nobody else but the claimant, whose consent was not even asked;) and the clerk who exemplifies the papers certifies that the monition could not be found. It is more probable that it never existed. Such is the manner in which this valuable neutral vessel and cargo (acknowledged by the decree to be such) were disposed of, as they were of course sold to pay the salvage.

The cargo alone had cost the owners 98,914 banco marks, which, at 34½ cents per mark, make	$34,125 33
Value of the vessel and freight, with insurance on same,	10,374 67
Nett value of vessel and cargo when taken,	$44,500 00

Out of which, after deducting the salvage, costs, and loss, there remained no more for the claimant out of the proceeds of both vessel and cargo than £3,454 8*s.* 4*d.* West India currency, which, at 8*s.* 3*d.* per dollar, make $8,374 41, which may be considered as almost equal to a total loss to the owners, when $36,125 59 is taken away to pay the captors' salvage, charges on the sales of vessel and cargo, paid to the United States' agent, and law charges, and commissions again for claiming the vessel and cargo, and loss sustained in the sale of the vessel and cargo. It is also necessary for me state how this immense sum of $36,125 59 is disposed of. By the accounts from St. Kitt's, which is also herewith, it appears that one-half the amount of the forced sale of vessel and cargo was paid to the United States' agent, D. M. Clarkson, say,

£5,922 3*s.* 9½*d.* which, at 8*s.* 3*d.* per dollar, make		$14,356 82
This Mr. Clarkson charges as follows:
Bell, punch, and negroes, attending the sale, and 2½ per cent. commissions,	£310 12 2
Sundry charges specified, and commission and storage, at 7½ per cent.,	1,083 12 3
And Mr. D. L. Abarband charges sundry disbursements and law charges, per accounts,	682 19 1
And again, commission for endorsing bills and claiming the vessel and cargo,	390 12 2
	£2,467 15 8 is	$5,982 50
Total paid, salvage and charges,		$20,339 32

Which is a total loss to the owners, without calculating either profit or interest, to which is to be added the loss on the sales of the vessel and cargo of $15,786 27, making together a bona fide loss of $36,125 59, as before stated. If to this sum, or to the first cost, $44,500, a profit should be added—or say that only 3½ years' interest should be added, $7,586 37 more ought to be paid to the owners of this large property; so that the claim which they, in my honest opinion, are entitled to, is, in all, the first foregoing sum of $36,125 59

And 3½ years' interest, 7,586 37

Besides the above, there was on board the Hendrick a small adventure of a Mr. Koch, which was sold by Mr. D. M. Clarkson for the gross sum of £349 16*s.*, out of which he deducts for salvage £170 10*s.* 6½*d.* and costs and charges £32 16*s.* 9½*d.* making, together, £203 7*s.* 4*d;* this sum ought also to be included, and makes, in dollars, at 8*s.* 3*d.*	493 01
Thus forming an aggregate sum of - - - - - - -	$44,204 97

It is not, however, sir, on the irregularity of these proceedings in point of form, nor on the immense loss to my constituents, which has been the consequence, that I place the real merits of this case, but on the intrinsic injustice of the decree itself, apparent on the face of it. The enormous salvage of one-half of the gross amount of the property is stated to have been given in conformity to the regulations of the American navy, which are certified together by the American consul or agent, who acted also in the capacity of agent for the recaptors. [See the decree, and also the petition of Captain Hillier, of the brig Pickering, and the account and settlements between the parties.]

These regulations (as the consul's certificate is not transcribed at length) I presume to be the act of Congress, passed on the 2d of March, 1799, entitled "An act for the government of the navy of the United States;" in the seventh section of which (4th vol. Laws of the United States, page 472.) there is a clause respecting salvage, which really allows a salvage of one-half on recaptured property which shall have been upwards of ninety-six hours in possession of the enemy. I thus presume, because I am ignorant of any other act of Congress which answers the description of regulations for the navy, nor indeed of any other legislative provision existing at that time on the subject of salvage. But this section of the said act of Congress never was intended by the Legislature of the United States to be applied to cases of recapture of neutral property, but was only applicable to recaptures of the property of the subjects of co-belligerent states. It was thus very properly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Hamburg ship Amelia, Hans Frederick Seaman, master, which was a recapture from the French, which rendered her loss certain had she been carried into a port of France, as she was laden with British goods, which were prohibited by the regulations of that country. Yet, in that case, the Supreme Court allowed only to the recaptors a salvage of one-sixth of the nett value of the property recaptured. The Court (if the printed report of the case is to be relied on) declared, in substance, that it was not under the act of March, 1799, nor under any other act of Congress, that they granted salvage in that case, but by an application of the principles of the laws of war and of nations. A similar decision was lately given by the circuit court of the United States for the Pennsylvania district, in the case of the Charming Betsey; in which case, it was said by the court (if I understand right, as I was present at the time,) that none of the acts of Congress respecting salvage could be construed as applicable to recaptures of neutrals; but that the granting of salvage on neutral property was authorized by the law of nations in certain cases, that is, when there existed an imminent danger of condemnation in the country of the captor.

I shall not presume, sir, to controvert here doctrines which have been laid down by such high and respectable authorities as the courts of the United States. It is my duty respectfully to submit to them, as I conceive it to be my privilege to solicit their benefits whenever they tend to my favor.

With this view, therefore, I think that I can with propriety draw the following inferences from the facts above stated:

1st. That the decree of the Vice Admiralty Court of St. Kitt's is erroneous, inasmuch as it is founded on a misapplication of a law of the United States, declared to be inapplicable by a solemn decision of the Supreme Judiciary of this country.

2d. That it is intrinsically unjust, as the courts of the United States, in the most favorable cases of recaptures of neutrals, (I mean in cases the most favorable to the recaptors,) never have granted more than one-sixth of the nett proceeds; whereas, in this case, one moiety of the gross proceeds has been decreed.

3d. That this case is extremely unfavorable to the recaptors, as the recaptured vessel sailed under the Danish flag, that was highly respected by the French authorities; and, as to herself, she was, as well as her cargo, bona fide Danish and Hamburg property, had no prohibited articles on board, and her papers were in the most regular order.

4th. That, consequently, she was in no danger of being condemned in a French port; and, therefore, the courts of the United States, had the case been brought before them, would not, according to their own principles, have granted any salvage to the recaptors.

5th. That, independent of the intrinsic injustice of this decree, the proceedings were carried on in an irregular, vexatious, and oppressive manner; that the prosecutors in this unjust procedure were officers of high military rank under the United States; and the person who led the court into error, by a certificate given on mistaken grounds, was the consul of the American Government himself, acting, at the same time, as agent for the adverse party.

6th. That the neutral owners have been, therefore, considerably injured, and are entitled to receive satisfaction somewhere.

I am well aware, sir, that it has been the custom of the Government of the United States not to render satisfaction for the misconduct of its officers, before regular proceedings, in a court of justice, have been gone through: but, in a case so flagrant as the present, I flatter myself it is too liberal and too just not to remunerate, in some degree, the innocent sufferers, and who have suffered by palpable error and mistake; which error and mistake was occasioned by one of its officers—an officer to whom foreign Courts of Admiralty generally gave full faith and credit, as to his statements of the laws of his country. I therefore am induced to hope, that, if you will take the trouble to lay this case officially before the Government of the United States, it will not hesitate to pronounce it a case in which it ought to interfere, and that, eventually, such justice will be rendered by the Government to my constituents, as the extreme hardships which they have experienced, and the losses they have sustained, evidently seem to require.

At foot, is a specification or list of the documents referred to in the preceding part of this letter.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SODERSTROM.

PETER BLIKER OLSEN, Esq.,
Minister resident from the court of Denmark near the United States.

FEBRUARY 20, 1804.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States transmitting sundry documents from the Danish chargé des affaires, claiming, in the name of his Government, restitution in the case of the brigantine Hendrick, together with the report and documents heretofore presented, made the following report:

That the documents accompanying the President's message contain evidence in support of the claim, corroborative of that submitted to the examination of the committee, at the last session of Congress; particularly in relation to the neutral character of the vessel, to the question, whether the judicial proceedings were instituted and conducted with the consent of the captain of the Hendrick, and the value of the vessel and cargo. Upon a careful examination of these documents, and a review of those heretofore filed in this case, your committee are confirmed in their opinion (given to the House at the last session) that the honor and justice of the United States require that the Executive should be enabled to indemnify the owners of the brig Hendrick and cargo, against the losses occasioned by the conduct of our officers; they, therefore, offer to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of —— dollars ought to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to make such restitution as shall appear to be just and equitable to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Hendrick, and her cargo, which were captured by an American armed vessel in the war, 1799, and sold, by order of the Admiralty Court, in the British island of St. Christopher.

8th CONGRESS.] No. 190. [2d SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 9, 1805, AND FEBRUARY 18, 1813.*

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: DECEMBER 6, 1805.

The depredations which had been committed on the commerce of the United States during a preceding war, by persons under the authority of Spain, are sufficiently known to all: these made it a duty to require from that Government indemnifications for our injured citizens. A convention was accordingly entered into between the minister of the United States at Madrid, and the minister of that Government for Foreign Affairs, by which it was agreed that spoliations committed by Spanish subjects, and carried into ports of Spain, should be paid for by that nation; and that those committed by French subjects and carried into Spanish ports should remain for further discussion. Before this convention was returned to Spain with our ratification, the transfer of Louisiana by France to the United States took place; an event as unexpected as disagreeable to Spain. From that moment she seemed to change her conduct and dispositions towards us. It was first manifested by her protest against the right of France to alienate Louisiana to us, which, however, was soon retracted, and the right confirmed. Then high offence was manifested at the act of Congress establishing a collection district on the Mobile, although, by an authentic declaration, immediately made, it was expressly confined to our acknowledged limits, and she now refused to ratify the convention signed by her own minister under the eye of his sovereign, unless we would consent to alterations of its terms, which would have affected our claims against her for the spoliations by French subjects carried into Spanish ports.

To obtain justice, as well as to restore friendship, I thought a special mission advisable; and accordingly appointed James Monroe minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, to repair to Madrid, and, in conjunction with our minister resident there, to endeavor to procure a ratification of the former convention, and to come to an understanding with Spain as to the boundaries of Louisiana. It appeared at once that her policy was to reserve herself for events, and, in the mean time, to keep our differences in an undetermined state: this will be evident from the papers now communicated to you. After nearly five months of fruitless endeavor to bring them to some definite and satisfactory result, our ministers ended the conferences without having been able to obtain indemnity for the spoliations of any description, or any satisfaction as to the boundaries of Louisiana, other than a declaration that we had no rights eastward of the Iberville, and that our line to the west was one which would have left us but a string of land on that bank of the river Mississippi. Our injured citizens were thus left without any prospect of retribution from the wrong-doer; and, as to boundary, each party was to take its own course. That which they have chosen to pursue will appear from the documents now communicated. They authorize the inference, that it is their intention to advance on our possessions, until they shall be repressed by an opposing force. Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided. I have barely instructed the officers stationed in the neighborhood of the aggressions, to protect our citizens from violence, to patrol within the borders actually delivered to us, and not to go out of them but when necessary to repel an inroad, or to rescue a citizen, or his property; and the Spanish officers remaining at New Orleans are required to depart without further delay. It ought to be noted here, that, since the late change in the state of affairs in Europe, Spain has ordered her cruisers and courts to respect our treaty with her.

The conduct of France, and the part she may take in the misunderstandings between the United States and Spain, are too important to be unconsidered. She was prompt and decided in her declarations that our demands on Spain for French spoliations carried into Spanish ports, were included in the settlement between the United States and France. She took at once the ground, that she had acquired no right from Spain, and had meant to deliver us none eastward of the Iberville; her silence as to the western boundary leaving us to infer her opinion might be against Spain in that quarter. Whatever direction she might mean to give to these differences, it does not appear that she has contemplated their proceeding to actual rupture, or that, at the date of our last advices from Paris, her Government had any suspicion of the hostile attitude Spain had taken here. On the contrary, we have reason to believe that she was disposed to effect a settlement, on a plan analogous to what our ministers had proposed, and so comprehensive, as to remove, as far as possible, the grounds of future collision and controversy on the eastern as well as western side of the Mississippi.

The present crisis in Europe is favorable for pressing such a settlement, and not a moment should be lost in availing ourselves of it. Should it pass unimproved, our situation would become much more difficult; formal war is not necessary, it is not probable it will follow, but the protection of our citizens, the spirit and honor of our country, require that force should be interposed to a certain degree. It will probably contribute to advance the object of peace.

But the course to be pursued will require the command of means which it belongs to Congress exclusively to yield or to deny. To them I communicate every fact material for their information, and the documents necessary to enable them to judge for themselves. To their wisdom, then, I look for the course I am to pursue, and will pursue with sincere zeal that which they shall approve.

TH: JEFFERSON.

No. 2.

SIR: DECEMBER 6, 1805.

In order to give to Congress the details necessary for their full information of the state of things between Spain and the United States, I send them the communication and documents now enclosed. Although stated to be confidential, that term is not meant to be extended to all the documents, the greater part of which are proper for the public eye: it is applied only to the message itself, and to the letters from our own and foreign ministers, which, if disclosed, might throw additional difficulties int he way of accommodation. These alone, therefore, are delivered to the Legislature in confidence that they will be kept secret.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate.

No. 3.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate of the United States: FEBRUARY 18, 1813.

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 18th January, 1813.

JAMES MADISON.

* Although these messages are of different dates, the papers transmitted exhibit the posture of affairs with Spain at the date of the first message, and, in many cases, were only duplicate copies of the same paper.

No. 4.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 17, 1813.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the confidential resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, has the honor, in compliance therewith, to submit to the President the following papers:

1st. Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq., minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, under date of the 6th February, and 10th April, 1804; and to Robert R. Livingston, of 31st January, 1804.

2d. The correspondence between Charles Pinckney, Esq. and the Spanish Government relative to the ratification of the convention of 1802.

3d. Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, on the same subject.

4th. Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, under date of the 15th April, 8th July, 26th October, 1804; 4th May, and 23d May, 1805.

5th. A letter from Mr. Monroe to M. Talleyrand of 8th November, 1804; and a letter from M. Talleyrand to General Armstrong of 21st December, 1804, in reply thereto.

6th. The correspondence between Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney and the Spanish Government.

These papers communicate all that passed between the dates specified in the resolution, on the subject matter thereof; no negotiation was ever entered into with Spain, under the instructions to Messrs. Armstrong and Bowdoin, nor was there ever any negotiation with France, either for the cession of East Florida, or for indemnities for French seizures, and condemnations in the ports of Spain, during the late war with France.

All which is respectfully submitted:

JAMES MONROE.

I. Instructions from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinckney and to Mr. Livingston.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinckney, minister to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1803.

SIR:

You will have learned, doubtless, from Paris, that a treaty has been signed there, by which New Orleans and the rest of Louisiana is conveyed to the United States. The Floridas are not included in the treaty, being, it appears, still held by Spain. The enclosed copy of a communication, from the Spanish minister here, contains a refusal of His Catholic Majesty to alienate any part of his colonial possessions. A copy of the answer to it is also enclosed.

At the date of this refusal, it was probably unknown that the cession by France to the United States had been, or would be made. This consideration, with the kind of reasons given for the refusal, and the situation of Spain, resulting from the war between Great Britain and France, lead to a calculation that, at present, there may be less repugnance to our views. The letter, herewith addressed to Mr. Monroe, gives the instructions under which the negotiations are to be pursued. Being for your use, as well as his, it is unsealed, and in your cipher; a copy in his having been forwarded to Paris.

In case Mr. Monroe should not have arrived, but be expected at Madrid, you will forbear to enter into negotiations on this subject, unless they should be brought on by the Spanish Government, and the moment should be critical for securing our object on favorable terms. The maximum of price, contemplated by the President, will be found in the instructions. At this price the bargain cannot be a bad one. But, considering the motives which Spain ought now to feel for making the arrangements easy and satisfactory; the certainty that the Floridas must, at no distant period, find a way into our hands; and the tax on our finances, resulting from the purchase of Louisiana, which makes a further purchase immediately less convenient; it may be hoped, as it is to be wished, that the bargain will be considerably cheapened. Under such circumstances, it would not be proper to accede to terms which, under others, might have been admissible.

In case Mr. Monroe should be obliged to decline or postpone his visit to Spain, I have requested him to give you his ideas on the expediency of your proceeding or not in the negotiation. The advantage given him by his opportunity of scanning the policy of Great Britain and France, in relation to Spain, and of estimating the course of the war, will render his opinion on that point worthy of your confidence.

You will observe, in the answer to the Marquis de Yrujo's communication, a merited animadversion on the motives assigned for the restoration of the deposite. The United States can never admit that this was of favor, not of right; nor receive as a favor what they demand as a right.

As the indemnifications claimed from Spain are to be incorporated in the overtures for the Floridas, it will be advisable to leave them, although within your ordinary functions, for the joint negotiations of yourself and Mr. Monroe. In these, as proceeding from an extraordinary mission, the subject can be pressed with greater force and more probable effect. Should Mr. Monroe, however, not be likely soon to join you, and there be a prospect of extending the convention, not accepted here, to the claims admitted in it, you will continue to urge them on the justice of the Spanish Government; and in terms, and a tone, that will make it sensible of the impolicy of disappointing the reasonable expectations of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

JAMES MADISON.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to Robert R. Livingston, then their minister plenipotentiary in France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 31, 1804.

The convention with Spain, which was not agreed to at the last session of Congress, has been resumed and ratified during the present. The objection to it was, that it did not provide, in sufficient extent, for repairing the injuries done to our commerce, particularly in omitting the case of captures and condemnations by French cruisers and consuls, within Spanish responsibility. As the convention does not abandon the omitted cases, but merely leaves them for further negotiation, it was judged best, on the whole, not longer to deprive that class of our citizens, who are comprehended in the convention, of the benefit of its provisions. The claims of the others will be pursued with due attention; and may, perhaps, be advantageously brought into the negotiation with which Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney will be jointly charged. Such of them as Spain refused to submit to arbitration, as proceeding from French citizens, and not from Spanish subjects, are clearly supported by strict justice, and by the soundest principles of public law. French citizens, within the jurisdiction of Spain, were, for the time, subjects of Spain. Spain had a right to their allegiance, and was responsible for their conduct. As well might she say that a murder or robbery, committed by a Frenchman on an American, in the streets of Madrid, was to be punished or redressed by France alone, not by her, as pretend that the illegal proceedings of Frenchmen, within Spanish jurisdiction, in the case of spoliations on our commerce, are to depend on France, not on her, for indemnification. Supposing France to be liable eventually, Spain is liable in the first resort, and can be relieved from it only by showing that she exerted all the reasonable means in her power for preventing and correcting the wrong, without being able to succeed in either. At first she seemed sensible of this. Her plea was, in substance, that circumstances did not permit her to control the conduct of French agents and citizens within her jurisdiction. This plea being not very honorable to her sovereignty, or sufficiently established by proof; and being not very consistent with the satisfaction which she may find it expedient to yield to other nations, particularly to Great Britain, whose commerce is, at this time, suffering like injuries from French cruisers and consuls; it has given place to the plea that the erasure of the second article of our convention with France, in 1800, releases Spain as well as France; because France being liable, in justice to Spain, for the indemnities paid by the latter to the United States, would indirectly be deprived of the benefit of that release to her. To this the reply is given by the remarks already made. The injury proceeded from Spain. To Spain we look for reparation. Her claim for reimbursement on France is a question between her and France. It may be just, or not just, according to circumstances unknown to the United States. Spain may have found, for any thing we know, an equivalent for this use of her ports, and her permission in advantages yielded by, or expected from France. To this the fact may be added, that indemnification has throughout been claimed from Spain and not from France; or, if from France, the application has been neither patronized, nor authorized by the Government of the United States. Applications of this sort may have been made by individual sufferers: but, it is believed, that they have, in no instance, received the countenance of the American legation at Paris. In is maintained, however, on the part of Spain, that a resort in form has been had to the French Government, in such cases. Will you make the inquiry and communicate the result? It will not be amiss to know the truth, as it may the more effectually silence the sophistry of Spain. But, should the result justify the assertion on her side, it will not vary the merits of the question. The resort of individuals to the French Government could not be pretended to have that effect. If made under the voluntary auspices of an American minister it might have been unknown to, or disapproved by the Government here. Nay, if made by order of the Government itself, it would not preclude a just resort to Spain, unless accompanied by a positive or clearly implied discharge of the latter from her responsibility.

"It has been thought proper to give you this view of the subject that it may guide the communications thereon, which it may be expedient for you, at any time, to hold with the French Government."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq. then minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 6, 1804.

The Senate having resumed at the present session the convention with Spain, postponed at the last, have thought proper to ratify it, and the President has completed the act on the part of the United States. The instrument is now returned to you with these sanctions, in order to be exchanged for the ratification of His Catholic Majesty. You will hasten this formality as much as possible, and forward the result to the Government here, that no time may be lost in procuring to our citizens the benefit stipulated to them. To favor despatch, as well as to guard against casualties, duplicates and even triplicates will be proper.

In concurring in this partial provision for the indemnities due from Spain, it is to be particularly understood that it proceeds from no other considerations than a wish to shorten the delay of relief to that portion of the claimants who are included in the provision, and a determination to avail the residue of the reserve, expressly made in behalf of their claims by the act of the convention. When the decision of the Senate was postponed at the last session, it was justly hoped that, before the succeeding one, the Spanish Government would have yielded to the reasonableness and justice of giving to the provision the extent required by the United States; in which case, the arrangements would have been simplified, and a foundation laid at once for closing all controversies on the subject. The final refusal of Spain to concur in these views has been thought to give a preference to the course now adopted.

None of the pleas urged by the Spanish Government can in the least invalidate the justice of the claims for injuries committed by French citizens or agents within her jurisdiction.

If His Catholic Majesty be sovereign in his own dominions, aliens within them are answerable to him for their conduct, and he, of course, is answerable for it to others. This is a principle founded too evidently in reason and usage to be controverted. As well might Spain say that a theft or robbery, committed in the streets of Madrid by a Frenchman on an American, is to be redressed by France, and not by her, as pretend that redress is to be so sought for spoliations committed by cruisers from, or condemnations within, Spanish ports. Nor is there any room for the distinction between the injuries proceeding from the French cruisers and the French consuls. With respect to the consuls, their acts were either authorized or not authorized by Spain: if authorized by Spain, Spain is answerable for giving them the authority; if not authorized by Spain, they could not be authorized at all; the law of nations giving them no such authority, and France having no right to give it; and being acts without authority, they are not to be regarded as consular acts, but as much the acts of private individuals as the cruises or any other irregularities committed or instituted by French citizens within the jurisdiction of Spain. To say that the consuls derived their authority from the sanction given by Spain to the authority derived from France, (without which sanction, positive or permissive, it is clear that the authority of France, within the jurisdiction of Spain, would be a nullity,) is still to rest the condemnation by the consuls on the authority of Spain, and to leave her responsible for them.

Under every aspect, therefore, Spain is bound to do justice in this case to the citizens of the United States, unless she not only pleads a duress, suspending her free agency, and prostrating her national honor, but proves the reality of this duress; and not only proves this duress, but proves, moreover, first, that she did every thing in her power to prevent the evil; next, that she did every thing in her power to obtain reparation for it; and, lastly, that, in tolerating the evil, she did not deliberately and wilfully surrender the neutral rights under her protection to advantages, positive or negative, obtained or expected by herself from France.

The suggestion that France was resorted to for redress is unfounded. It does not appear that any such resort was authorized by the Government of the United States, whilst the claims against Spain have been uniform and pressing; nor is it believed that any interpositions have proceeded from the American legation at Paris. Had, indeed, such interpositions taken place, they would in no respect lessen the obligations of Spain. Individuals may have made their applications to the French Government, but it will not be pretended that the merits of the question can be affected by that circumstance.

The plea on which it seems that the Spanish Government now principally relies is, the erasure of the second article from our late convention with France, by which France was released from the indemnities due for spoliations committed under her immediate responsibility to the United States. This plea did not appear in the early objections of Spain to our claims. It was an after thought, resulting from the insufficiency of every other plea, and is certainly as little valid as any other. The injuries for which indemnities are claimed from Spain, though committed by Frenchmen, took place under Spanish authority. Spain, therefore, is answerable for them; to her we have looked, and continue to look, for redress. If the injuries done to us by her resulted in any manner from injuries done to her by France, she may if she pleases resort to France, as we resort to her. But whether her resort to France would be just or unjust, is a question between her and France, not between either her and us, or us and France. We claim against her, not against France. In releasing France, therefore, we have not released her. The claims, again, from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them. The claims we make on Spain were never admitted by France, nor made on France by the United States; they made, therefore, no part of the bargain with her, and could not be included in the release. The only supposition on which Spain could turn us over to France would be, that of her being in a state of absolute duress, of her being merely the staff by which the blow was given by France. But even on this supposition, the injuries done by France, through Spain, could not by any fair interpretation, be confounded with the injuries released to France, by which could be meant such injuries only as proceeded from her own immediate responsibility, and as were, in the ordinary course of things, chargeable on her.

The last plea under which refuge has been sought by Spain against the justice of our claims is, the opinion of four or five American lawyers, given on a case stated, without doubt, by some one of her own agents. An argument of this sort does not call for refutation, but for regret that the Spanish Government did not see how little such an appeal from the ordinary and dignified discussions of the two Governments, by their regular functionaries, to the authority of private opinions, and of private opinions so obtained, was consistent either with the respect it owed to itself, or with that which it owed to the Government of the United States; that it did not even reflect on the reply so obvious, that four or five private opinions, however respectable as such, could have no weight against the probability that other lawyers had been consulted, whose opinions were not quoted, because they were not the same; and that, if the Government here could descend to the experiment, little difficulty could be found in selecting more numerous authorities of the same kind, not only in the United States, but among the jurists of Spain.

Extract:—The Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 10, 1804.

SIR:

The footing on which your last communications with Mr. Cevallos left the subject of the South American claims of our citizens, requires little to be added to what has heretofore been said in relation to them. I shall observe only, that there is a difference between your statement and construction of the Spanish ordinances and those of Mr. Cevallos; on which I cannot undertake to decide, without a fuller view of the question than I have the means of taking. On the arrival of Mr. Monroe, he will join you in the discussion and the provision due to our citizens may, perhaps, be incorporated with the principal negotiations which will then be undertaken. In the mean time, you will be under no restraint, from taking advantage of any favorable change in the disposition of the Spanish Government, for obtaining justice from it. This is the more to be desired, as it will simplify the transaction, committed jointly to yourself and Mr. Monroe, and leave applicable to other contested cases any sum that may be stipulated by the United States in that transaction, and which will probably be inadequate to the aggregate of the cases.

According to information already received, many vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States, have suffered from irregularities in the West Indies, in which Spanish authorities have, in some way or other, participated, and for which, of course, redress will lie against the Spanish Government; and new cases are daily added. As soon as the requisite statements can be made of them, they will form a ground for claiming just reparation. In the mean time, you will represent, generally, to that Government, the illegal and unfriendly practice which exists, and the right which the United States have to expect from the justice of His Catholic Majesty, and his regard to the friendship and harmony of the two nations, immediate instructions to his officers in the West Indies which may put an end to the practice.

II. Correspondence between Mr. Pinckney and the Spanish Government relative to the ratification of the convention of 1802.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, January 11, 1804.

SIR:

I had the honor lately to inform your excellency of the ratification and exchange of ratifications of the treaty and convention, respecting the cession of Louisiana; I have now the honor to inform your excellency, that I have since received another despatch from the Secretary of State, informing me that Congress have passed an act authorizing and enabling the President to take possession of and occupy the said territory, as ceded by France to us; and have provided for the temporary government thereof, by means calculated to maintain and protect the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, properties, and religion. They have also passed another law, for furnishing the means to pay the sums which they have given to the French republic for the same.

In consequence of this, the President of the United States has issued a joint commission to General Wilkinson, the general commanding the forces of the United States, and Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi State, to receive from the Prefect of Louisiana, or person authorized, the territory in question, and to possess and occupy the same in the name of the United States.

I should have contented myself with barely making the official communication of these events, if the late communication of your excellency and your letter did not impress me with a belief that there was something in the observations of your excellency, and the apparent unwillingness of the Spanish Government, either to arrange our pre-existing differences and claims, or to cordially acquiesce in the cession of Louisiana, which required an answer, and such a one as should still go to prove the justice, the moderation, and the friendship of our Government for Spain.

As I do believe things are growing to a serious height between the two Governments, such as may, possibly, produce war; while we can, with honor, and with something like equal and honorable terms, and before any event occurs, or at least before we know, officially, of any, which may prevent all discussion, and drive things to extremities, I am to request the serious and early attention of your excellency to the following observations. There are three subjects of discussion between the Spanish and American Governments:

1st. The actual cession of Louisiana.
2d. The proposed cession of Florida.
3d. The claims of American citizens.

As to the first, it may be said, on the part of the United States, that they long ago foresaw the difficulties which would arise from any other nation but themselves possessing the mouth of the Mississippi, and endeavored, by every friendly means, to do them away. They made various propositions to Spain, which were rejected; and in the interim, the Spanish officer at New Orleans deprived the citizens of the United States of the deposite stipulated for in the treaty of 1795: this roused the feelings of the whole nation, and their Government, true to their professions of respect and friendship for Spain, and, at the same time, convinced of the necessity of applying some effectual remedy to the evil, sent to Europe an extraordinary mission to treat on the subject. At this time, the Spanish Government officially announced that they had ceded Louisiana to France, and that we must direct ourselves to that Government for any acquisition of territory which might be convenient to us. Our ministers at Paris made this acquisition: hence accrues to us a right founded on justice.

On the part of Spain it is said, that Louisiana was ceded to France, under a promise from that Power not to part with it. I presume that the French Government will be able to show that this promise could not be supposed to bind them under the circumstances in which they found themselves last spring; but be this as it may, the promise was neither an equitable nor a legal obligation on the United States, because it had not been made known to them. Repeatedly and earnestly did I ask your excellency upon what terms Louisiana was ceded to France; for twelve months I could get no answer; at last I was told by your excellency, on the 31st March, that Louisiana was ceded to France, "avec la même étendue qu'elle a actuellement entre les mains de l'Espagne, et qu'elle avoit lorsque la France la possédoit, et telle qu'elle doit être après les traités passés subséquemment entre l'Espagne et d'autres Etats;" and as no mention was made of any restriction, when it was known that we wished to purchase, we had a right to suppose that there was none. But, even if there could be any doubt, it is cleared up by your excellency's letter to me on the 4th of May; for your excellency there tells me, in express terms, that my Government "podrá dirigirse al Gobierno Francés para negociar la adquisicion de territorios (en Luisiana) que convengan á su interes."

From these letters, which were remitted to our ministers extraordinary at Paris, and to our Government, it is clear, the United States were in possession of official intelligence that the country was ceded; nor did the least hint drop from Spain of any secret article. She had sold, or exchanged, and conveyed the territory to France; it was a fact known to all Europe, and officially announced to us; it was equally known that we wished that country, and the reasons of our doing so are such as the world must approve. We have fairly bought and furnished the means of paying for it; and if, after all this, Spain should refuse her acquiescence, and, to possess it, war should be the consequence, I leave it to the enlightened mind of your excellency to judge who are in the right, and what must be the opinion of every impartial nation as to the procedure. But why should Spain refuse her acquiescence? She has shown already that she did not consider the keeping of Louisiana as indispensable or necessary to her; it was originally a French colony, and never came into the possession of Spain until 1763; it, therefore, cannot claim that sort of affection which old countries sometimes entertain for colonies originally established by themselves, and considered as parts of their family. Nor can Spain give that as a reason, as she has always seemed to consider Louisiana and Florida as temporary possessions, little valuable to her; nor has she ever hesitated to part with them, when she found it her interest to do so; and, if she has had no objection to part with them to other Powers, why should she not wish to see them in our hands? Is she more jealous of us than of others? Have we more power, more ambition, or are we more capable of doing her injury, than Great Britain or France? If she thinks so, she mistakes most egregiously the character of our people, the nature of our Government, or the true interests of a country devoted only to peaceful and honorable pursuits. Does she suppose we have less affection for Spain than the Governments I have mentioned, which have each, in their turn, possessed Florida and Louisiana? This question is at once answered, by saying, that, while we benefit, we cannot rival or interfere with each other; that our commerce is extensive, and mutually advantageous; and that these are the situations which are generally the parents of a sincere and lasting affection between nations: there is but one possible mode of our differing or interfering, and that is, by the collision of unsettled boundaries. Let us now forever remove the possibility of this collision. We offer to come forward honorably and openly on this subject; I am hopeful Spain will do the same, and that I shall soon receive such propositions from your excellency as I shall be authorised to accept.

As to the second subject of discussion, it has been urged, on the part of the United States, that Florida was desirable to them from its local situation; that, by getting it, they should avoid the necessity of submitting to similar evils to those they had suffered in Louisiana; that this country was of little or no use to Spain; that it cost her much money to maintain it; that it greatly increased the probability of her being engaged in war, and lessened her means of supporting it; and that the Spanish capital and industry employed in the trade of that country might be much more advantageously employed in carrying on the commerce of the more fertile provinces of South America. These reasons, it was supposed, would have much weight; yet, the Government of the United States were willing to pay a fair price for it. They had turned their attention to the subject, and saw that misunderstandings must sooner or later arise, and they proposed, with honest intentions, the means they thought most likely to prevent it.

On the part of Spain it is said, that the system adopted by His Majesty, not to part with any portion of his dominions, prevents him from acceding to the wishes of the American Government; and that, moreover, he is bound, by treaties, not to dismember his American empire. It is not recollected that any other reason is assigned, and to these it may be answered—

1st. That it is unwise to adhere to any general system contrary to the dictates of sound policy; and

2d. That no opposition will or can, with propriety, be made by any foreign Power, to the cession of Florida to the United States; for that country has changed masters so often since the treaty of Utrecht, that it, at least, is exempted from the general restriction of that treaty; nor, until lately, has been much value annexed to it by Spain. Other arguments might be adduced; but, as it is known that neither the interest of France nor England will be injured by this cession, there are reasonable grounds to suppose that neither of them will object to it; and, if they do not, it is presumed that no other Power will. These reasons, then, lose their strength, and leave the naked question of expediency. This, in fact, is the only point for His Majesty's ministers to inquire into; and if they, in their wisdom, determine that it would be for the interest of Spain to part with this province, no foreign nation would have the unkindness to oppose it, nor should any general system be suffered to do it. The reasons before mentioned, and which were detailed on a former occasion, prove the actual value of this country to Spain is small; and if it is supposed that it acts as a protection or frontier to any other of her dominions, it is a mistake; it may be the means of bringing about a rupture, which might endanger the others, but it can never be the means of protecting them. It may, and but too probably will, happen, that the seeds of dissension sown in that country will spread to others, where dissension, but for this, would never have been known. If it is believed (and it is hoped it will be) that ambition does not direct the views of the American Government, then no suspicion can be entertained of the sincerity of their declarations, and its proper weight will, of course, be given to their opinions. But even if it was supposed for a moment, that they were guided by ambition, would it not be wise and prudent in Spain to deprive them of all pretext for the further gratification of this passion, by giving up to them, upon reasonable terms, (and upon no other is it asked,) a province which is of no use to her, and one which must fall into the hands of her neighbor if she chooses to attack it. This is an idea but little connected with the real question; for the conduct of the Government of the United States leaves no room to suppose that they are guided by ambition. The wish to purchase a barren and almost uninhabited country could not arise from such a passion; it has its source in the wisdom and prudence of those who view this purchase as the best and readiest means of settling present disputes, and of establishing, upon a solid basis, future peace and friendship between Spain and the United States.

On the 3d topic, viz. the claims of American citizens, little remains to be said, for the subject has been discussed in all its various forms; and the result is, a difference of opinion between the two Governments. One or the other must be wrong; and, as it is presumed that it is equally the interest and the wish of both that the difference should be amicably arranged, it becomes expedient to refer it to some impartial tribunal, as the only means of accomplishing this desirable end. To this the Government of the United States will agree, although they themselves have paid those who had similar claims upon them without a reference, and might, therefore, with some degree of propriety, insist upon receiving payment in the same way.

The importance of the foregoing subjects call for the serious attention of both Governments, and it is believed that, if they are properly investigated, no material difference of opinion can exist. Peace, harmony, and friendship, it is presumed, are equally the interest and the object of both, and justice and friendly acts are the only means by which to obtain and perpetuate them. Spain certainly ought not to feel a disposition to treat us unjustly or unkindly, and we ask nothing but what we are willing to pay for, or have a right to insist on.

Your excellency well knows how much and how anxiously I have always desired to accommodate every difference between the two countries; fearing that these are increasing, and that things are rushing to a point from which it will be difficult to recede, in the amicable and honorable manner in which an accommodation may yet take place, as the friend of the peace and harmony of the two countries, I seize the present moment still to offer to receive any amicable and reasonable propositions that may have a tendency to produce the arrangements and cession which we have so long and ardently wished.

Having reason to suppose your excellency has received, by a packet, the same late and important intelligence I have of the critical state of things between the two countries, you will at once perceive the reason of my renewing my application at this time, and of my so earnestly requesting an answer. Your excellency will, I am sure, be convinced that it flows from that ardent desire for the peace and friendship of the two countries, which has always governed the numerous endeavors I have made to preserve them, and which have been such as I trust will impress your excellency with the conviction of their having been open, sincere, and always with the best intentions.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State, &c. &c.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, June 1, 1804.

SIR:

Since I had the honor to see your excellency, I have received your letter (31st May) on the subject of an act of Congress, passed by that body, relative to the collection of duties in a district near the Mobile, which you say is a violation of the territory and sovereignty of His Majesty, and which you request me to transmit to my Government. It being their practice to send all the acts of the session at the end of it, there has not yet been time for me to receive these acts, nor have I any information or instructions relative to this particular business; all, therefore, I can do at present is to comply with your request, and transmit your letter by the first safe conveyance. Permit me, on this subject, to remind your excellency, that, on the first intelligence being received of the cession of Louisiana, I communicated verbally to your excellency and the Prince of Peace the contents of an official letter I had received from Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe, informing me that they considered great part of West Florida, as so called by the English, as included. Such letter could not have been written to me officially by them, without their having been so informed by the French plenipotentiary and Government. The price paid is a proof of the territory being considered as extremely extensive, and if, as must most probably be the case, these were the bounds detailed by the French, it becomes undoubtedly a question between the French and Spanish Governments and our own; and for this reason, I shall immediately send a copy of your letter to me to Mr. Livingston, our minister at Paris, for his information and that of the French Government. It not being the interest of either France, Spain, or the United States to differ about this or any other questions, I am sure that a little examination and moderation will soon accommodate it. Apprehending, however, that your excellency may, from the tenor of your letter to me, make this a reason for not ratifying the convention, or of adding such clauses to it as may defeat or delay its ratification, and depending very much upon your excellency's friendship for the United States, and strong sense of the great importance it is to both our countries to be on the most cordial and friendly terms, I again take the liberty of recommending to your excellency to have the convention ratified as it is, and without addition: this will be to the United States so strong a demonstration of the sincere friendship of His Majesty, that I am sure it will be attended with the best effects; whereas, should it now be refused or delayed, or clogged with additions, it will serve to increase the irritation and animosity of the two countries, and only widen a breach which may now easily be closed.

The great point for the consideration of our two nations is this: Is it the interest of both to be at peace and friendship with each other? or can a slip of territory nearly barren, or the refusal of the ratifications of the convention, be an equivalent for the expense and consequences of embroiling two nations which ought so strongly and affectionately to be united? Your excellency, I know, thinks with me on this subject, that it is better to conciliate than irritate. Let, therefore, the different questions between our Governments be kept separate. On the subject of the claims and convention for their arbitration, we have long since agreed to suffer that to be ratified as it is. This will be a strong proof to our Government that Spain wishes peace and friendship, and relies confidently on the well known good faith, honor, and moderation of the United States, for an amicable and just arrangement of limits. On this subject a new negotiation can take place; it will then be the negotiation of neighbors having extensive concerns with each other, and among whom questions must sometimes arise; but let them be the questions not only of neighbors, but of friends, and unattended by any circumstances to irritate. Do not show the United States that you have no confidence either in their honor or justice—qualities on which they value themselves more than on power or wealth; but show to them that Spain, having the most perfect confidence in both, will rigidly and honorably adhere to what she promised, and has no doubt the United States will do the same. This is the conduct I wish your excellency to pursue, and I think I know the United States sufficiently to be convinced they will meet it with sincerity and cordiality.

Your excellency sees by this letter the strong reliance I have on your excellency's being, upon all occasions, the promoter of the peace and friendship of the two countries; and on this confidence I have the honor to subscribe myself

Your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

His Excellency DON PEDRO CEVALLOS, First Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, June 22, 1804.

SIR:

Believing it not to be agreeable to your excellency, I probably should not have again troubled you either with personal or written applications on the subject of the exchange of ratifications of the convention, after having done all I could to persuade your excellency of the policy and propriety of so doing. I should have contented myself with having done my duty, and in requesting and urging upon you the necessity of an early and definitive answer to send to my Government; transmitting which, I should then have left it to them to decide, as the rights and interests of our citizens, and the sacred honor and character of our nation, may require. I have, however, just received accounts of such a nature, as render it necessary or proper I should make one appeal more to your excellency's love of justice, and to your wish to preserve the harmony of the two countries; and, should this fail, I will then give up the idea of our remaining long in friendship or peace, and consider it as almost an impossible thing. I think your excellency, in reading this letter, and recollecting circumstances, must view it in the same light, and will at least appreciate the motives which have given rise to it. Be assured that nothing but the pressing importance of the subject, and the difficulty of amicably receding from the point, to which the refusal or delay to ratify as it now is will bring us, would induce me to do so.

To show your excellency that this opinion is too well founded, we have nothing to do but to go back and examine the conduct of Spain for six years, and we shall find that, during that time, there has been such a series of treatment to the vessels, cargoes, and in many instances persons of our citizens, as no man could believe, who has not an opportunity to examine the archives of our mission to this court. The individual sufferings have been incredible, and the property lost of immense value. There is scarcely a part or a port of His Catholic Majesty's dominions in Europe and America, that has not been the scene and witness of their sufferings. Sufferings, such as I believe no people ever before endured from a nation to whose coasts they went under the solemn protection of treaties, the laws of nations, and, in many instances, express royal orders or permissions from the King. Nor was the unfriendly treatment of Spain confined only to the acts of her own subjects, while we were in difference with France; contrary to the treaty and every principle of the law of nations, she permitted the French cruisers to carry in hundreds of our vessels, and proceed to their condemnation and sale in Spanish ports. If your excellency will only throw your eye over the vast and melancholy pile of reclamations on these subjects now in your office, I have no doubt you will readily confess that there perhaps never existed such a collection of wrongs, sufferings, and damages, permitted by one nation towards another, with which she professed to be in peace and friendship. I will venture to say that it is such as no nation, having the same power to assert their rights and protect their citizens as we have, would have so long suffered without some kind of redress.

And yet, under all these accumulated injuries and sufferings of our citizens, under the breach of solemn treaties, of the laws of nations, and, in many instances, violations of the honor of our flag, what has been the conduct of the United States? Always mild and moderate, in every step of these oppressions and injuries, we have applied for redress in the most respectful terms; we have relied on the justice and magnanimity of His Majesty and his Government for nearly eight years, until our citizens who were concerned were nearly all ruined, such as have been for years personally attending to their claims, exhausted in their resources and fatigued with the useless attendance and absence from their families, have nearly all returned to their homes, abandoning to their Government their rights and claims, and are now incessantly applying to her to see them redressed. Such, too, has been the serious and formal appeal of the great commercial cities on this occasion, so solemnly have they pressed it, that it has now become my duty to apply in the most urgent manner for a definitive answer, whether His Majesty will ratify the convention as it was made or not? considering any alteration at this time as amounting to a refusal. On His Majesty's love of justice alone I rely for such an answer as will be agreeable to our Government. I entreat your excellency to reperuse some of the letters I have written to you on this subject. In these, I intimated to your excellency the astonishment of the people of the United States at the apparent determination of Spain to consider them as enemies. Although many of their acts from 1796 to 1802 were oppressive and unfriendly, our citizens were hopeful they were occasioned by the war, and that at a proper time they would be redressed; they still, therefore, continued to view the friendship of the two nations as a certain thing, because they were neighbors; their commerce was extensive and mutually valuable; and it was impossible for them to be rivals. These generally being the solid foundations of friendship between Governments, our citizens had a well founded right to expect a firm and increasing one with the subjects of Spain. It was, therefore, with great surprise they viewed their losses and sufferings, the neglect of their claims, and their general treatment for the last six or eight years. Your excellency will be astonished when I inform you that, on an accurate survey by persons who have examined them, not one case of seizures or damages in thirty has been redressed by Spain. I am sure that, out of the applications made on other subjects, the proportion of refusals has been as great. It has now become almost a regular thing for us to ask and to receive refusals to every application. These, added to the impression made on our citizens by the conduct of Spain as it respected Louisiana, have led to the opinion that Spain really has no wish to remain long on friendly terms with us; or else why did she so quietly consent to restore Louisiana to France, and appear so content that the French should have it, and the moment she found it was to come to the United States, show such displeasure, and do every thing in her power to prevent it? There can be but one answer, which is, that Spain considered Louisiana, while in the hands of France, as in the hands of her friends, and as about to be delivered to those whom she did not view as such. I can assure your excellency that the whole of our situation and concerns, taken together, have led to a point sufficiently important for your excellency's interference, because with difficulty I shall think your excellency is not a friend to the United States, or that you wish to see any serious difference with us. At the same time, I do believe that on the present moment it depends to prevent those differences; for I am sure, if this convention is returned without being ratified as it is made, and ratified by our Government, that it will, perhaps, afterwards be too late for us to benefit by your excellency's friendship and interference. I wish to speak with candor and friendship to your excellency, because I well know the temper and disposition of our country and its Government, and the manner in which they have received the losses and injuries they have sustained from Spain for the last six or eight years. I am certain they will consider the refusal to ratifiy, or to give an answer, or the throwing of obstructions in the way so as to postpone it, as such evidence of hostility on the part of Spain as to put an end to all further amicable discussion.

The questions of our claims on Spain, and the convention to arbitrate them, are of an old date: they existed long before any question respecting Louisiana arose. In point of priority, they ought to be the first attended to and settled. It is for that purpose, therefore, I have so earnestly solicited your excellency to use your powerful and well merited influence to have the convention ratified as it is, as that will open the way to the peaceable and friendly arrangement of the other question respecting the limits of Louisiana—a question totally separate and distinct, and which, having originated from our purchase from France, becomes a question which France must arrange between Spain and us: she is bound in honor and justice, no less than in interest, to do so. For this purpose, I have officially applied to the French ambassador here, and, have sent a copy of your letter to Paris, to be laid before the French Government. But I again entreat your excellency not to let this be given as a reason for refusing to ratify the convention. It is because I believe that this will be the sole mode of amicably arranging all our other differences, that I so earnestly press it upon your excellency, and because I also believe that, in the present state of things, the refusal or delay to answer will be the means of putting a close to all further amicable discussion.

With sentiments of the most profound respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

MADRID, July 2, 1804.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 22d ultimo, in which you have thought proper again to urge the immediate ratification of the convention concluded on the 11th August, 1802, for indemnification of the losses, damages, and injuries sustained during the last war, in consequence of the excesses committed by individuals of both nations against the law of nations or the existing treaty. In answer, I can do no less than begin by stating to you that it appears extraordinary enough that you should consider any delay in the ratification of said convention, on the part of the Spanish Government, as a wrong done to your Government, when that of the United States had taken up almost two years in the examination before the ratification on her part; during which time, if any injuries have resulted to the interested, either Spaniards or Americans, they are certainly not to be attributed to the Government of Spain. On her part, there always has existed the greatest desire to terminate, in a friendly manner, the question of indemnities, which are the object of the said convention; and His Majesty is disposed to ratify it, but under certain limitations or conditions, which will in nowise alter the material part of the convention, and which cannot be displeasing to the United States, since they emanate from the sacred principles of the justice, peace, and friendship of the Governments on which it is founded.

The first of the said conditions is, that a time should be designated within which notice may be given to the subjects of His Majesty, who have reclamations to make to the commissioners who are to be appointed, and to enable them to prepare the documents necessary for establishing their claims. The reason of this condition is very obvious, and its necessity proceeds from the slowness of the American Government in ratifying the convention, for it is evident that the reclamations of the Spaniards and Americans respectively cannot be made, unless each Government should notify the persons respectively interested to bring forward their demands; and the Spanish Government has not been able, nor ought it to have circulated such notices, being in doubt whether the American Government would or would not ratify the convention—a doubt which, in the session before the last of Congress, had increased to such a degree, as almost to make it evident that it would not be ratified; the general report being that the Senate of the United States had rejected it, which prevented the anticipation of any notice for the Government of the Spaniards interested.

The second limitation or condition, founded on the most rigorous justice, is, that the sixth article of the said convention, which relates to the injuries done by French cruisers to American vessels, on the coast and in the harbors of Spain, should be suppressed. This article was inserted, because it was made a question whether Spain was or was not responsible for the said injuries and damages. You sustained the affirmative, and I the negative, with arguments which I have not seen combated, except by actions which do not invalidate them. Subsequently, in my letters under date of the 23d August and 5th October last, to which I refer, I proved to you, in the most solid manner, supported by the opinions of the most eminent jurists in the United States, that, according to the convention concluded between France and the United States the 8th Vendemiaire, year 9, it could no longer be doubted that the United States had not the smallest right to exact indemnities from the Government of Spain for the injuries done by French privateers on her coasts and in her harbors. To these incontrovertible reasons may be added that which results from the ninth article of the treaty of 30th April, 1803, between the United States and France, relative to the cession of Louisiana; from which article, it evidently results that the French have satisfied the Americans for the injuries in question. There is no reason, then, why there should be retained in the convention which is to be ratified an article by which the United States reserve a right which they certainly have not, inasmuch as they have already received competent satisfaction from France. Under these circumstances, the suppression of the beforementioned article takes nothing from the essence of the convention; nor, in reality, can it be called a suppression which removes an article that has become notoriously and absolutely null from its own nature.

The third condition, entirely conformable to the pacific desires of the United States, is that which requires the revocation of the part of the act of the Congress of the said States, approved on the 24th February last, which has manifestly violated the rights of the sovereignty of His Majesty, by empowering the President to exercise authority and establishing custom-houses within a territory which belongs to the crown of Spain. His Majesty being, as he is, persuaded, that through a mistake only could there have been introduced into the said act the expressions which assail the rights of his sovereignty, does not doubt that the United States will give, in relation to the said act, those explanations which may be most conformable to the justice he claims, and the most conciliating and respectful to the rights of his crown.

Under these three conditions, His Majesty is disposed to ratify the convention of the 11th August, 1802; conditions which, as I said before, do not alter either the nature or the essence of it; for the first of them is nothing more than that a certain time should be allowed for His Majesty's subjects to receive notice that the convention was agreed on, and that they might prepare to support their claims; the second relates only to the suppression of an article which is null in itself; and the third emanates from the necessity of preserving that respect which sovereigns reciprocally owe to each other.

Besides what relates to the ratification of the convention of the 11th August, you go on in your beforementioned note to accumulate complaints which, although they have no connexion with the present affair, I have not been able to pass unnoticed. You say that Spain having opposed herself to the alienation of Louisiana, proves little attachment or friendship on our part towards the United States; but if you had made the proper use of your logic and policy, (politica,) you would have drawn from this action, the certainty of which I do not dispute, very different conclusions. It is not uncommon that the Governments, the most united by system and by interest, suffer discordances arising from the vicinity of their territories; nor is it uncommon that those which know the importance of peace, and the facilities there unfortunately are by which it may disturbed, should avoid an approximation of their territories. The views of Spain have been sound and political, and decently manifested; and if you had drawn your deductions from this view of the subject, you would have honored not less the talents than the just and friendly intentions of the King my master.

As to the rest, it does not appear to be in conformity to a conciliating spirit, which is that which you say animates you, to recapitulate old complaints for wrongs which Spain did not commit, and complaints for wrongs which are completely done away; France having given satisfaction for the damages occasioned by them.

I renew to you the testimonies of my constant esteem and consideration, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

MADRID, July 5, 1804.

SIR:

I shall proceed without delay to give your excellency that decisive answer to yours of the 2d, and to take those definitive measures which my instructions and duty now make necessary; but before I do so, and in order to be correct, I wish your excellency to say whether I am to understand your letter in this sense: that if the second condition, which respects the suppression of the claims for French spoliations, within the Spanish territory, and the third, the repeal of the law passed by Congress in February, are not agreed to, His Majesty will not ratify the convention. I request your excellency merely to answer me this question; and if you answer me affirmatively, that is, that His Majesty will not ratify without those conditions, then to return me the ratifications and papers prepared and sent you some time since to Aranjuez.

I wish to have your excellency's answer as quickly as possible, as on Tuesday I send a courier with circular letters to all our consuls in the ports of Spain, stating to them the critical situation of things between Spain and the United States, the probability of a speedy and serious misunderstanding, and directing them to give notice thereof to all our citizens, advising them so to arrange and prepare their affairs as to be able to move off within the time limited by the treaty, should things end as I now expect. I am also preparing the same information for the commander of our squadron in the Mediterranean, for his own notice and government, and that of all the American merchant vessels he may meet.

I confess, after the style of your excellency's letter of the 31st May, on the subject of the late law of Congress, and the manner in which you annex to the ratification of a convention you yourself had signed, the humiliating conditions of our Government previously suppressing a claim of great magnitude, and which they consider as a point of national honor, and also of repealing an act lately passed with all the deliberation and solemnities prescribed by our constitution, I see little hope of an amicable accommodation, particularly when I tell you that, in my two last despatches, lately received, I am charged by my Government to repeat to your excellency, that not one shilling of the property claimed by the citizens of the United States from Spain for French spoliations, within the ports and territories, or on the coasts of Spain, has ever been relinquished to, or paid, or provided for, by France, in any mode, or even claimed from her; her provisions having been all for other claims arising elsewhere, and totally distinct from these; and further, that the United States are determined, at every risk, never to abandon this claim.

I earnestly repeat my request to have your excellency's answer as soon as possible; and am, with much respect, your excellency's obedient and very humble servant,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Cevallos to Mr. Pinckney.

JULY 8, 1805.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 5th instant, in answer to mine of the 2d, respecting the ratification of the convention concluded on the 11th August, 1802, and having given an account to His Majesty of the terms in which it was conceived, it could not but appear to him little conformable to the friendly relations between the two Governments, which you have it in charge to promote on the part of the United States, and which His Majesty takes every occasion on his part to encourage.

In the midst of a discussion which is itself a proof of the sincerity and real disposition with which it is wished to terminate the question of reclamations which are the object of the said convention, when I presented to you the motives there were for desiring to add in the ratification two or three circumstances which do not alter the substance of the convention, nor take any thing from its object, it is not possible to comprehend the motive for your breaking out in the decisions, not to say threats, contained in your said letter, nor why you should proceed, as you say you will, to instruct the consuls and commandants of the vessels of your nation to give notice of the critical situation of affairs between Spain and the United States, with an anticipation certainly not called for by the spirit of conciliation which you say animates you. It is not easy to conceive how your instructions can authorize you to proceed to these extremes, which are incompatible with the present state of a negotiation hitherto conducted in terms the most conciliating. If, in the year 1803, during the session of Congress, when it was notorious that the Senate of the United States had suspended the ratification of the convention which now occupies us, the minister of His Majesty should have proceeded in the manner you have now done, what opinion would the Government of the United States have formed? They ought to have believed, and they surely would have believed, that the minister of His Majesty had exceeded his instructions, and that his Government could not have authorized a proceeding so extraordinary. Almost two years the Government of the United States deliberated whether they ought, or ought not, to ratify the convention, and you pretend to find it extraordinary, and not only extraordinary but disrespectful to the United States, that the Government of Spain should manifest the difficulties which occur, supporting itself on the principles of the most rigorous justice, and promising itself that the American Government would do no less than to take them into consideration. In the mean time, you, without entering into an examination of them, without transmitting them to your Government, consider them as a sufficient reason for terminating all discussion respecting the ratification, and to designate Monday as a time for a final answer, to be conceived in the precise terms, yes or no; as if such a peremptory answer could be demanded on controverted points, and respecting some of which I have not yet had the honor of seeing a single reply from you. The King cannot persuade himself that such language is conformable to the moderation which he appreciates in the American Government.

The peace of two nations, whose reciprocal interests require a good understanding, is an object too important to be compromitted so lightly; and it is not to be believed that the Government of the United States will think differently, who, without doubt, have not forgotten the repeated proofs of friendship which the Government of Spain has given them from the commencement of their independence, nor that it distrusts the integrity of a Government which it has so often found ready to hear with impartiality, and to decide with justice and with generosity, on all kinds of reclamations.

The convention, whose ratification now occupies us, originated in the desire of both Governments to terminate speedily the question of the claims of individuals of both nations, for the reciprocal injuries which are mentioned in it. These claims always could have been, and can now, by the nature of them, be brought forward in the corresponding tribunals of each country, respectively, and be decided according to the law of nations and the existing treaties, as being the law of both countries; but it was wished, by means of the convention, to give the greater facility and promptitude, by forming a commission which should decide upon them in the manner therein stated. After the conclusion of the convention, which, however, left both Governments at liberty to ratify it or not, and, consequently, although an effort should be made on the part of one of them to suspend the ratification, it could not give place to well founded complaints on the part of the other, on the ground that it prevented their subjects from establishing their claims, because a recourse was always to be had to the tribunals, which was what was rigorously due to them, and the prevention of which could alone give cause for such complaints. But leaving this apart, as it is not the point in question, let us examine what are the motives which could have given rise to your proceedings: having seen my letter of the 2d instant, none other is perceived but what arises from the second and third limitations under which I told you His Majesty was disposed immediately to ratify the convention. But if you examine them as they ought to be examined, you will see that the suppression of the sixth article does not alter the essence of the convention, since, as that article neither grants nor denies the right which may belong to the Americans, by reason of the injuries occasioned on the coasts, and in the ports of Spain, by French privateers, but leaves it such as it is, it is clear, that, by its insertion in the convention, that right does not require greater force than it has itself, if it has any. We have discussed this right both before and since the formation of the convention. I have demonstrated to you that such a right does not exist, by arguments which I have not yet seen combated. I have shown you that if there had been any, it ceased to exist after the convention between France and the United States, concluded on the —— Vendemiaire, 9th year; France having given satisfaction for it, not by paying money as you seemed to suppose I had said, when you replied to me that the United States had not received a cent from France on account of these injuries, but by way of compensation and of conciliation, which is as legitimate a mode of dissolving obligations as payment itself. I have sent you the opinions of the most eminent jurists of the United States, conforming entirely to my mode of thinking. I have told you of the positive answer of the ambassador of France, (Bonaparte,) that satisfaction was given for the injuries for which the United States claimed compensation from Spain; and my last letter of the 5th of October, in which I stated all this to you, has had no reply or answer. There is then a well founded reason for believing that the American Government is persuaded that such a right does not belong to it, and it is not proper to leave in a treaty which is to be ratified clauses relative to rights, satisfied or renounced, especially when, by their insertion in a treaty or convention, they do not acquire, as I have said to you before, either force or validity.

The second condition, which you consider indecorous and humiliating for the United States, appears to me to be quite the contrary. His Majesty is persuaded that the intention of Congress has not been to usurp the rights of his sovereignty. He has not, nor does he, demand the revocation of the act, nor of its provisions, which relate to the internal regulation of the country, but a satisfactory explanation of the clauses of the eleventh section, which impinge the rights of the crown of Spain. You say that this is irrelevant to the question, and relates to pretensions which the United States separately establish. I do not know what these pretensions can be respecting territories which indubitably belong to His Majesty; but I know that, although it should be supposed there might be such pretensions, the wrong would still exist, it having disturbed the pacific possession in which His Majesty finds himself, to legislate and exercise authority over the said territories; and, from its nature, demands that a corresponding and satisfactory explanation, preliminary to all discussion whatever, should be required. Be pleased to recollect the arguments and the vigor with which the members of your Government exclaimed when they saw themselves deprived of the deposite at New Orleans by the act of a Spanish agent; and you will see how a Government, which values its honor, must resent being despoiled of its rights. Recollect also, that the Government of the United States had immediately recourse to the justice of the King my master, desiring that, in the first place, the deposite at New Orleans should be restored, and that afterwards any difference or transaction which might exist between the two Governments should be discussed. His Majesty acceded to it with that justice which characterizes him, and in the same manner now hopes and confides that the United States will desire to give the most satisfactory explanations respecting the offensive expressions which are founded in the said act.

Reflections of this kind ought, in my opinion, to have appeared to you worthy of the attention of your Government, and ought to have induced you to have transmitted them to it without proceeding to the extremes of which your said letter treats, which, in truth, do not correspond with the pacific desires of which you have always spoken.

Under these circumstances, the King, acquainted with your determination of terminating every ulterior explanation relative to the convention, and not being able to persuade himself that the Government of the United States has authorized the part which you have thought proper to take, has resolved to despatch an extraordinary courier to the United States, and by this means to make that Government acquainted with the state of the negotiation, renewing the observations made in the discussion, manifesting the moderation, the conviction, and the conciliating manner with which this Government has proceeded, and leaving that of the United States, on seeing your letters, to judge of the said affair. If they have reciprocated the friendly dispositions of the Government of Spain, His Majesty flatters himself to terminate, by this means, the actual difference which is, from its nature, very far from arriving to the extremes which you suppose it has arrived at.

I reiterate, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

JULY 14, 1804.

Your excellency asked me if I would put under my signature the request to have the original ratification and forms of exchange, which I sent prepared to you, returned to me, as your excellency has refused to ratify except on conditions totally inadmissible; and also, the notice I gave you that I was, in consequence thereof, preparing to leave Madrid and return to the President and Congress of the United States; and that, when I had prepared and arranged my affairs, and could fix a day, I would send for my passports. Your excellency will please to consider this letter as complying with your desire. And as I shall leave Madrid shortly, the respect I owe my Government, and the opinion of others, make it necessary for me to state with moderation the reasons which compel me to do so.

I must refer your excellency to the letters which I have written to you for the last two years on all the various subjects of complaint we had against the conduct of many of His Majesty's official servants in his dominions both in Europe and America, and on the claims arising therefrom; and they will show, not only with what justice, but with what mildness and real friendship these claims and complaints have been urged. After the signing the convention, one made entirely in favor of Spain, by postponing, for the present, the arbitration of the French claims, and the point of holding the session of the commissioners in Madrid, instead of any part of the United States, as I wished, supposing it would be the means of laying the foundation for an amicable arrangement of all our differences, the tenor of my letters was ever peculiarly mild and friendly. I heard, during this time, of many acts of the Spanish Government with surprise, but forebore to express it, under the idea that they would soon see their true interest in cordially meeting our friendly advances. I rejoiced when circumstances permitted the Government of the United States to ratify the convention, partial as it was, because in that I thought I perceived the hope of permanent peace; it was, therefore, with pleasure I hastened to communicate the event to your excellency, not doubting that my communication would have been met with equal cordiality. On presenting, however, the ratification for exchange, my concern was equal to my surprise at finding not only a hesitation, but what appeared to me a determination, by some means, to avoid it. In consequence of this, I have used every exertion in my power to produce the ratification; no proper means by personal application to those whose influence I thought ought to have been exerted in its favor, or by letter, were left untried. My letter of the 1st June will always remain an unanswerable proof of the amicable spirit with which I urged the measure, and of my conciliatory efforts to prevent your making the limits of Louisiana a condition to the ratification. It was written in consequence of your letter of the 31st May, which plainly discovered to me that it was in vain to hope either for a ratification, or for any thing like friendship, or scarcely peace, from Spain. I saw at once that, if she could bring herself to speak in a style so authoritative and improper (not to say more of it) of the act of a Government as much distinguished for its justice and honor as for its moderation, she must be averse to every approach which could lead to an accommodation. In this letter you plainly call the act of Congress of which you speak an outrage and an insult to His Majesty's sovereignty, endeavoring to smooth it over by saying you hoped the President and Congress were not aware of what they did; adding, thereby, the reproach of precipitancy as well as ignorance of their rights and duties; and concluding with saying, in very direct terms, that such a law lessens their good name—language that a monarch may hold to his vassals, or a country to one which she has humbled, but which, to the unbroken spirit of the United States, will not certainly be very pleasing.

As much as this extraordinary letter of yours astonished me, and will, I am sure, my Government, and notwithstanding its style and and manner were alone sufficient to justify my present measures, I again attempted to produce a reconciliation. From the long standing of most of our claims, and the multiplicity of your excellency's avocations, I supposed it not impossible you might have forgotten a number of them, and that the really dangerous and critical state of things did not strike you, or, (to speak plainly,) unless your aim was war, you would not take the irreparable step of rejecting the only means which appeared likely to prevent it; in which rejection, whilst it added unspeakably to our wrongs, our Government could see nothing but determined enmity or the part of Spain. With a view, therefore, to prevent your excellency from taking this step, I made another conciliatory effort, and wrote my letter of the 22d June, in which I gave you a summary view of our situation, urging, in the most friendly terms, the necessity of ratifying the convention, and leaving the other questions to future amicable arrangements. Extraordinary and unexpected as was the language and tenor of your letter of 31st May, this of 2d July still more astonished me. In answer to the application of our Government, merely to exchange the ratification, you have ventured to dictate two previous and degrading conditions; the former desiring the total suppression of our claim for French captures and spoliations within the territory and on the coast of Spain, and condemnations by the French Consuls within the ports of this kingdom—a claim as great, or greater than that provided for by the convention; one equally just and binding, and which I have repeatedly had it in charge from my Government to say to you never was relinquished to France in any manner, or for any consideration, nor provided for by her, nor included or spoken of in any settlement with that Power; but, on the contrary, always was, and is still, considered by the United States as a point of national honor which they never will abandon without an arbitration or an equivalent; and your excellency must know that, by our agreeing to the suspension of this article in the convention, we should abandon the claim; for certainly this is what you meant and repeatedly called for. To the degrading and humiliating condition of our previously abandoning and suppressing this claim, you have added another still more so if possible. Instead of mildly and amicably applying for some equal and friendly mode to ascertain the limits of Louisiana, you have at once proceeded to determine them yourself; and, without leaving to the American Government either the time or a mode to show, or to endeavor to show, that they are right, you have undertaken to decide in your own case; and have not only authoritatively called upon them, in your letter of the 31st May, immediately to revoke a part of a solemn act of their Legislature, (your words being "que revoque la parte del acto,") but have, in that of the 2d July, ventured to make it another condition, on which alone you will consent to ratify a convention signed by yourself, and which you had always acknowledged that His Majesty was bound in honor and justice to consent to.

I have repeatedly told your excellency that, as to the two questions of abandoning the French claims, or consenting to any thing to affect the limits of Louisiana, my instructions are as positive as possible never to abandon the one, or enter into any contract, or even negotiation, respecting the other. The measure, therefore, of my sending these conditions to the United States, which you mention, and waiting for their reply, was not only wholly improper, but would have been contrary to my instructions, which were by every possible means to expedite the ratification.

I well know that it is utterly impossible for your excellency, without having been there for some time, to be acquainted with the sentiments, character, or feelings of the American people, and being so, that you may doubt the correctness of the opinions I give; but, be assured, there is not a man in the United States, or its Government, who will not consider the refusal to ratify except on such conditions as you proposed, and the very proposing them, as a national indignity, and expect from me, the depositary of their views and public honor here, the measure I mean to take. It is as much the duty of a minister to assert the rights of his nation, and to refuse to receive or discuss degrading or affrontive propositions, as it is to promote mutual harmony and good understanding. Your excellency says that the measures I now pursue are not consistent with my usual and former friendly professions; to which I reply, that it is with much concern I have observed that your excellency's conduct, for the last twelve months, and since the cession of Louisiana, has been very little conformable to the amicable sentiments you now wish me to believe you possess; whilst mine, you well know, have always been sincere and active in endeavoring to conciliate and preserve peace. My Government is informed of all that has passed, and will be of all that is now doing, and are the best judges. Your excellency had it, however, in your power to show whether your professions were sincere, by never making these propositions, because you were long told, before you did make them, how extremely inadmissible and improper they would be considered, or after they were made, and you found the humiliating light in which they were viewed by withdrawing them, and consenting to ratify the convention, extending the time for receiving the claims to six or eight months, or to twelve months, as I told you you might, and I even proposed it to you.

In speaking of striking out the sixth article, your excellency does not appear to me to be aware of the nature of the proposition you have made; in remarking on this subject you say, "que la supresion del articulo 6, de la convencion en nada altera la esencia de esta, pues como en dicho articulo no se concede ni se niega el derecho que puede competir á los Americanos por razon de las perjuicios ocasionados en las costas y puertos de Espana, por los corsarios Franceses, serio que se dexa subsistir tal qual es para lo sucesivo: es claro que por su insercion en la convencion no adquiere mayor fuerza que la que puede tener por si solo si tiene." Your excellency certainly knows that it is an established principle of the law of nations that, in framing treaties or conventions, which have for their object the continuance of peace, or the accommodation of differences, all points or claims for injuries or damages, which are intended to be reserved, must be mentioned, or otherwise they will be considered as relinquished; and this was my reason for inserting it in the convention. Our object in framing that instrument was, the amicable settlement of all differences arising from spoliations on our trade, contrary to treaties and the law of nations, and for which we hold Spain liable. Had we, therefore, said nothing about the French captures or condemnations within her territories or ports, or should we now agree to strike out the sixth article, there is not a man, who knows any thing of the law of nations, who will not instantly say that we had abandoned them; and if your excellency was not convinced of this, why have you so perseveringly endeavored to suppress it?

By the law of nations, "a monarch cannot, in honor, refuse to ratify a convention made by a minister with full powers, unless it can be proved that the minister had remarkably and openly deviated from his instructions, or the monarch has some other very strong reasons for so doing, but they must be very strong." Now, according to this principle, I deny positively, from your own statement of the conditions, that His Majesty has any sufficiently strong reasons to justify the not ratifying this convention: it cannot be because you made it contrary to your instructions; for you are now, and were then, his first Secretary of State, and signed it under his own eye, and in his own palace: neither can it be on account of the suppression of the sixth article; for all that can now be known about it was known then, and the relinquishment to France of other and totally distinct claims, of which you speak so much, and without the least weight, was as much in existence as it is now: for that convention was made in 1800, two years before the present; nor would it be considered, by the law of nations, a very honorable thing to refuse the ratification on the ground of a small part of one of the Floridas, which, you say, Congress have encroached upon, when it is well known that the whole value of both the Floridas would not cover the claims which this convention is intended to provide for. To endeavor, therefore, to get rid of the ratification, on account of a dispute about a small slip of those colonies, will not, I suppose, be viewed by our Government, or any neutral or impartial one, as that honorable right which, according to the law of nations, can alone justify a Power in refusing to ratify a convention formed by a minister fully authorized. Having high respect for His Majesty's honor and justice, I am very unwilling to believe he could have authorized you to refuse to ratify the convention on these grounds, or to hold such language, or make such demands of the United States, as they have, upon all occasions, manifested great respect for his person and Government. Be assured that our own would have regarded the refusal alone with great seriousness; but coupled with these degrading conditions of totally abandoning the French claims, by the suppression of the sixth article, and, as it were, commanding the repeal of a law of Congress without allowing us time to consult and examine or defend it, are so high an indignity, that I am convinced, had I not determined to refuse all discussions upon the subject of admitting them as conditions of the ratification, as well as to be the instrument of transmitting them to my Government, and, finding you insisted on it, had I not also immediately determined to leave Madrid, and put an end to all discussions on the conditions proposed here until the President's pleasure be known, I should not only have met with his disapprobation, but that of every man in a country where every individual feels himself personally interested in the honor and character of his Government.

The case your excellency quotes of the Intendant of New Orleans does not apply; that was a flagrant breach of a solemn treaty, and deprivation of a right secured by that treaty, and daily used, and indispensable to a numerous portion of our citizens, which, as your excellency well knows, was the reason why the Senate did not ratify the convention during that session, and was the cause of the inevitable delay that took place, and for which a Spanish agent was blameable, whom your minister declared instantly to our Executive had no authority to do so: while the law you complain of is the act of a Government, so constructed as that it is impossible for them to proceed without that due examination which is necessary to prevent precipitate, and generally leads to just, decisions of a Government, as remarkable for its attention to the rights of foreigners as to those of their own citizens; and which, no doubt, will be able to maintain the propriety of any law it has passed, by strong and unanswerable arguments. And here let me remark to your excellency, that it was not on account of the time you may have taken to answer my first application to ratify, that I objected, and wrote my letter of the 5th of July; for if you had taken much more, although I should not have considered it as worthy of Spain to think of a revenge of that kind, for the unavoidable delay the convention met with in the Senate, on account of the shutting the deposite of New Orleans, yet I should have waited some time longer; but it was to the answer itself of the 2d of July, when made, and to the refusal to ratify, except upon the degrading conditions you annexed, which I objected; and it is upon this answer, and this alone, that I grounded my proceedings.

Believing, as I solemnly do, that when the refusal to ratify, except on these degrading conditions, be made known in the United States, this affair cannot be amicably arranged without such sacrifices or concessions, on the one part or the other, as no people, having a national character to support, will be ready to make; and as I am sure we shall not, there appears to me a great probability of a misunderstanding; and so believing, it is my indispensable duty not to conceal it from the citizens of the United States in the ports of Spain, who are, or may be, interested, and indeed are always applying to me on the subject of the convention, well knowing it was the only mode to preserve friendship or peace between the two countries. The same duty required of me a similar communication to the commander of our ships in the Mediterranean, for his notice, and of that of our merchant vessels, that they should, using their own discretion, avoid making too free with the Spanish ports or coasts, during the state of uneasiness and uncertainty which now exists. This indispensable part of my duty your excellency seems, improperly, to feel as a menace, when a moment's reflection should have convinced you it was a duty I could not avoid. How, indeed, was it possible to neglect it? or what other opinion can we form, but that, when the United States see the convention returned, and with conditions so humiliating and inadmissible, they will give up all hope of payment here, and, however unwillingly, still be inevitably compelled to seek some mode of paying themselves? Having this view, therefore, of the business, how unpardonable would it have been in me not to warn our citizens of it, and prevent their being lulled into security, and surprised at a moment when they least suspected it.

Your excellency complains of my fixing a short day, and requiring a positive answer. The reasons are obvious; you were to leave Madrid with the court in a short time. It was at least three months since you knew that the convention was ratified, for I have a right to believe you knew it before I did; you had, therefore, full time to consider it; and as my former experience had convinced me, that, on a question not agreeable to you, it would be difficult for me to obtain an answer for a long time, the proposing of these conditions, and my public duty, made it necessary for me immediately to know, and that in the shortest time possible, if you would ratify or not without them; and, certainly, after the manner in which you treated our Government, in your letter of the 31st of May, and that of the 2d of July, your excellency could not expect any other conduct on my part. There was another reason which gave me a right to consider all discussions on the conditions as out of the question, which was, that my two letters in June, copies of which I send here annexed, had anticipated the question of the conditions proposed, and had shown you the impossibility of my suffering them to be incorporated into the ratification; and this was done before you formally proposed them, as I had received notice you intended it, and endeavored to prevent your doing so.

In all the differences between Great Britain and France, the United States have uniformly maintained their rights with a firmness that has done them honor, in the opinion of every nation: and, as I have often told your excellency, it is not now to Spain, or any other country, they will yield them. My letter of the 22d of June, and the previous friendly one of the 1st of June, (both of which I annex, and desire your excellency, in any use you may make of them, to consider as a part of this,) while they state the sufferings of our citizens, and the wrongs the convention is intended to remedy, will, at the same time, show my unwearied exertions, and the mildness with which I attempted to persuade your excellency to ratify it.

In speaking, as your excellency does, that it is general, in all countries, on questions of this kind, to resort to the ordinary tribunals, I only remark, that your excellency well knows how painful it has been to me to be continually representing the sufferings and losses of our citizens, and the delays attending their applications to the tribunals here—delays of such an extent, as to impress them with the opinion that a recourse to the tribunals of Spain can seldom be viewed as the proper means to obtain the rights of American citizens; that the years and means necessary to pursue their claims, through those channels, were infinitely more ruinous than the first loss; and that it was essential for our Government decidedly to interfere; and, for the truth and justice of this remark, I appeal to every unfortunate American citizen who has had business here for the last six years.

How far the conduct of your excellency, in refusing to ratify, and bring into effect the only mode that remained of arranging them peaceably, will go to strengthen the opinion just given, is left for you to decide. After what has happened, our citizens will very much doubt whether there was ever any serious intention here to ratify the convention as it was made; and, if it is now ratified, I shall always believe it was entirely owing to the measures my duty made it necessary for me to pursue. I form this opinion by reading your excellency's letter of the 9th, in which I am pleased to see you begin, at last, to have some value for the friendship and peace of the United States; and to find there is a point of indignity or neglect, beyond which even their moderation will not go. I am, therefore, led to hope that the messenger, who you say is to sail for the United States, will carry out the convention fully ratified, without limitation or condition, and with orders to arrange it agreeably to the United States.

This I advise your excellency most sincerely to do. I have always done so, until your letter of the 2d of July, in the most mild and friendly terms, and with the greatest deference and respect to Spain; and, had your excellency proceeded in the same way, it would have been no less honorable to your talents, than to the justice and friendly intentions of His Majesty, which you so often mention.

Your excellency must perceive that the measures I have adopted were rendered indispensable by the respect I owe my Government; it being my duty to defend them from the charge of having lightly or inconsiderately legislated upon important subjects, and thereby outraged and usurped the rights of others. It was equally my duty to defend, and preserve inviolate, the well founded claims of a numerous and deserving class of our citizens, whose legal and meritorious exertions, while they contribute to increase the enterprise, and extend the commerce of the United States, have the fullest right to demand, and will always be sure to receive, the cordial and unceasing support of their Government.

With this explanation of the reasons which will compel me to leave Madrid, and with the determination and orders to keep our citizens in Spain constantly warned against being lulled into security by any notification or information which they may receive, except from their Government or its officers, I end this letter. It has become my duty to return to the President and Congress of the United States, in order to give them, and, through them, to my fellow-citizens, such statements and opinions, as can alone be properly done in person. To them I shall refer the question, well knowing that, in their hands, the rights, the character, and the sacred honor of a free people are always safe.

III. Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, on the ratification of the convention of 1802.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Marquis de Casa Yrujo to the Secretary of State.

OCTOBER 13, 1804.

SIR:

By the communications I have made to this Government, and the translation of the correspondence between His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos and Mr. Pinckney, minister of the United States to His Catholic Majesty, you are informed of the just motives His Catholic Majesty has for not ratifying the convention pending between our two Governments, except on certain conditions, founded on the most rigorous justice, and necessary, as well to the honor of his sovereignty, as to the protection of the interests of his subjects. That His Majesty has the right to propose the alteration which he may judge proper for these objects, before the ratification, is indisputable, not only from the expression which is found in the seventh article of the said convention, which says, "the present convention shall have no force or effect until it be ratified by the contracting parties," but from many other antecedent examples, as that which occurred at the exchange of ratifications at Paris at the treaty of peace of 1763, of which I verbally informed you; and, lately, in the treaty of limits between England and the United States; the latter, as is understood, having refused to ratify a part of it, in consequence of the acquisition of Louisiana.

By order of the King my master I have renewed here the opposition made by His Majesty to the ratification of the said convention, except under the conditions which were proposed in Madrid to the beforementioned minister of the United States, one of which was the entire suppression of the sixth article of the convention; but, having recollected that, from insisting on this point, the consequence might be the complete annulment of a convention by which the King my master, animated by the sentiments of justice which characterize him, desired to do justice to the citizens of the United States who might have suffered during the last war by the excesses of his commanders or subaltern officers, contrary to the existing treaty and the law of nations, and more and more to prove that the King my master proceeds in this affair with the liberality and frankness which always mark his conduct towards the United States, I am authorized to say to you that His Catholic Majesty will accede to the ratification of the said convention, under the following conditions:

1st. The Government of the United States will suppress or modify, as I proposed to you in one of my letters in the month of March past, the eleventh section of the act of Congress of the 24th of February last, and on which His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos has made like complaints to the American minister in Madrid; or, if it should be more agreeable to this Government, it will declare to me in writing, through you, that, by the said eleventh section of the beforementioned act, it had not intended to offer any insult to His Catholic Majesty, nor any aggression upon the rights of his sovereignty, and that the Executive, as the true interpreter of the said law, shall declare that the object or intention of what is contained in the said section is and ought to be only applicable to the territory of the United States, and not to the country belonging to and in the actual possession of His Catholic Majesty; it being well understood that, until the commission destined to the demarcation of limits shall have decided by common consent that the territory claimed by the United States did not belong to His Majesty, but to the said States, they, nor the President authorized by them, shall make no change in it, nor publish laws, nor establish custom-houses, nor any other species of regulations in said territory; but, on the contrary, that they should leave things in statu quo, as they were before the resolution of Congress complained of. Moreover, there shall be given the corresponding notoriety to this act of ratification on the part of the United States, in a mode that, without in any manner compromitting its dignity, may prove that satisfactory explanations were given on this point to His Catholic Majesty.

2d. His Catholic Majesty being informed that the mercantile operations of the citizens of the United States, out of some of which, without doubt, their reclamations will grow, have extended to the most distant possessions of His Majesty, as well in America as in the Philippine islands, and, from the great distance of these points, and the interruption to which the navigation to them is subjected during a great part of the year, the term of eighteen months prescribed to the commissioners by the thirtieth article to receive all the reclamations must be short, it becomes necessary that the term should have a reasonable extension; and this is requisite, to the end that the subjects of the King, living at so great a distance, may draw the advantage which is due to them from the beforementioned convention.

3d. Although, as has been made apparent, by reasons which His Majesty has not as yet seen combated, that the complete suppression of the sixth article would be conformable to entire justice, nevertheless, thinking that my master will not oppose himself to the retention of the said article, if an alteration is made in its phraseology, which, without diminishing the right of the United States, should give more clearness to the intentions of His Majesty, contained in the said article, the sixth article should be expressed in terms nearly as following:

"The beforementioned plenipotentiaries not having been able to agree on the principle of the claims originating in the excesses of the foreign privateers, agents, consuls, or tribunals in their respective territories; Spain considering herself not responsible for these, as appears both from the circumstances and the time of the offence, as well as from the character of the measures afterwards taken by the United States with France; and the United States, on the contrary, claiming from Spain the amount of the damages and injuries arising from that source, both Governments have expressly agreed that each Government reserve to itself, (as is done by this convention,) not only for itself, but also for its subjects and citizens, respectively, all the rights which they may now have; it being well understood that the ratification by His Catholic Majesty of the present convention ought not, nor shall not, be considered as an acknowledgment on his part of any right, or that of the United States, to such reclamations and pretensions, nor as a renunciation by His Majesty of the exceptions which result from the conventions between France and the United States."

Under these conditions, which the King flatters himself will appear just to the American Government, His Majesty is ready to ratify the beforementioned convention: and from the moderation, and even liberality, so clearly manifested in these, it will remain apparent, that if the said convention should not take effect, it ought not to be attributed to the want of frank and friendly dispositions on the part of the King my master.

God preserve you many years.

THE MARQUIS DE CASA YRUJO.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, minister of His Catholic Majesty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 15, 1804.

SIR:

Your letter of the 13th instant, communicating certain conditions which His Catholic Majesty considers as proper to be annexed to his ratification of the convention of August 11th, 1802, now depending between the two Governments, has been laid before the President. One of these conditions refers to a section in an act of Congress passed on the 24th day of February last, regarded by His Catholic Majesty as disrespectful to his sovereignty, and requires, as a reasonable preliminary to the ratification of the depending instrument, that the said act should be freed, by authentic exposition, from the apparent import at which umbrage has been taken. It could not be learned by the President without some surprise, that the law in question should have given rise to complaint, and much more that it should be made a reason for suspending the final sanction of His Catholic Majesty to an instrument deliberately formed, and awaiting that single formality only for its completion. The President had certainly a right to expect that a legislative act, depending essentially for its effect in the particular case on his discretion, would have been left to the regular exposition and execution, before it should become the object of criticism and complaint from any foreign Government. He had a right, consequently, to prescribe this answer, when the act above cited was first made a subject of representation; and he might even now be justified in resting on this sound principle the reply to the representation which is repeated in the communication just received from you. Yielding, nevertheless, to the disposition of the United States to maintain the most friendly understanding with Spain, and to that frankness which is dictated by the integrity of his views, he charged me with the candid explanations which were contained in my letter of March the 19th last. These explanations, when received by His Catholic Majesty, cannot fail to satisfy him, that the United States, not less careful to forbear than ready to resent real insults, could not have meditated, by the act complained of, the slightest disrespect to his rights or his sovereignty; and as the most definite proof of the sentiments entertained for His Catholic Majesty, I am now charged to enclose for his information the executive act of the President, founded on, and of a nature equally public with, the act of Congress aforesaid; by which it will be seen that, in expounding and applying the latter, there is the most exact conformity to the assurance given in the letter of March the 19th; that the operation of the 11th section would take place within the acknowledged limits of the United States, and would not be extended beyond them, until it should be rendered expedient by friendly elucidation, and adjustments with the Spanish Government. In order to hasten those, a special mission to Madrid was some time since provided for; and if the destined minister extraordinary has not already repaired thither, the instructions, which will now be repeated, if no unfavorable considerations present themselves, may be expected soon to have that effect. In the mean time, the President concurs with the Spanish Government in the expediency of leaving things precisely in statu quo. And he persuades himself that it will be deemed equally expedient on both sides, to give to this precaution its full effect, by a mutual forbearance to increase unnecessarily either within or on the borders of territories, the limits of which remain to be adjusted, military provisions of any kind, which, by exciting jealousies on one side or the other, may have tendencies equally disagreeable to both.

The other condition proposes to remodel the terms of the sixth article of the convention, which leaves for subsequent discussion the particular class of claims therein described. The President does not conceal his regret at seeing the ratification of the convention clogged with a condition which, if persisted in, could not easily be reconciled with that delicacy in such transactions which he has always felt a pleasure in ascribing to His Catholic Majesty, or with that desire which His Catholic Majesty has so often professed, to multiply proofs of his friendly sentiments towards the United States. If the preceding condition had not been the result of a misconception, which can now no longer exist, it might have had a natural source in the sensibility, not unbecoming a magnanimous Government, and might have been urged by the considerations, it had reference to an event subsequent to the first assent given by His Catholic Majesty, and which, although distinct from the intrinsic merits of the convention, might raise a question how far the completion of it was permitted by a new state of things. The condition relating to the sixth article is of a character altogether different. The article, as it now stands, was negotiated under the eye and with the approbation of the Spanish Government. All the principles, all the facts, all the authorities of public law, were, at that time, the same as at present. And there can be the less reason for attempting to unsettle what was then decided, as the period of negotiation was sufficiently protracted for the most minute examination and the maturest reflection. If it be said that the alteration proposed would be in words only, and not in the meaning of the article, may it not with greater propriety be answered that, on that supposition, it cannot be of such importance as to be pressed as a condition which would require all the delay, and all the forms of a new stipulation, and which might have the effect of frustrating the convention altogether? For, without entering into a comparison of the article in its present terms with the substitute proposed, it is obvious that the difficulty of adjusting a form of expression—a difficulty not inconsiderable originally—would be much increased by the necessity of seeking in the relation of the new to the old article, as well as in the terms of the new, the precise construction which ought to be given to it.

Were it necessary to enforce these observations by an inquiry into the right of His Catholic Majesty to withhold his ratification in this case, it would not be difficult to show that it is neither supported by the principles of public law, nor countenanced by the examples which have been cited. According to the former, such a refusal ought to be founded either on a departure of the negotiating minister from his instructions, or on intervening occurrences, or on some surprise or deception. Neither of these can be alleged. The Spanish Government itself was privy to the negotiation, leaving, consequently, its final act of ratification the merest ceremony. No new facts connected with the subject have come to light. The negotiation was so long on foot, and so fairly conducted, that neither surprise nor deception can possibly be pretended. In every such case, besides, the motive for refusal ought to be of great and evident importance. In the present case, the very argument for the change destroys the importance of it, since the change is alleged to be in the words, and not in the meaning, of the article. As to the examples cited, they bear no analogy to the case to which they are applied. In that of the treaty of peace at Paris of 1763, the plea, on the British side, is understood to have been a matter deeply interesting, which was discovered and declared by the negotiator himself on the very day of his signing the instrument. The other example of the conditional ratification here of a late convention with Great Britain is still more dissimilar; being occasioned by an important event—the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States—which might have given to one of the articles a scope contemplated by the instructions of neither party, nor within the knowledge or intention of either when signed by the negotiators. Another distinction absolutely decisive is, that the conditional ratification proceeded from the Senate, who, sharing in treaties on the final ratification only, and not till then even knowing the instructions pursued in them, cannot be bound by the negotiation like a sovereign, who holds the entire authority in his own hands. When peculiarities of this sort in the structure of a Government are sufficiently known to other Governments, they have no right to take exception at the inevitable effect of them.

With respect to the enlargement of the time for the assembling of the commissioners, which can be done without any remodification of the convention, the President's respect for the wishes of His Catholic Majesty will not permit him to refuse his concurrence; although he does not himself perceive the necessity or advantage of it. The commissioners who may be appointed on the part of the United States will accordingly be apprised that their proceedings are not to be commenced till the month of May next, unless further inquiry shall satisfy His Catholic Majesty that an earlier day will not be inconvenient.

On a view of the whole subject, as it now presents itself, the President infers, with confidence, that His Catholic Majesty, recollecting that the claims to be adjusted under the convention are of the most incontestable character, and finding that a disappearance of every other obstacle to his ratification leaves to him the sole decision between adhering to or relinquishing a condition, for which there cannot be a reason now which did not exist, and was not known at first, and which, as represented on his part, would otherwise be of too little importance to be turned against the act of his own plenipotentiary, entered into with his own privity, will pursue the course which is prescribed, not less by his delicacy, or rather his good faith, than by his love of justice, and the friendship subsisting between Spain and the United States.

In pressing thus the consummation of the suspended instrument, the President cannot be influenced by any peculiar advantage given by the terms of it to the United States. He well knows, as has been just noticed, that the claims therein provided for cannot ultimately be disallowed; and that the convention, if carried into effect in its present form, will still leave for subsequent accommodation several questions deeply interesting to the subsisting relations. If he indulges a solicitude on the occasion, it is because the state of the transaction has justly led the claimants into preparations and expectations, which would involve many in useless expense, and all in disappointment and disgust; because he regards the convention as a step towards a satisfactory adjustment of other depending and accruing questions; because a completion of it will dissipate appearances, which have already begotten inquietudes on both sides, and may embarrass an intercourse desirable and valuable to both; because, in a word, it will be a pledge of future justice, at the same time that it guaranties the present harmony between the two nations. These are considerations which cannot surely be entitled to less weight with the Spanish Government than is allowed to them by that of the United States.

It will be added only, that, considering the disadvantages of every kind incident to the present state of uncertainty, and particularly that the arrangements here, preparatory to the execution of the convention, must be regulated by something more positive than an inference, however reasonable, that the instrument will receive from His Catholic Majesty an unqualified ratification, I need not remind you of the utility which would result from such assurances as your knowledge of the views of your Government may enable you to express to this, that the event may now be relied on. On this point, I shall hope for the favor of as early an answer as you can make it convenient to transmit for the information of the President.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

IV. Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe, and to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1803.

SIR:

The communications by Mr. Hughes, including the treaty and conventions signed with the French Government, were safely delivered on the 14th instant. Enclosed is a copy of a letter written in consequence of them to Mr. Livingston and yourself.

On the presumption which accords with the information given by Mr. Hughes, that you will have proceeded to Madrid, in pursuance of the instructions of the 17th February last, it is thought proper to observe to you, that although Louisiana may, in some respects, be more important than the Floridas, and has more than exhausted the funds allotted for the purchase of the latter, the acquisition of the Floridas is still to be pursued, especially as the crisis must be favorable to it.

You will be at no loss for the arguments most likely to have weight in prevailing on Spain to yield to our wishes. These colonies, separated from her other territories on this continent by New Orleans, the Mississippi, and the whole of Western Louisiana, are now of less value to her than ever; whilst to the United States they retain the peculiar importance derived from their position, and their relations to us through the navigable rivers, running from the United States into the Gulf of Mexico. In the hands of Spain they must ever be a dead expense in time of peace; indefensible in time of war, and at all times a source of irritation and ill blood with the United States. The Spanish Government must understand, in fact, that the United States can never consider the amicable relations between Spain and them as definitively and permanently secured, without an arrangement on this subject, which will substitute the manifest indications of nature for the artificial and inconvenient state of things now existing.

The advantage to be derived to your negotiations from the war that has just commenced will certainly not escape you. Powerful, and it might be presumed effectual, use may be made of the fact that Great Britain meant to seize New Orleans with a view to the anxiety of the United States to obtain it; and of the inference from that fact, that the same policy will be pursued with respect to the Floridas. Should Spain be engaged in the war, it cannot be doubted that they will be quickly occupied by a British force, and held out on some condition or other to the United States. Should Spain be still at peace, and wish not to lose her neutrality, she should reflect that the facility and policy of seizing the Floridas must strengthen the temptations of Great Britain to force her into the war. In every view it will be better for Spain that the Floridas should be in the hands of the United States than of Great Britain; and equally so that they should be ceded on beneficial terms by herself, than that they should find their way to us through the hands of Great Britain.

The Spanish Government may be assured of the sincere and continued desire of the United States to live in harmony with Spain; that this motive enters deeply into the solicitude of their Government for a removal of the danger to it which is inseparable from such a neighborhood as that of the Floridas; and that, having by a late convention with Great Britain adjusted every territorial question and interest with that nation, and the treaty with France concerning Louisiana having just done the same with her, it only remains that the example be copied into an arrangement with Spain, who is evidently not less interested in it than we are.

By the enclosed note of the Spanish minister here, you will see the refusal of Spain to listen to our past overtures, with the reasons for the refusal. The answer to that communication is also enclosed. The reply to such reasons will be very easy. Neither the reputation nor the duty of His Catholic Majesty can suffer from any measure founded in wisdom and the true interests of Spain. There is as little ground for supposing that the maritime Powers of Europe will complain of, or be dissatisfied, with a cession of the two Floridas to the United States, more than with the late cession of Louisiana by Spain to France, or more than with the former cessions through which the Floridas themselves have passed. What the treaties are subsequent to that of Utrecht, which are alleged to preclude Spain from the proposed alienation, have not been examined. Admitting them to exist in the sense put upon them, there is probably no maritime Power who would not readily acquiesce in our acquisition of the Floridas as more advantageous to itself, than the retention of them by Spain. Shut up against all foreign commerce, and liable at every moment to be thrown into the preponderant scale of Great Britain, Great Britain herself would unquestionably have no objection to their being transferred to us, unless it should be drawn from her intention to conquer them for herself, or from the use she might expect to make of them in a negotiation with the United States. And with respect to France, silence at least is imposed on her by the cession to the United States of the province ceded to her by Spain, not to mention that she must wish to see the Floridas, like Louisiana, kept out of the hands of Great Britain; and has, doubtless, felt that motive in promising her good offices with Spain for obtaining these possessions for the United States. Of this promise, you will, of course, make the proper use in your negotiations. For the price to be given for the Floridas, you are referred, generally, to the original instructions on this point. Although the change of circumstances lessens the anxiety for acquiring immediately a territory which now, more certainly than ever, must drop into our hands, and, notwithstanding the pressure of the bargain with France on our treasury, yet, for the sake of a peaceable and fair completion of a great object, you are permitted by the President, in case a less sum will not be accepted, to give two millions and a quarter of dollars, the sum heretofore apportioned to this purchase. It will be expected, however, that the whole of it, if necessary, be made applicable to the discharge of debts and damages claimed from Spain, as well those not yet admitted by the Spanish Government as those covered by the convention signed with it by Mr. Pinckney, on the 11th day of August, 1802, and which was not ratified by the Senate, because it embraced no more of the just responsibilities of Spain. On the subject of these claims, you will hold a strong language. The Spanish Government may be told plainly that they will not be abandoned any further than an impartial tribunal may make exceptions to them. Energy in the appeal to its feelings will not only tend to justice for past wrongs, but to prevent a repetition of them in case Spain should become a party to the present war.

In arranging the mode, the times, and the priorities, of paying the assumed debts, the ease of the treasury is to be consulted as much as possible: less is not to be done with that view than was enjoined in the case of the French debts to our citizens. The stock to be engaged in the transaction is not to be made irredeemable without a necessity not likely to arise; and the interest, as well as the principal, should be payable at the Treasury of the United States. The only admissible limitation, on the redemption of the stock, is that the holder shall not be paid off in less than about one-fifth or one-fourth of the amount in one year.

Indemnifications for the violation of our deposite at New Orleans have been constantly kept in view in our remonstrances and demands on that subject. It will be desirable to comprehend them in the arrangement. A distinction, however, is to be made between the positive and specific damages sustained by individuals, and the general injuries accruing from that breach of treaty. The latter could be provided for by a gross and vague estimate only, and need not be pressed as an indispensable condition. The claim, however, may be represented as strictly just, and a forbearance to insist on it as an item in the valuable considerations for which the cession is made. Greater stress may be laid on the positive and specific damages capable of being formerly verified by individuals; but there is a point beyond which it may be prudent not to insist even here; especially as the incalculable advantage accruing from the acquisition of New Orleans will diffuse a joy throughout the Western country, that will drown the sense of these little sacrifices. Should no bargain be made on the subject of the Floridas, our claims of every sort are to be kept in force.

If it be impossible to bring Spain to a cession of the whole of the two Floridas, a trial is to be made for obtaining either, or any important part of either. The part of West Florida adjoining the territories now ours, and including the principal rivers falling into the Gulf, will be particularly important and convenient.

It is not improbable that Spain, in treating on a cession of the Floridas, may propose an exchange of them for Louisiana beyond the Mississippi, or may make a serious point of some particular boundary to that territory. Such an exchange is inadmissible. In intrinsic value there is no equality; besides the advantage given us by the western bank of the entire jurisdiction of the river. We are the less disposed also to make sacrifices to obtain the Floridas, because their position and the manifest course of events guaranty an early and reasonable acquisition of them. With respect to the adjustment of a boundary between Louisiana and the Spanish territories, there might be no objection to combining it with a cession of the Floridas, if our knowledge of the extent and character of Louisiana were less imperfect. At present, any arrangement would be a step too much in the dark to be hazarded; and this will be a proper answer to the Spanish Government. Perhaps the intercommunications with the Spanish Government on this subject, with other opportunities at Madrid, may enable you to collect useful information and proofs of the fixed limits, or of the want of fixed limits, to Western Louisiana. Your inquiries may also be directed to the question, whether any, and how much, of what passes for West Florida, be fairly included in the territory ceded to us by France? The treaties and transactions between Spain and France will claim particular attention in this inquiry.

Should no cession whatever be attainable, it will remain only for the present to provide for the free use of the rivers running from the United States into the Gulf. A convenient deposite is to be pressed as equally reasonable there as on the Mississippi; and the inconveniency experienced on the latter, from the want of a jurisdiction over the deposite, will be an argument for such an improvement of the stipulation. The free use of those rivers for our external commerce is to be insisted on as an important right, without which the United States can never be satisfied; and without an admission of which, by Spain, they can never confide either in her justice or her disposition to cultivate harmony and good neighborhood with them. It will not be advisable to commit the United States into the alternative of war, or a compliance on the part of Spain; but no representation short of that can be stronger than the case merits.

The instruction to urge on Spain some provision for preventing, or rectifying by a delegated authority here, aggressions and abuses committed by her colonial officers, is to be regarded as of high importance. Nothing else may be able to save the United States from the necessity of doing themselves summary justice. It cannot be expected that they will long continue to wait the delays and the difficulties of negotiating, on every emergency, beyond the Atlantic. It is more easy, and infinitely more just, that Spain and other European nations should establish a remedy on this side of the Atlantic, where the source of the wrongs is established, than that the complaints of the United States should be carried to the other side, and, perhaps, wait till the Atlantic has moreover been twice crossed in procuring information for the other party, without which a decision may be refused.

The navigation of the bay of St. Mary's is common to Spain and the United States; but a light-house, and the customary water marks, can be established within the Spanish jurisdiction only. Hitherto, the Spanish officers have refused every proper accommodation on this subject. The case may be stated to the Government of Spain, with our just expectation that we may be permitted either to provide the requisite establishments ourselves, or to make use of those provided by Spain.

This letter will be addressed to Madrid; but as it is possible that you may not have left Paris, or may have proceeded to London, a copy will be forwarded to Paris, to be thence, if necessary, sent on to London. In case it should find you either at Paris or London, it must be left to your own decision how far the call for you at either of those places ought to suspend these instructions. Should you decide to go to Madrid, it may be proper first to present your credence to the French or British Government, as the case may be; and to charge a fit person with the public business during your absence. Should you even be at Paris, and your commission filled up for London, it may be best to proceed first to London, if the call to Madrid be not very urgent.

I shall write to Mr. Pinckney, and inform him that this letter is intended for his use jointly with yours; though addressed to you alone, because in part not applicable to him. Should you suspend, or have suspended, your visit to Madrid, you will please to write to him also, giving him your ideas as to the expediency of prosecuting the object of the joint instructions or not until you can be with him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

The Secretary of State to James Monroe, Esq. their minister extraordinary, jointly with Charles Pinckney, Esq. to the court of Spain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 15, 1804.

SIR:

It being presumed that, by the time of your receiving this communication, the negotiation with which you were charged by my letter of the 5th January last, will no longer require your presence in London, the President thinks it proper that you should now proceed to Madrid, and, in conjunction with Mr. Pinckney, open a negotiation on the important subjects remaining to be adjusted with the Spanish Government. You will understand, however, that besides the consideration how far your immediate departure may be permitted by the state of our affairs with the British Government, or by events unknown at this distance, you are at liberty to make it depend in a due degree on the prospect of active co-operation or favorable dispositions from quarters most likely to influence the councils of Spain. It will be of peculiar importance to ascertain the views of the French Government. From the interest which France has in the removal of all sources of discord between Spain and the United States, and the indications given by her present Government of a disposition to favor arrangements for that purpose, particularly in relation to the territory remaining to Spain on the eastern side of the Mississippi, and from the ascendancy which the French Government has over that of Spain, of which a recent and striking proof has been given in the prompt accession of the latter on the summons of the former, to the transfer of Louisiana to the United States, notwithstanding the orders which had been transmitted to the Spanish envoy here to protest against the right to make the transfer, much will depend on, and much is expected from, the interposition of that Government, in aid of your negotiations. Mr. Livingston has been instructed to cherish the motives to such an interposition, as you will find by the extract from my letter to him herewith enclosed; and if you should take Paris in your way to Madrid, as is probable, you will not only be able to avail yourself of all his information, but will have an opportunity of renewing the personal communications which took place during your joint negotiations.

The objects to be pursued are, 1st, an acknowledgment by Spain that Louisiana, as ceded to the United States, extends to the river Perdido; 2d, a cession of all her remaining territory eastward of that river, including East Florida; 3d, a provision for arbitrating and paying all the claims of citizens of the United States not provided for by the late convention, consisting of those for wrongs done prior to the last peace, by other than Spanish subjects, within Spanish responsibility, for wrongs done in the Spanish colonies by Spanish subjects or officers, and for wrongs of every kind for which Spain is justly responsible, committed since the last peace. On the part of the United States, it may be stipulated that the territory on the western side of the Mississippi shall not be settled for a given term of years, beyond a limit not very distant from that river, leaving a spacious interval between our settlements and those of Spain, and that a sum of —— dollars shall be paid by the United States in discharge of so much of the awards to their citizens. It may also be stipulated, or rather may be understood, that no charge shall be brought by the United States against Spain, for losses sustained from the interruption of the deposite at New Orleans.

The subjoined draught puts into form and into detail the arrangement to which the President authorizes you to accede; relying on your best efforts to obtain better terms, and leaving to your discretion such modifications as may be found necessary, and as will not materially affect the proportion between the gains and the concessions by the United States.

Art. 1. § 1. Spain acknowledging and confirming to the United States the cession of Louisiana, in an extent eastwardly to the river Perdido, cedes to them forever all the territory remaining to her between the Mississippi, the Atlantic, and the Gulf of Mexico, together with all the islands annexed thereto, either whilst the Floridas belonged to Great Britain, or after they became provinces of Spain.

Or, if the article be unattainable in that form, Spain cedes to the United States forever all the territory, with the islands belonging thereto, which remain to her between the Mississippi, the Atlantic, and the Gulf of Mexico.

§ 2. Possession of the said territory shall be delivered to a person or persons authorized by the United States to receive the same, within —— days, or less, if practicable, after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. With the said territory shall be delivered all public property, excepting ships and military stores, as also all public archives belonging to the provinces comprehending the said territory.

§ 3. Within ninety days after delivery of possession, or sooner, if possible, the Spanish troops shall evacuate the territory hereby ceded; and if there should be any Spanish troops remaining within any part of the territory ceded by France to the United States, all such troops shall, without delay, be withdrawn.

§ 4. Spanish subjects within the ceded territory, who do not choose to become citizens of the United States, shall be allowed eighteen months to dispose of their real property, and to remove or dispose of their other property.

§ 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be entitled to the same incorporation into the United States, and to the same protection in their religion, their liberties, and their property, as were stipulated to the inhabitants of the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th April, 1803, with the French republic.

Art. 2. § 1. It is agreed that, for the term of —— years, no lands shall be granted, nor shall persons who may have settled since October 1, 1800, on lands not granted prior thereto, be permitted to continue within the space defined by the following limits, to wit: by a limit consisting on one side of the river Sabine, or Mexicano, from the sea to its source; thence, a straight line to the confluence of the rivers Osages and Missouri; and by a limit on the other side, consisting of the river Colorado, (or some other river emptying into the bay of St. Bernard,) from its mouth to its source; thence a straight line, to the most southwestwardly source of the Red river, with such deflections, however, as will head all the waters of that river; thence, along the ridge of the highlands which divide the waters belonging to the Missouri and the Mississippi from those belonging to the Rio Bravo, to the latitude of the northernmost source of that river; and thence, a meridian to the northern boundary of Louisiana.

§ 2. Such of the settlements within the foregoing limits, not prohibited by article 2, section 1, as were not under the authority of the Government of Louisiana, shall continue under the authority of Spain. Such as were under that authority shall be under the authority of the United States. But the parties agree that they will respectively offer reasonable inducements, without being obliged to use force, to all such settlers to retire from the space above limited, and establish themselves elsewhere.

§ 3. The Indian tribes within the said limits shall not be considered as subject to, or exclusively connected with, either party. Citizens of the United States and Spanish subjects shall be equally free to trade with them, and to sojourn among them, as far as may be necessary for that purpose; and each of the parties agrees to restrain, by all proper and requisite means, its respective citizens and subjects from exciting the Indians, whether within or without the said limits, from committing hostilities or aggressions of any sort on the subjects or citizens of the other party. The parties agree, moreover, each of them, in all public transactions and communications with Indians, to promote in them a disposition to live in peace and friendship with the other party.

§ 4. It shall be free for Indians now within the territories of either of the parties to remove to, and settle within, the said limits, without restraint from the other party; and either party may promote such a change of settlement by Indians within its territories; taking due care not to make it an occasion of war among the Indians, or of animosities in any of them against the other party.

§ 5. The United States may establish garrisons sufficient, as security against the Indians, and all trading houses, at any places within the said limits, where garrisons existed at any time under the Spanish Government of Louisiana. And Spain may continue garrisons, for the like purpose, at any places where she had them at the date of her cession to France, and establish trading houses thereat. Either party may also cause or permit any part of the country within the said limits to be explored and surveyed, with a view to commerce or science.

§ 6. It shall be free for either of the parties to march troops within the said limits against Indians at war with them, and for the purpose of driving or keeping out invaders or intruders.

Art. 3. It is agreed that, within —— years previous to the expiration of the aforesaid term of —— years, due provision shall be made for amicably adjusting and tracing the boundary between the territories of the United States westward of the Mississippi, and the territories of His Catholic Majesty; which boundary shall then be established according to the true and just extent of Louisiana, as ceded by Spain to France, and by France to the United States; uninfluenced, in the smallest degree, or in any manner whatever, by the delay, or by any arrangement or circumstance contained in or resulting from this convention.

Art. 4. Whereas, by the sixth article of the convention signed at Madrid, on the 11th day of August, 1802, it is provided, that, as it had not been possible for the plenipotentiaries of the two Powers to agree upon a mode by which the Board of Commissioners to be organized in virtue of the same should arbitrate the claims originating from the excesses of foreign cruisers, agents, consuls, or tribunals in their respective territories, which might be imputable to their two Governments, &c; and whereas, such explanations have been had upon the subject of the article aforesaid as have led to an accord; it is therefore agreed that the Board of Commissioners to be organized, as aforesaid, shall have power, for the space of eighteen months, from the exchange of ratifications hereof, to hear and determine, in the manner provided as to other claims in the said convention, all manner of claims of the citizens and subjects of either party, for excesses committed, or to be committed, by foreign cruisers, agents, consuls, or tribunals, in their respective territories, which may be imputable to either Government, according to the principles of justice, the law of nations, or the treaties between the two Powers; and also all other excesses committed, or to be committed, by officers or individuals of either nation, contrary to justice, equity, the law of nations, or the existing treaties, and for which the claimants may have a right to demand compensation.

ART. 5. It is further agreed, that the respective Governments will pay the sums awarded by the said commissioners under this convention, and also those which have been or may be awarded under that of the 11th of August, 1802, in manner following:

The Government of the United States will pay all such sums, not exceeding, in all, —— dollars, which may be awarded as compensation to citizens of the United States from His Catholic Majesty, in three equal annual instalments, at the city of Washington; the first instalment to be paid in eighteen months after the exchange of the ratifications hereof, or, in case they shall not be so paid, they shall bear an interest of six per cent. per annum from the time when they become due, until they are actually discharged; and in case the aggregate of the said sums should not amount to the said sum of —— dollars, the United States will pay to His Catholic Majesty, within one year after the final liquidation of the claims cognizable by the said Board, at the city of Washington, so much as the said aggregate may fall short of the sum above mentioned; but, on the other hand, if the whole amount of the sums awarded to citizens of the United States should exceed the said sum of —— dollars, His Catholic Majesty shall pay the surplus, without deduction, to such of the claimants, and at such times and places, as the said commissioners shall appoint.

The Government of the United States will also pay, without deduction, at the city of Washington, all such sums as may be awarded against them by the said commissioners for compensation due to Spanish subjects, at such times as shall be appointed in the awards respectively.

This convention shall be ratified within —— days after the signing thereof, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within —— days after the ratification by the United States, at the city of Washington.

Observations.

The first form of article 1, § 1, is preferred, because it explicitly recognises the right of the United States under the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and of April 30, 1803, to the river Perdido, which is constructively provided for only in the second form. It is indispensable that the United States be not precluded from such a construction, first, because they consider the right as well founded; secondly, and principally, because it is known that a great proportion of the most valuable lands between the Mississippi and the Perdido have been granted by Spanish officers since the cession was made by Spain. These illicit speculations cannot otherwise be frustrated than by considering the territory as included in the cession made by Spain, and thereby making void all Spanish grants of subsequent date.

It is represented that these grants have been extended, not only to citizens of the United States, but to others whose interest now lies in supporting the claim of Spain to that part of Louisiana, in opposition to that of the United States. It is conjectured that M. Laussat himself has entered into these speculations, and that he felt their influence in the declaration made confidently to our commissioners at New Orleans, that no part of West Florida was included in Louisiana.

In supporting the extent of Louisiana to the Perdido, you will find materials for your use in the extract above referred to, and the other documents annexed, to which you will add the result of your own reflections and researches. The secret treaty between France and Spain, ceding Louisiana west of the Mississippi to Spain, and which has never been printed, may doubtless be obtained at Paris, if not at Madrid, and may be of use in the discussion. From the references in the French orders of 1764, for the delivery of the province, it is presumed to be among the archives at New Orleans; and Governor Claiborne has been requested to send a copy of it: but it may not be received in time to be forwarded for your use. In an English work, "the Life of Chatham," printed in 1793, for J. S. Gordon, London, No. 166, Fleet street, I find a memorial referred to, but not there printed, with the other negotiations preceding the peace of 1762-3, expressly on the subjects of the limits of Louisiana, and, as sufficiently appears, with a view to give the province its extent to the Perdido. You will perhaps be able to procure in London or Paris a sight of this document: it probably contains most of the proofs applicable to the question, and will be the more important as proceeding from France; it will strengthen our lien on her seconding our construction of the treaty. The memorial will be the more important still, if it should be found to trace the western limits also of Louisiana, and to give it a corresponding extent on that side. In page 416 and sequel of Vol. I, you will see the fact established that the Floridas, including the French part, were ceded to Great Britain as the price for the restoration of Cuba, and that, consequently, the French part now claimed by the United States was a cession purely for the benefit of Spain.

The reasons, beyond the advantages held out in the arrangement itself, which may be addressed to Spain, as prompting a cession of her remaining territory eastward of the Perdido, will be found in the remarks in the extract aforesaid, in the instructions to Mr. Pinckney and yourself of the 17th day of February last, and in those which have from time to time been given to Mr. Pinckney. The Spanish Government cannot but be sensible that the expense of retaining any part of that territory must now more than ever exceed any returns of profit; that, being now more than ever indefensible, it must the more invite hostile expeditions against it from European enemies; and that, whilst in her hands, it must be a constant source of danger to harmony with the United States.

The arrangement proposed in article 2d supposes that Louisiana has a very great extent westwardly, and that the policy of Spain will set much value on an interval of desert between her settlements and those of the United States.

In one of the papers now transmitted, you will see the grounds on which our claim may be extended even to Rio Bravo. By whatever river emptying into the Gulf eastward of that Spain may with any plausibility commence the western boundary of Louisiana, or however continue it thence to its northern limit, she cannot view the arrangement in any other light than that of a liberal concession on the part of the United States, to be balanced by an equivalent concession on her part. The limit to the interval on our side is to be considered as the ultimatum, and, consequently, not to be yielded without due efforts to fix a limit more distant from the Mississippi. It is highly important, also, or rather indispensable, that the limit on the Spanish side should not be varied in any manner that will open for Spanish occupancy any part of the waters connected with the Missouri or Mississippi. The range of highlands separating these waters from those of the Rio Bravo, and other waters running westward, presents itself so naturally for the occasion, that you will be able to press it with peculiar force.

To enable you the better to understand the delineations contained in this article, and any others which may be brought into discussion, I forward herewith copies of two maps, and refer you to two others, viz. that of Danville, which you will find either at London or Paris, and, if no where else, in Postlewait's Directory, and a map by Mr. —— in 1768, referred to in one of those forwarded. The latter you will doubtless be able to procure at Madrid. The blank for the term of years is not to be filled with more than —— years, nor with that number, if a shorter term can be substituted.

The fourth and fifth articles relate to claims against Spain, not provided for by the convention already entered into, and the payment to be assured by the United States. For the reasoning in support of the claims founded on wrongs, proceeding from other than Spanish subjects, I refer you to the letters and instructions to Mr. Pinckney; your communications with him will also furnish the grounds on which the claims resulting from injuries done to our citizens in the Spanish colonies are to be maintained. The reasonableness of a residuary provision for all just claims is implied by the concurrence of Spain in establishing a Board of Commissioners for the cases already submitted to it.

You will not fail to urge on the Spanish Government the sixth article of the treaty of 1795, as particularly applicable to cases where other than Spanish subjects have committed spoliations on our vessels and effects within the extent of Spanish jurisdiction, by sea or by land. To justice and the law of nations, this adds the force of a positive stipulation, which cannot be repelled without proving, what cannot be proved, that the Spanish Government used all the means in its power to protect and defend the rights of our citizens; and which cannot be resisted, without pleading, what self-respect ought not to permit to be pleaded, that the sovereignty of His Catholic Majesty was under duress from a foreign Power within his own dominions.

The sum of money to be paid by the United States is, in no event, to exceed two millions of dollars, in cash, at the Treasury of the United States, not in public stock, and is to be applied towards the discharge of awards to our citizens; and it is hoped that a much smaller sum will be found sufficient.

If Spain should inflexibly refuse to cede the territory eastward of the Perdido, no money is to be stipulated. If she should refuse also to relinquish the territory westward of that river, no arrangement is to be made with respect to the territory westward of the Mississippi; and you will limit your negotiations to the claim of redress for the cases of spoliation above described.

If Spain should yield on the subject of the territory westward of the Perdido, and particularly if a comprehensive provision for the claims should be combined therewith, you may admit an arrangement westward of the Mississippi, on the principle of that proposed, with modifications, however, if attainable, varying the degree of concession, on the part of the United States, according to the degree in which Spain may concur in a satisfactory provision for the cases of the territory westward of the Perdido, and of the claims of indemnification.

The United States having sustained a very extensive though indefinite loss, by the unlawful suspension of their right of deposite at New Orleans, and the Spanish Government having admitted the injury by restoring the deposite, it will be fair to avail yourself of this claim in your negotiations, and to let Spain understand that, if no accommodation should result from them, it will remain in force against her.

The term of years, during which the interval between the settlements of the United States and of Spain are to be prohibited, is a consideration of great importance. A term which may appear a moment to a nation stationary, or slowly advancing in its population, will appear an age to a people doubling its population in little more than twenty years, and, consequently, capable in that time of covering with an equal settlement double the territory actually settled. This reflection will suggest the expediency of abridging the continuance of the prohibition as much as the main objects in view will permit. Twenty years are a limit not to be exceeded. Fifteen, or even ten, if the space between the Mississippi and the interval territory be not enlarged, seem to be as much as Spain can reasonably expect. She cannot but be sensible, and you will make use of the idea if you find it prudent so to do, that, before a very long time will elapse, the pressure of our growing population, with events which time does not fail to produce, but are not foreseen, will supersede any arrangements which may now be stipulated, and, consequently, that it will be most prudent to limit them to a period susceptible of some certain calculations.

No final cession is to be made to Spain of any part of the territory on this side of the Rio Bravo, but in the event of a cession to the United States of the territory east of the Perdido; and, in that event, in case of absolute necessity only, and to an extent that will not deprive the United States of any of the waters running into the Missouri or the Mississippi, or of the other waters emptying into the Gulf of Mexico between the Mississippi and the river Colorado, emptying into the bay of St. Bernard.

No guaranty of the Spanish possessions is to be admissible.

This letter is intended for Mr. Pinckney as well as yourself, and as containing the instructions by which the execution of your joint commission is to be guided.

APRIL 18.

The President being absent, and it being most proper to wait his return, which may be shortly expected, before any final instructions be given as to your immediate destination, after closing your mission to Spain, which may be shortened or spun out according to circumstances, I recommend that you do not actually leave London until you hear again from me. The moment the President arrives I will communicate to you his views by multiplied conveyances, that you may receive them with as little delay as possible. In the mean time, you will make such preparations as will enable you to depart at a short notice.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 8, 1804.

GENTLEMEN:

Since the instructions given you on the 15th of April last, further views have been obtained with respect to the interior of Louisiana, and the value which Spain will probably put on such a limitation of our settlements beyond the Mississippi as will keep them for some time at a distance from hers. The President has accordingly become the more anxious that, in the adjustment authorized by those instructions, the terms may be made favorable to the United States. He does not, indeed, absolutely restrain you from yielding to the ultimatum therein fixed, in case it be required by the inflexibility of the Spanish Government, and particularly by the posture and prospect of affairs in Europe; but he is not a little averse to the occlusion, for a very long period, of a very wide space of territory westward of the Mississippi, and equally so to a perpetual relinquishment of any territory whatever eastward of the Rio Bravo. If this river could be made the limit to the Spanish settlements, and the Rio Colorado the limit to which those of the United States may be extended; and if a line northwest or west from the source of whatever river may be taken for the limit of our settlements could be substituted for the ultimatum line running from the source of the Sabine to the junction of the Osages with the Missouri, and thence, northward, parallel with the Mississippi, the interval to be unsettled for a term of years would be defined in a manner peculiarly satisfactory. The degree, however, in which you are to insist on these meliorations of the arrangement, must be regulated by your discretion, and by the effect which the probable course of events will have on the temper and policy of Spain. Should she be engaged in the war, or manifestly threatened with that situation, she cannot fail to be the more anxious for a solid accommodation on all points with the United States; and the more willing to yield, for that purpose, to terms, which, however proper in themselves, might otherwise be rejected by her pride and misapplied jealousy. According to the latest accounts from Great Britain, a revolution in the ministry, if not a change on the throne, was daily expected; and, from either of those events, an extension of the war to Spain, if not precluded by the less probable event of a speedy peace with France, would be a very natural consequence. It is to be understood, that a perpetual relinquishment of the territory between the Rio Bravo and Colorado is not to be made, nor the sum of —— dollars paid without the entire cession of the Floridas; nor any money paid in consideration of the acknowledgment by Spain of our title to the territory between the Iberville and the Perdido. But a proportional sum out of the —— dollars may be stipulated for a partial cession of territory eastward of the Perdido. If neither the whole nor part of East Florida can be obtained, it is of importance that the United States should own the territory as far as the Appalachicola, and have a common, if not exclusive right to navigate that stream. I must repeat that great care is to be taken that the relinquishment by Spain of the territories westward of the Perdido be so expressed as to give to the relinquishment of the Spanish title the date of the treaty of St. Ildefonso. The reason for this was before explained, and is strengthened by recent information, as you will find by the annexed extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne. Other proofs might be added. In any further cession of territory, it may be well so to define it, as to guard as much as possible against grants irregular or incomplete, or made by Spanish officers in contemplation of such a cession.

On entering into conferences with the Spanish ministry, you will propose and press, in the strongest manner, an agreement that neither Spain nor the United States shall, during the negotiation, strengthen their situation in the territory between the Iberville and the Perdido, and that the navigation of the Mobile shall not be interrupted. An immediate order from the Spanish Government to this effect may be represented as of the greatest importance to the good understanding between the two countries; and that the forbearance of the United States thus long is a striking proof of their sincere desire to maintain it. If such an order should be declined, you will not fail to transmit the earliest information of it, as well as to keep up such representations to that Government on the subject, as will impress it with the tendency of so unreasonable and unfriendly a proceeding to drive the United States into arrangements for balancing the military force of Spain in that quarter, and for exerting their right of navigation through the Mobile. This navigation has become important, or rather essential; and a refusal of Spain to acquiesce in it must commit the peace of the two nations to the greatest hazard. The posture of things there is already extremely delicate, and calls for the most exemplary moderation and liberality in both the Governments. As a proof of it, I enclose a correspondence between Governor Claiborne and the Spanish Government at Pensacola, on the same subject as that of mine with the Marquis de Yrujo, already transmitted to you.

I have the honor, &c &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE and CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esqrs.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 26, 1804.

SIR:

The turn which our affairs have taken at Madrid renders it expedient, in the judgment of the President, that you should proceed thither without delay, in execution of the instructions heretofore given, with such alterations and additions as are contained in this letter. You will, of course, make such communications to the British Government on your departure, as will guard your mission against injurious misconstructions; and at Paris, on your route, you will avail yourself of all the opportunities there for ascertaining and turning to just account the dispositions of the French Government with respect to the questions depending between the United States and Spain.

As Mr. Pinckney may have left Madrid, and, if not, is on a footing unfavorable for cordial negotiations with the Spanish ministry, I enclose herewith a new letter of credence and commission, enabling you singly to execute the trust. Should a successor to Mr. Pinckney be appointed, and arrive in time, it will be decided by the President how far he will be associated in the business.

For a view of the circumstances which call for your presence at Madrid, I refer you to the late correspondence here with the Marquis de Yrujo, of which a copy is annexed, and to that with Mr. Pinckney, and to his with Mr. Cevallos, which his files will furnish you. I add also a letter of this date from the Department of State to Mr. Pinckney.

Notwithstanding the rumor which appears to have spread in Europe of an impending rupture between Spain and the United States, there is nothing in the avowed sentiments of the Spanish Government, and certainly nothing in the sound policy of Spain, to justify an inference that she wishes to be no longer at peace with us. It may reasonably be expected, therefore, that you will meet with a friendly reception. In return, you are authorized by the President to give every proper assurance of the desire of the United States to maintain the harmony and to improve the confidence between the two nations; and, with this view, to hasten, by frank elucidations and equitable accommodations, a removal of every source from which discord might arise. You will not fail, at the same time, to recollect, in conveying these amicable sentiments, the propriety of leaving the Spanish Government under an impression that they flow neither from a fear of the Spanish Power, nor a belief that Spain sets little value on a continuance of peace with us. If the United States have a deep interest in avoiding war, they know that Spain cannot feel less of interest in avoiding it, and is in no condition, therefore, to extort sacrifices, or to risk the consequences of such an experiment.

If no exchange of ratifications of the convention of August 11, 1802, should have preceded your arrival at Madrid, the President has authorized you to make the exchange; but it is on the expectation that the Spanish ratification will be absolutely unqualified. It must be not only without conditions, but without protestandos or declarations of any sort. Rather than admit them, it is thought better to let the convention drop altogether, and to incorporate its provisions with those of a similar kind, making part of the general accommodation with which you are charged. Indeed, if there be a prospect of effecting this accommodation without delay, there may be an advantage in laying aside the convention of 1802, as there will be an opportunity of giving to some of its articles both more precision and more comprehension. You will find some hints on this subject in the letters heretofore written to Mr. Pinckney, and may derive others from similar provisions in former conventions.

The spoliations by French citizens chargeable on Spanish responsibility will be an important topic in your negotiations, whether the convention of 1802 be separately carried into effect, or be consolidated with a new one.

It is clear, as has been distinctly and repeatedly stated in the instructions given to Mr. Pinckney, that where the capturing vessels were equipped in Spanish ports, or the prizes made or condemned within Spanish jurisdiction, Spain is answerable for them to the United States. This, as a general principle, has not been denied. But two pleas are offered, as rendering the principle inapplicable to the claims of our citizens. One is, that the circumstances in which Spain was placed disabled her from controlling the wrongs done by French citizens; the other, that the convention between the United States and France having relinquished the claim of indemnities against the latter, Spain became thereby absolved also; inasmuch as the relinquishment to France would otherwise be so far frustrated by her obligation to satisfy Spain for the indemnities paid by her to the United States.

The first plea alone was advanced in the early stages of the discussion. The second was pretty certainly suggested by the Spanish minister here, who, for that reason, may be the more anxious to see it prevail; and it has been abetted by the rescripts of several American lawyers, obtained, doubtless, by the same minister, on a hypothetical case, so stated as to educe the desired opinion.

With respect to the first plea, it is too little consistent with the honor of Spain to be persevered in, and has been but feebly urged since the second occurred. It would require, besides, from Spain, satisfactory proof that she made every reasonable effort to maintain her own authority against the coercive intrusion of that of France. No such proof has been offered or attempted. In truth, no serious effort appears to have been made; and it may fairly be presumed that the pliability of Spain was either the result of a positive understanding with France, or a compliance offered as a price for some equivalent advantage.

With respect to the second plea, so far as it respects the opinion of the lawyers, I refer, for the light in which it ought to be regarded, to the observations made in my letter of ——— to Mr. Pinckney.

In its merits, the plea is equally unsustainable. In the first place, some of the French citizens, whose irregularities are charged on Spain, were private citizens, having no commissions from France, in whose proceedings France cannot be supposed to have taken any interest, and for which, therefore, she might justly refuse to be answerable. In the next place, others of the wrong-doers, though once commissioned by France, may at the time have been without commissions, or have retained dead commissions only. For these, also, as in fact private citizens, France may refuse to be answerable. Again, in cases where the captures stated to have been numerous, being made within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain, were controllable by Spain, and probably not patronized by France, no sufficient ground appears on which France could be made chargeable.

The responsibility of Spain in this last case is the more direct and positive, as she is bound, by the sixth article of the treaty of October, 1795, to use all her efforts to recover and restore to the right owners their vessels and effects, which may have been taken within the extent of her jurisdiction by sea or land, whether they are at war or not with the Power whose subjects have taken possession of the said effects.

Lastly, therefore, the cases for which France is eventually liable, because presumably a party to them, are those only in which her commissioned cruisers on the high seas were the captors, and her agents in the Spanish ports the instruments of condemnation: the several other cases, with such as may have happened between the convention with France of September 30, 1801, and that with Spain of August 11, 1802, being as unsustainable against France, not with the principle on which the Spanish plea is founded.

As to this last class of cases, proceeding from French officers and French agents, as well as every other which can be traced to the sanction and support of France, it is certain that eventual resort may be had to France for indemnification.

But it is no less clear that this eventual remedy does not interfere with the right of the United States to resort in the first instance to Spain, as in the first instance, and in the ordinary course, responsible for the injuries committed. French citizens, like all other aliens within Spanish jurisdiction, are, for the time and place, Spanish subjects. As such they are regarded by Spain herself; as such they are regarded by other nations; and as such Spain is answerable for their conduct to other nations in the same manner as she is answerable for that of her permanent subjects.

Could it be shown, therefore, that France had been released from her responsibility, it would not follow that the release of Spain was involved in that of France. France would only have been released from her eventual responsibility, (where it even existed,) whilst Spain would have remained under her immediate responsibility. Both may be considered as bound to indemnify the United States; Spain as the primary, France as the secondary debtor; Spain as the principal, France as a surety; and the release of France, consequently, is no more releasing Spain, than the release of a surety would release the principal debtor. This view of the subject derives force from the consideration that the United States have, from the beginning, addressed their claims to Spain as primarily and principally bound to satisfy them.

But to cut up this plea by the roots, it may be affirmed that no such release has been given by the United States to France. The convention, from which the plea is derived, expressly binds France, in the third article, to indemnification for all captures which might be subsequent to the date of the instrument, and also in cases where no definitive condemnation had, at that date, taken place. Now, the condemnations by French agents in Spanish ports are neither definitive condemnations, nor any legal condemnations at all. The degree of authority and forms of proceeding meant by France to be intrusted to her commercial agents in foreign countries, appear to have been different at different times; and it may deserve inquiry what they were at the respective dates of the cases in question. By a law of the republic of October, 1795, it would seem that the authority was first granted, and in an unconditional form. By a law of their Consular Government, however, of 8 Germinal, year 8, the same authority was granted, with the following modification: "Et dans le cas où le présent règlement pourra recevoir son exécution, ils rempliront toutes les fonctions dont il charge l'officier d'administration des ports de la république, en se faisant assister de deux assesseurs, choisis, s'il est possible, parmi les citoyens François immatriculés et établis dans le lieu de la résidence de ces commissaires." The proviso implied by the expression "et dans le cas où le présent règlement pourra recevoir son exécution," combined with the preceding reference to treaties, &c. will show that the authority was not to be exercised without the consent of the foreign country where the trial was to be had. And by a Spanish regulation in 1799, referred to, and enclosed in my letter to Mr. Pinckney of 8th March, 1803, it is expressly declared, that the jurisdiction of the French agents in Spanish ports was not admitted by the Spanish Government. It will deserve inquiry, also, in what light France herself may view the condemnations assumed by her agents in Spanish ports. From some information lately received from Mr. Skipwith, it may be inferred that they are not classed with those relinquished to her by the United States, and, if not mere nullities, are at least within the exceptions to the relinquishment stated in the third article of the convention of 1801; and, consequently, were it possible for Spain to prove the duress she alleges, would be eventually chargeable on France, according to her own view of the subject, so far as her judicial regulations may have been pursued by the individual sufferers.

In fine, the proceedings in question were either valid or not valid. If not valid, the release of France cannot be applicable to them, and the plea of Spain falls. If valid, the validity must proceed from the sanction given to them by Spain herself, since, without that sanction, the French authority could not operate within the sovereignty of Spain; and with that sanction, the proceedings would be virtually the acts of Spain, and the more undeniably chargeable to her account.

Thus, in every view of the subject, Spain will find it impossible to evade the obligation to include, in a just and honorable settlement with the United States, the French spoliations charged on her, as well as those committed by Spanish subjects.

Still her pride may adhere to objections which have been so pertinaciously, though with such little reason, urged by her. To spare this, her retreat may be covered by general expressions confounding the French with the other spoliations; or it may, if necessary, be still more effectually spared by a tacit relinquishment, at the same time, on the part of the United States, of the indemnities for the interruption of the deposite at New Orleans, which, being an express violation of treaty, forms a claim against Spain which she cannot controvert, and of which the Government of the United States has never lost sight. In such a relinquishment, it will be desirable, if practicable, to except such of the few claims for losses sustained by individuals, as can be properly specified and verified; limiting, thereby, the relinquishment to the general injury done to the body of the people, by the unlawful obstruction of their commerce. A reparation for this injury is clearly due to the American nation; and Spain has no reason to expect that it will be abandoned without a valuable consideration of some kind or other.

For your guide in your general negotiations, you will take the instructions heretofore addressed jointly to Mr. Pinckney and yourself; with one alteration, however, which is authorized by the President. In case the Spanish Government shall refuse to cede the territory eastward of the Perdido, and shall require, as indispensable to an acknowledgment of our title to the territory westward of that river, an acknowledgment on our part, that in ultimately establishing the western boundary of Louisiana, the pretensions of the United States shall not go beyond the proposed western limit to the interval of desert, to wit, the river Colorado, a line thence to the source of Red river, thence, along the highlands, &c., you are authorized, after reasonable endeavors otherwise to effect your object, to acquiesce in the acknowledgment so required.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 4, 1805.

I have just received your letter of the 2d of February, and one of the same date, signed by Mr. Pinckney also, with the communications attached to them. Those of the preceding dates, of the 27th November, 16th December, and 19th January, had been previously received.

Observing that, in the project delivered to the Spanish Government, you have omitted the provision contained in the plan for a general accommodation, transmitted in my letter of April 15, 1804, for claims subsequent to the date of the convention of August, 1802, I lose no time in referring you to that letter, and to another of the 26th of October following, in which the course to be pursued is marked out, and in reminding you of the great importance of not losing sight of that class of claims, which are of great amount, are daily increasing, and which ought to be embraced to as late a date as possible. Should your negotiations, therefore, be still open, I recommend this subject to your particular attention. Should the negotiations have been successfully closed, it will be proper for you to procure, if it can be done, a supplemental article for the purpose. If this cannot be done, or if the negotiations should have failed, the instructions adapted to that state of things will be given to Mr. Bowdoin, as soon as it shall be known here.

I recommend, in like manner, to your attention, the remarks contained in my letter of March 22, 1803, to Mr. Pinckney, on the modifications proper to be given to the text of a convention; and the remark in my letter of October 26, 1804, relative to the Spanish garrison, which alone may be permitted to continue.

With high consideration, &c. JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE, Esq. Madrid.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 23, 1805.

SIR: I have duly received the several communications transmitted by Mr. Pinckney and yourself, under date of the 1st March last. I have also received from General Armstrong copies of his letters to you of the 12th and 18th of March. The passages in this last, in cipher, having not been copied into that used by this Department with General Armstrong, remain locked up, but probably do not affect the general tenor of this letter.

From these communications, it appears that France has arranged herself on the side of Spain, in such a manner that Spain will neither be disposed nor be permitted to bend to our claims, either with respect to West Florida or the French spoliations. What part France may take in relation to the western boundary of Louisiana seems not to have been disclosed. From the silence on that point, in Talleyrand's note of November 8th, in answer to yours, in which the claim of the United States to the Rio Bravo is expressly asserted, and from the confidential acknowledgment of that boundary by M. Laussat to Governor Claiborne and General Wilkinson, it might be expected that, on this important point, France would side with us against Spain. Should this be the case, it is hoped, notwithstanding the unfavorable posture of the negotiation, that there will be room to give it some such result as was contemplated. But there is so little reliance to be placed on the temper and views of France, as lately developed, that a failure of your efforts ought to be anticipated. The alternative presented by this event is that of war, or a state of things guarding against war for the present, and leaving in vigor our claims to be hereafter effectuated. Against war, if to be safely and honorably avoided, the considerations are obvious and powerful. As it is a question which belongs to Congress, not to the Executive, that consideration alone forbids any step, on the part of the latter, which would commit the nation, and so far take from the Legislature the free exercise of its power. And it may be fairly presumed, considering the daily increase of our faculties for a successful assertion of our rights by force, that neither the nation nor its representatives would prefer an instant resort to arms to a state of things which would avoid it, without hazarding our rights or our reputation. The two essential articles in such a state of things are, 1st, A forbearance on the part of Spain, as well as of the United States, to augment their settlements, or to strengthen in any manner their military establishments within the controverted limits; 2dly, Not to obstruct the free communication from our territories, through the Mobile and other rivers mouthing in the Gulf of Mexico, or through the Mobile at least.

In the first of these articles must be included a forbearance on the part of Spain to introduce slaves, as well as free persons, not only as in one sense augmenting her settlements, but as facilitating a clandestine introduction of them, already complained of, into the territories of the United States. It can hardly be supposed that Spain will object to this article, even with such an explanation of it; and if the language of the French minister here be any test of the sentiments of his Government, it may be expected that France will favor the arrangement. This minister has repeatedly and strongly declared that, until all questions concerning the boundary of Louisiana should be adjusted, a statu quo was the natural and just policy to be observed.

The second article is, perhaps, not less essential as a precaution for maintaining peace. Every moment of delay threatens collisions which lead to war. The necessity of that channel for the exports and imports of the increasing settlements on the Mobile, above the Florida limit, and for conveying our public stores to the military stations in that quarter, prove at once the reasonableness of the demand and its close connexion with the maintenance of peace. You will find, by the enclosed correspondence between Governor Claiborne and the Marquis de Casa Calvo, that the attention of the latter has been drawn to the subject, and that it will have been thence transmitted to the Spanish Government. It is proper for you to know that the existing regulations of the United States permit the settlements in the district of Baton Rouge, on the Mississippi, to navigate this river, with the exception only as to the introduction of slaves and armed vessels; exceptions having reference to the very objects of the regulations now in question.

I forbear to repeat the grounds on which the right of the United States to the use of those rivers is to be placed. They are already in the archives of the legation at Madrid. More effect, however, is to be expected from the necessity which a refusal of the navigation will impose on the United States to enforce their claim, than from any appeal to the principles which support it; and this necessity must be permitted to impress itself fully on the Spanish councils. The influence which France will have in this instance, as in all others, will make it worth while to learn the doctrine she has maintained with respect to the navigation of waters flowing through different jurisdictions. It is pretty certain that she has been led to assert ours, in relation to the Scheldt, and probably to the Rhine, and perhaps other rivers.

The silence of your communications with respect to the instruction in my letter of July 8th, 1804, to make the subject of the present a part of your first conference with the Spanish Government, leaves it uncertain what particular disposition may have been manifested, and whether any orders, such as were required, have been transmitted. The inference that we draw is, that you were either induced to decline pressing them, or that the requisition did not succeed. Whatever may have been the case, you will consider it as a charge from the President, in the event pre-supposed, of a failure in your general negotiation, to pursue, without delay, the course herein prescribed. Should you fail in this also, you will lose no time in transmitting the result, taking care not to commit the Government of the United States in any respect, nor to alarm Spain into hostile measures or preparations further than may be inevitable. Should you succeed in what is here proposed, you will, in that case, also give the earliest notice, without precluding the United States from any course not inconsistent with the temporary arrangement formed, and leaving Spain under the impression that the arrangement will probably guaranty a continuance of peace.

In the instructions of October 26th, 1804, it was left discretionary to accept a ratification of the convention of August, 1802, or to incorporate it with the general one committed to your negotiation, with an intimation that it might be best to do the latter, in case but little delay in giving effect to the convention of 1802 should be thereby incurred. The delay actually incurred must have led you to take the first course, if left to your option by Spain. From the spirit, however, of Mr. Cevallos's observations in his letter of——, there is little probability that a ratification would be given, unshackled by conditions, which you were instructed to reject. It only remains now, therefore, to observe to you, that those conditions continue to be regarded by the President as absolutely inadmissible. The ratification, as already signified to you, is not to be accepted with any condition or qualification whatever, beyond such an arrangement as is explained in the letter of October 15, 1804, of which an extract is repeated from the Department of State to the Marquis de Yrujo, for affording a moderate time to Spanish subjects to produce their claims. If a ratification, thus unshackled, be within your option, the President deems it proper that you should accept and transmit it, although none of the other objects committed to you should have been attained. Besides the pledge which a partial accommodation may prove for a more comprehensive adjustment, it is to be considered that the provision therein made for a considerable portion of our citizens who are claimants, is due both to their interests and to the sanction given to it by the Senate, and that the manner in which the sixth article describes the suspended claims, is favorable to the principle on which they are founded.

This letter will be so addressed, that it may be opened by Mr. Bowdoin, in case of your departure previous to his arrival, or by Mr. Ewing, in case of his reaching Madrid before Mr. Bowdoin: and either of these gentlemen is hereby authorized, in pursuance of the instructions here given relative to the convention of August, 1802, to arrange and accept its ratification. I have the honor, &c. &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE, Esq.

V. Letter from Mr. Monroe to M. Talleyrand; a letter from M. Talleyrand to Mr. Armstrong; and a letter from Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Monroe.

Mr. Monroe to M. Talleyrand.

PARIS, November 8, 1804.

SIR:

Before the conclusion of the late treaty between the United States and France, your excellency will recollect that it was an object of the President to acquire of Spain, by amicable arrangement, Florida; it being that portion of her territory which she held eastward of the Mississippi. It was also his object, after the conclusion of that treaty, not that it was pressed by such imperious considerations as before, but that, as it would contribute to remove all cause of uneasiness and jealousy between the two Powers, they might adopt and harmonize in future in such a system of policy as might secure to them peace, and give additional protection to their possessions in that quarter, especially to those of Spain. In the conferences which produced the treaty above mentioned, the good offices of His Imperial Majesty were engaged to the United States in any negotiation which the President might commence with the Catholic King, for the acquisition of Florida. The same assurance was renewed after the conclusion of the treaty, though it was intimated that that was not a suitable time for the commencement of such a negotiation. It was, on that intimation, as your excellency will also recollect, at a moment when I was about to set out for Spain in pursuit of the object, (the then recent orders of the President permitting it,) that I postponed my journey thither, and took a different position. The proposed negotiation with Spain was, in consequence, and has since remained, suspended; and it is in obedience to late orders from my Government that I am now so far on my way to Madrid on that subject, and that Mr. Livingston has requested the good offices of the Emperor in support of it. It is proper here to remark, that, since the epoch referred to, the treaty then just concluded between the United States and France has been carried into effect, in its great points, with that scrupulous attention to good faith which does to both parties the highest honor. Their conduct in that transaction gives to each a pledge for the integrity which is to prevail in their future intercourse. I may be permitted to add, that, as I declined my visit to Spain at that epoch, the more readily to give an opportunity for the complete execution of that treaty, so, now that it is carried into effect, I undertake it with the greater pleasure, since it confirms me in the confidence, before entertained, of the support which would be given to it by His Imperial Majesty.

The President has been induced to adopt this measure at this time, by considerations the most urgent. As these are inseparably connected with the proposed negotiation, indeed, form, in part, the object of it, it is due to the friendship subsisting between our Governments, and to the candor which the President will never fail to observe in his transactions with the Emperor, to give you a distinct idea of them. They will, I doubt not, satisfy you that the President has heretofore shown a sincere desire to cultivate the friendship of the Catholic King, and that the attempt which he now makes to preserve that relation is a new and signal proof of that disposition.

Since the treaty between the United States and France, whereby Louisiana was ceded to the former, a question has arisen between those States and Spain, relative to the boundaries of the ceded territory. It is understood that the Government of Spain entertains an idea that that cession comprises only that portion of Louisiana which was ceded to it by France in 1762; that it does not comprise that portion also which was ceded by her, at the same time, to Great Britain, distinguished, while in her possession, by the name of West Florida. This pretension of the court of Spain cannot, it is presumed, be supported by even the color of an argument. Had that been the intention of the parties in the treaty of St. Ildefonso, it would have been easy to have provided for it. The idea was a simple one, which a few plain words would have expressed. But the language of the article referred to conveys a very different sentiment. We find in it nothing which countenances a presumption that the Emperor meant to retake from Spain only a portion of Louisiana, or to refer to it in a dismembered state. It was natural to suppose, in accepting a retrocession of that province from a Power possessed of the whole, that he would take it entire, such as it was when France possessed it. Accordingly, we find that the terms of the article making the cession are as full and explicit to that object as it was possible to use. It is not stipulated that Spain should cede to France that portion of Louisiana only which she had received from France, or that West Florida should be excepted from the cession. It is, on the contrary, stipulated that she shall cede it such as it was when France possessed it; that is, such as it was before it was dismembered by the cessions afterwards made to Spain by Great Britain; that she should cede it with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain; that is, entire, which it became by the treaty of 1783, whereby West Florida was ceded by Great Britain to Spain; such as it is according to subsequent treaties between Spain and other Powers: a stipulation which does honor to His Catholic Majesty, since it proves that, in making the cession to France, he intended to cede only what he had a right to cede; that he recollected the treaty which he had concluded with the United States in 1795, knew the extent of its obligations, and was resolved to execute them with good faith. Your excellency will receive, within, a paper containing an examination of the boundaries of Louisiana, which, it is presumed, proves incontestably the doctrine above advanced, as also that the river Perdido is the ancient, and, of course, present boundary of that province to the east, and the Rio Bravo to the west.

The United States have other causes of complaint against Spain, of a serious import. In the course of the last war many aggressions were committed, under the authority of the Government of Spain, but, as it is presumed, without its sanction, on the commerce of the United States. Her ships of war and privateers took many of their vessels in Europe and America, carried them into her ports, detained and condemned them, under pretexts which cannot be justified. The injury sustained by this proceeding was great and extensive, for which it is the duty of the President to obtain for the sufferers an adequate reparation. A convention was entered into at Madrid, about two years since, between the two Powers, which provided a partial remedy for these injuries. The great object, however, was left open for future arrangement. It was owing to that consideration, and to acknowledge that the principal cause of variance was unprovided for, that the negotiation was, in truth, unfinished; that neither Government took any interest in ratifying or executing that convention. The whole subject, therefore, now lies open for discussion, and it is very much desired to conclude it on such fair principles as may be satisfactory to His Catholic Majesty, while it enables the President to vindicate the character of his administration, in obtaining for American claimants the justice to which they are entitled.

The occlusion of the river Mississippi, about two years ago, contrary not only to the spirit but to the express stipulations of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain, was an act which exposed to essential injury the interest of the Western inhabitants of those States, while it could not be considered otherwise than as a high indignity to their Government. His Catholic Majesty did not hesitate to disavow the act, when complained of by the American minister at Madrid. This disavowal made some atonement to the violated honor of the Government, but no reparation for the injury which had been sustained by individuals. A reasonable, but adequate, reparation is still due on that account, and it is expected that His Catholic Majesty will see the justice and propriety of making it.

These circumstances have produced an interesting crisis in the political relation of the United States and Spain, which it is the sincere desire of the President to remove by fair and amicable arrangement. If the negotiation which is about to be commenced by his order does not terminate in that result, it will be owing altogether to the Government of Spain. The measure which is now adopted, the negotiation which is invited, is a convincing proof of the sincerity and good faith with which the President seeks to preserve the relations of friendship between the two Powers. In the pursuit of its objects, no unreasonable pretension is entertained, no unjust demand will be made. On the subject of boundaries, although the Congress, on a thorough conviction of its rights, authorized the taking immediate possession of Louisiana, according to its ancient limits, and, of course, to the river Perdido, to the east, yet the President, from motives of respect to the Catholic King, postponed the execution of the measure, to give time for amicable explanations with his Government, in full confidence that they will produce their desired effect. In respect to aggressions on our commerce, and other injuries, it cannot be doubted that a suitable indemnity will be made for them. The cession of Florida is a question which rests on different ground. The policy of that measure, and the conditions of it, in case the policy is admitted, are points to be decided by each Government for itself, from a view of its interest and other circumstances. Should the cession be made, and the other points be adjusted, there is no reason why the peace and harmony of the two nations should not be perpetual. There would remain no cause of jealousy between them, no point of collision. Possessed of ample territory to satisfy their growing population for ages to come, the United States would be left at liberty to pursue their interior arrangements without apprehending the interference of, or having the disposition to interfere with, their neighbors. Such a system of policy, on their part, would contribute, in a very eminent degree, to the security of the vast dominions of Spain to the south of us. To Spain, it is presumed that the territory is of but little importance. In itself, it is of none, as it is a barren tract. If she retains it, it must be as a port for troops, to be placed there in opposition to us; a measure which tends to provoke hostility and lead to war. The Havana is a port which answers more effectually every object which she could contemplate from this, while it is free from all the objections that are applicable to the latter. Being an island, it is less assailable by a foreign Power. Situated in the Gulf of Mexico, it furnishes the means of giving all the protection to her other possessions that she could desire, and, by uniting her whole force at one point, increasing her means of defence against attack, or of annoying her enemies in time of war. It is earnestly hoped that the Catholic King will take a dispassionate view of these circumstances, and of the relative situation of the two Powers, and meet the President in a suitable provision for their future friendship. Should he, however, be disposed to pursue a different policy, on him will the responsibility rest for the consequences.

The relation which has subsisted invariably between His Imperial Majesty and the Government which I have the honor to represent, has been of the most friendly character. It is on the knowledge of that fact, and the satisfactory evidence which it furnishes, that the Emperor takes an interest in the welfare of the United States; it is on the promise above adverted to, made on his part, to support with his good offices any negotiation which the President might commence with the court of Spain for the acquisition of Florida; as also on the firm belief that the attainment of that object, with the amicable adjustment of all subsisting differences between the United States and Spain, must be advantageous to France, that his good offices have been, and are now, requested in support of that negotiation.

My mission to Spain, being extraordinary, is also temporary. As soon as its objects are accomplished, it is my duty to return to London, which I shall do through this metropolis, when I hope to have the honor and pleasure of being presented again to His Imperial Majesty, and of acknowledging, in person, his friendly offices to my Government and country, in a transaction of high importance to its interests, which the President has thought fit to commit, in part, to my agency.

I beg your excellency to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

M. Talleyrand to General Armstrong.

PARIS, December 21, 1804.

SIR:

I had the honor, in Brumaire last, to inform Mr. Livingston that I would submit to the inspection of His Imperial Majesty the letters he addressed to me relative to the motives of Mr. Monroe's journey to Spain, and some discussions between the court of Madrid and the United States.

Among the observations made on this subject by Messrs. Livingston and Monroe, His Imperial Majesty has been obliged to give particular attention to those bearing on the discussions, of which the object is peculiarly interesting to the French Government. He has perceived that he could not have been a stranger to the examination of these discussions, since they grew out of the treaty by which France has ceded Louisiana to the United States; and His Majesty has thought that an explanation, made with that fidelity which characterizes him, on the eastern boundaries of the ceded territory, would put an end to the differences to which this cession has given rise.

France, in giving up Louisiana to the United States, transferred to them all the rights over that colony which she had acquired from Spain; she could not, nor did she wish to, cede any other; and, that no room might be left for doubt in this respect, she repeated, in her treaty of 30th April, 1803, the literal expressions of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, by which she had acquired that colony two years before.

Now it was stipulated, in her treaty of the year 1801, that the acquisition of Louisiana by France was a retrocession; that is to say, that Spain restored to France what she had received from her in 1762. At that period she had received the territory bounded on the east by the Mississippi, the river Iberville, the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain; the same day France ceded to England, by the preliminaries of peace, all the territory to the eastward. Of this Spain had received no part, and could, therefore, give back none to France.

All the territory lying to the eastward of the Mississippi and the river Iberville, and south of the 32d degree of north latitude, bears the name of Florida. It has been constantly designated in that way during the time that Spain held it; it bears the same name in the treaties of limits between Spain and the United States; and, in different notes of Mr. Livingston of a later date than the treaty of retrocession, in which the name of Louisiana is given to the territory on the west side of the Mississippi; of Florida to that on the east of it.

According to this designation, thus consecrated by time, and even prior to the period when Spain began to possess the whole territory between the 31st degree, the Mississippi, and the sea, this country ought, in good faith and justice, to be distinguished from Louisiana.

Your excellency knows that, before the preliminaries of 1762, confirmed by the treaty of 1763, the French possessions, situated near the Mississippi, extended as far from the east of this river, towards the Ohio and the Illinois, as in the quarters of the Mobile; and you must think it as unnatural, after all the changes of sovereignty which that part of America has undergone, to give the name of Louisiana to the district of Mobile, as to the territory more to the north, on the same bank of the river, which formerly belonged to France.

These observations, sir, will be sufficient to dispel every kind of doubt, with regard to the extent of the retrocession made by Spain to France, in the month of Vendemiaire, year 9. It was under this impression that the French and Spanish plenipotentiaries negotiated, and it was under this impression that I have since had occasion to give the necessary explanations when a project was formed to take possession of it. I have laid before His Imperial Majesty the negotiations of Madrid which preceded the treaty of 1801, and His Majesty is convinced that, during the whole course of these negotiations, the Spanish Government has constantly refused to cede any part of the Floridas, even from the Mississippi to the Mobile.

His Imperial Majesty has, moreover, authorized me to declare to you, that, at the beginning of the year 11, General Bournonville was charged to open a new negotiation with Spain for the acquisition of the Floridas. This project, which has not been followed by any treaty, is an evident proof that France had not acquired, by the treaty retroceding Louisiana, the country east of the Mississippi.

The candor of these observations proves to you, sir, how much value His Majesty attaches to the maintenance of a good understanding between two Powers, to whom France is united by connexions so intimate and so numerous. His Majesty, called upon to give explanations on a question which interested France directly, persuades himself that they will leave no ground of misunderstanding between the United States and Spain; and that these two Powers, animated, as they ought to be, by the sentiments of friendship which their vicinity and their position render so necessary, will be able to agree with the same facility on the other subjects of their discussion.

This result His Imperial Majesty will learn with real interest. He saw with pain the United States commence their differences with Spain in an unusual manner, and conduct themselves towards the Floridas by acts of violence, which, not being founded in right, could have no other effect but to injure its lawful owners. Such an aggression gave the more surprise to His Majesty, because the United States seemed, in this measure, to avail themselves of their treaty with France as an authority for their proceedings, and because he could scarcely reconcile, with the just opinion which he entertains of the wisdom and fidelity of the Federal Government, a course of proceedings, which nothing can authorize, towards a Power which has long occupied, and still occupies, one of the first ranks in Europe.

But the Federal Government having entered the path of negotiation, and the question which divided the two Powers being cleared up, there is reason to hope that they will easily agree on the other points; and this His Majesty, from the sincere interest which he feels for the equal prosperity of the two nations, ardently desires.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong, minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Monroe, minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the same at Madrid, dated at

PARIS, March 12, 1804.

The moment I received your letters of the 15th and 26th of February, I took measures to sound this Government on the present posture of things at Madrid, which, on the authority of your communication, I represented as strongly indicating a rupture between the United States and Spain. Their manner of receiving this information, with the sentiments which they made no scruple to avow in relation to the subject generally, decided me at once against either submitting your correspondence with Cevallos, or submitting any thing of my own for it; perceiving clearly that the only effect of such communication would be to draw from them some new declaration friendly to the pretensions of Spain, and calculated merely to keep up the tone of her councils. The following sketch of what passed will enable you to judge how far this conclusion was correct, or otherwise.

On the subject of indemnity for the suspended right of deposite, (professing to know nothing of the ground on which the interruption had been given,) they would offer no opinion. On that of reparation for spoliations committed on our commerce by Frenchmen within the territory of His Catholic Majesty, they were equally prompt and decisive, declaring that our claim, having nothing of solidity in it, must be abandoned.

With regard to boundary, we have, they said, already given an opinion, and see no cause to change it. To the question, what would be the course of this Government in the event of a rupture between us and Spain? they answered, we can neither doubt nor hesitate; we must take part with Spain; and our note of the 30th Frimaire was intended to communicate and impress this idea.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated at

PARIS, March 18, 1805.

I received your favor of the 1st instant by Preble. Another experiment has been made, but without producing any result propitious to our objects. Nay, the more this subject is discussed, the more determined are they in maintaining the doctrines and pursuing the conduct indicated in my letter of the 12th. In this explanation, three points were fully and distinctly, but cautiously, urged. 1st, The probability of an immediate rupture between Spain and the United States; 2d, The ill consequences of such an event to Spain directly, and to France indirectly, as her ally; and, 3d, Its tendency to promote the general views of Great Britain, though no closer political connexion between her and us were induced by it.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated at

PARIS, April 1, 1805.

Your letter of the 12th reached me yesterday. No material change of opinion or conduct has taken place here with regard to your business. A long and querulous note has been put in by the Spanish chargé d'affaires, (Santivanes,) stating the claims made by you, and the arguments employed in support of them, and soliciting from this Government its exposition of the treaties of 1801 and 1803 on the several points in controversy. This note had not been answered on the 30th ult., and, from some circumstances, I suspect that there is no intention of answering it promptly.

VI. Correspondence between Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney and the Spanish Government.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, January 28, 1805.

SIR:

It is the sincere desire of the President to establish the relations between the United States and Spain on a footing of permanent friendship. As a signal proof of that disposition, he has sent an extraordinary mission to His Catholic Majesty, with full power, in conjunction with their minister plenipotentiary at Madrid, to enter into such arrangements, on just and equal principles, as may be best adapted to the object. The situation of the two countries, at this time, required such an effort on his part, and it is our wish, as it is our duty, to do every thing in our power to carry it into effect.

It is proper to examine, impartially, the several points which are depending between our Governments. To make their friendship perpetual, every cause of complaint and inquietude should be brought into view, and amicably settled. For this purpose, it is necessary to ascertain their respective rights in each case, since thereby an unerring rule will be established, by which this adjustment may be made, and their future harmony secured. No just Government will ever demand any thing which will not bear the test of that rule: no just Government will ever refuse to discharge an obligation which it imposes. We will proceed to this inquiry, in full confidence that both our Governments are animated with the same zeal to do justice, with the same desire to cherish the friendly relations which have heretofore subsisted between them.

In the course of the last war, many aggressions were committed on the peaceful, and, as it is presumed, lawful commerce of the United States, to the great injury of their citizens, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain, for which they are entitled to compensation. It cannot be doubted but that Spain is responsible for these injuries, in all cases where the condemnation was contrary to the law of nations, the subsisting treaty between the two Powers, and those principles of justice which are recognised and respected by other nations. It is to be regretted that a perfect accord has not yet taken place between our Governments on the mode of adjusting all the claims proceeding from this cause. It is, however, matter of much satisfaction to observe, that they have gone so far in the establishment of just principles, and approached so near in sentiments, as to justify the expectation that all difficulties will now be removed. The discussions which have already taken place on this subject have too fully illustrated its merits to require any thing to be added on that point at present. We observe, with pleasure, that the President reposes too much confidence in the high character of His Catholic Majesty, which is distinguished by a sacred regard to justice, to doubt his agreement to whatever it dictates. The proposition which we have the honor to make to your excellency on this point rests on that basis, and will, therefore, we flatter ourselves, receive his sanction. Your excellency will find that, in the terms of payment of such sums as may be awarded, a new accommodation is proposed, which is equally a proof of the disposition of our Government to conciliate the views and interests of His Catholic Majesty in this transaction.

The suppression of the right of deposite at New Orleans, by the Intendant of His Majesty, in the winter of 1802–3, contrary to the treaty of 1795, to the great injury of citizens of the United States who inhabit the territory which is bounded by the Mississippi and the waters emptying into it, is also an act for which they are entitled to reparation. By restoring the deposite, on the complaint of the President, His Majesty gave a satisfactory proof of his strict regard to the obligations of treaties and the principles of justice; but, by so doing, the injuries which had been sustained by individuals were not redressed, nor were the just views of His Majesty in that respect completely fulfilled. It is presumed that His Majesty will not hesitate to allow an adequate indemnity for the losses which were sustained by this act of his Intendant. It is one of the objects of the enclosed project to provide for them.

The above are the injuries which have been received by citizens of the United States, for which it is proposed to provide a suitable compensation. In seeking justice, however, it is equally the duty of their Government to render it. It is possible that His Majesty's subjects may have received injuries within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, or by their officers elsewhere, for which those States are also responsible. It has been the invariable effort of their Government to preserve the best understanding with His Catholic Majesty, by the faithful observance of every duty imposed by the law of nations and the subsisting treaty between them, in their political and commercial intercourse. If such injuries have been rendered, it is the earnest wish of the President that just reparation should be made for them.

For the fair and amicable adjustment of all such claims on both sides, it is proposed to establish a Board of Commissioners, impartial and independent, which shall be vested with full power to hear and determine, and grant awards for all such as shall appear to be well founded. This mode has proved adequate, in similar cases, between the United States and other Powers. It is not doubted but that it would prove equally so between the United States and Spain.

There is another question which it is equally proper to adjust at this time. By the cession of Louisiana by His Majesty the Emperor of France to the United States, it becomes necessary to settle its boundary with the territories of His Catholic Majesty in that quarter. It is presumed that this subject is capable of such clear and satisfactory illustration, as to leave no cause for any difference of opinion between the parties. By the treaty of April 30, 1803, between the United States and France, the latter ceded to the former the said province, in full sovereignty, in the same extent, and with all the rights which belonged to it, under the treaty of October, 1800, by which she had acquired it of Spain. That the nature and extent of the acquisition might be precisely known, the article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, making the cession, is inserted in that of Paris. To a fair and just construction, therefore, of that article, the United States are referred for the extent of their rights under the treaty of 1803. There is nothing to oppugn its force or detract from the import of its very clear and explicit terms. We have the honor to present to your excellency a paper on this subject, which, we presume, proves, in the most satisfactory manner, that the boundaries of that province, as established by the treaties referred to, are the river Perdido to the east, and the Rio Bravo to the west. The facts and principles which justify this conclusion are so satisfactory to our Government, as to convince it that the United States have not a better right to the island of New Orleans, under the cession referred to, than they have to the whole district of territory which is above described. Aware, however, that the question of boundary was one in which His Catholic Majesty was also interested, the President was not unmindful of what was due to that consideration. In pursuing and supporting the just rights of the United States, he is far from wishing to interfere with, or encroach on, those of Spain. As neighbors, he was also sensible of what was due to that interesting relation; and as a Power which claims respect in its intercourse with other nations, he was resolved to give a distinguished proof of that of the United States for His Catholic Majesty in the present case. Thus no step has been taken since the territory was surrendered to those States by France, otherwise than a strong expression by the Congress of its sense of their rights; no portion of it has been garrisoned, or even possessed by their troops, which could involve any question of the kind adverted to, or manifested a disposition incompatible with these just and friendly sentiments. His definitive arrangements are yet to be taken. He seeks to adopt them in harmony with the sentiments and interests of His Catholic Majesty—a motive which induced the measure of an extraordinary mission, and inspires this communication.

So far, we have treated of the boundary which of right ought to be established between the two nations. It is proper, however, to examine and treat the subject in another view.

By the acquisition of Louisiana, the United States and Spain have assumed, in some respects, a new relation to each other. It is in its nature a very interesting one. It is practicable, at this time, to place it on such a footing, by suitable arrangements, as to preserve their friendship for ages. The importance of the subject merits their very dispassionate consideration, since a failure to adopt such may be productive of much harm. Happily, it is an unquestionable truth, that, in consideration of the permanent and substantial interest of the two Powers, there does not exist at present a single point of collision, an opposing interest between them. There are only some topics of uneasiness and jealousy easy to be removed, but which, if suffered to remain, may engender animosities, embitter their intercourse, and finally prove the cause of much trouble, and even misfortune, to both nations. To remove them requires no sacrifice; on the contrary, much will be gained, since, by so doing, their harmony, and with it their permanent interests, will be secured.

What effect does the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States produce on the interests of the two Powers in reference to each other? and what ought it to produce in their policy? These questions admit a ready answer. That province is bounded by Florida to the east, and Mexico to the west; hence, Florida is surrounded on every side, that of the ocean excepted, by the territory of the United States. It is, of course, an object with those States to possess it. And as Louisiana extends westward to Mexico, it is presumed to be an object with Spain to retard the progress of their settlements in that quarter. Here, then, is the obvious ground of an accord between the two nations, in an arrangement which seems to be well adapted to accomplish an object which each deems of importance. The project which we have the honor to present to your excellency is intended to conciliate and provide for those interests. It is believed that its adoption will effectually do so. Your excellency must be sensible, under existing circumstances, and especially since the acquisition of Louisiana, that that of Florida has become an object of much less importance to the United States. It is not from the want of territory, because it is known not to be fertile, and without it they have enough to satisfy their growing population for ages to come. It is, in truth, suggested more by a desire to remove all cause of a future variance between them and Spain, than of any immediate advantage to be derived from it in other respects. While that province remains to Spain, it must be, in some degree, a cause of jealousy to the United States. Situated in their interior, and detached from the other dominions of His Catholic Majesty, it is probable, to render it secure, that he would be compelled to put a strong force there. Hence, the United States would be compelled to do the same. Thus the attitude of hostilities would be taken, which a thousand causes would tend to promote. The jealousy of Governments so contiguously situated, the rivalry of Governors and Generals, and the conflict of commercial regulations, could not fail to produce that effect. In addition to which, it cannot be doubted that other Powers would take a pleasure in seeing a rupture between the United States and Spain. It is presumed that they are interested in it. Remove, however, this obstacle, and establish on just principles their western boundary, and all cause of inquietude and misunderstanding will be at an end. Their territories and police will be distinct, and their military stations at some distance from each other. Each Power will regulate its own concerns as it thinks best: neither will be interested in disturbing those of the other. Their Governments, on the contrary, will find themselves bound by their interests, their faith, and their character, to keep their citizens within their own limits, which it will take ages to fill. Should Spain not place a strong force in Florida, it will not escape your excellency's attention, that it will be much exposed to the danger of being taken possession of by some other Power who might wish to hold it, with very different views towards Spain than those which animate the Government of the United States. Without a strong force there, it might even become an asylum for adventurers and freebooters, to the great annoyance of both nations. In this light, however, we forbear to press it.

It is proposed, by the enclosed project, to establish a district of neutral territory between the two Powers, on which neither party shall encroach, and, with a view to accommodation, that it should be, exclusively, for a given term, within the supposed limits of Louisiana. We are willing that the term should amount to twenty years, to give time for ulterior arrangements relative to that object, and the establishment of a permanent boundary between them in that quarter. If the boundaries of Louisiana are, as our Government believes them to be, and as, we presume, is sufficiently proved by the enclosed paper, this arrangement cannot be considered otherwise than in the light it is intended. This proposition, however, is not offered as an equivalent for the cession of Florida. It is proposed to make a pecuniary compensation for the cession to an amount which is deemed equal to its value. To fix that value, in case His Catholic Majesty is disposed to make the cession, cannot, it is presumed, be difficult, since, without regarding other considerations, the sum given for the whole province of Louisiana furnishes a just and suitable standard. By comparing the extent of the territory of Louisiana with that of Florida, and taking into consideration the immense advantages derived to the United States from the entire command of the Mississippi and all the waters emptying into it, which followed the cession of Louisiana, we are promptly led to a fair result. On this point we wish to confer in person, when it may suit your excellency's convenience. The sum which may thus be agreed on, it is wished to appropriate in the manner mentioned in the proposed convention.

In seeking to terminate amicably all subsisting differences between the two Powers, and to place their future relations on a basis of permanent friendship, it is thought that a formal stipulation in behalf of each, not only to observe the limits which may be agreed on, but to cause them to be observed by their respective citizens and subjects, may have a very salutary effect. If such a stipulation is regarded only as a proof of the spirit in which the convention is formed, it will always have weight with both Governments to ensure a compliance with it. But it merits to be received in a stronger light, since it makes it the duty of each Government to be attentive to, and to enjoin it on their citizens and subjects, respectively, strictly to observe the same. As the convention of the 11th of August, 1802, has not been carried into effect, it is thought best to suffer it to fall, and incorporate its contents into the present one: on that principle the project is formed. There seems to be a propriety in accommodating all subsisting differences, and providing for the respective interests of the two Powers, to comprise the stipulations which are necessary for the purpose in the same instrument. To this mode, however, we have no preference, and only submit the idea to your excellency's consideration.

To facilitate the communication, and promote despatch in an object of so much importance to our Government, we have the honor to annex a translation into French of this note, and the papers which accompany it, to your excellency. They are as correct as they could be made by those attached to the legation, to whom alone we could confide their contents. We beg leave, however, to observe, that we consider ourselves responsible only for the originals, which are in English.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our distinguished consideration, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

Project of a Convention between the United States and Spain.

ARTICLE 1. Spain, acknowledging and confirming to the United States the cession of Louisiana, in an extent eastward to the river Perdido, cedes to them forever all the territory remaining to her between the Mississippi, the Atlantic, and the Gulf of Mexico, together with all the islands thereunto annexed, either whilst the Floridas belonged to Great Britain, or after they became provinces of Spain.

Possession of the said territory shall be delivered to a person authorized by the United States to receive the same, in ——— days, or less, if practicable, after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. With the said territory shall be delivered all public property, except ships and military stores, as also all public archives belonging to the same.

Within ——— days after the delivery of possession, or sooner, if possible, the Spanish troops shall evacuate the territory hereby ceded; and if there should be any Spanish troops remaining within any part of the territory ceded by France to the United States, all such troops shall, without delay, be withdrawn.

Spanish subjects, within the ceded territory, who do not choose to become citizens of the United States, shall be allowed eighteen months to dispose of their real, and to dispose of or remove their other property.

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be entitled to the same incorporation into the United States, and to the same protection in their religion, their liberties, and their property, as were stipulated to the inhabitants of the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of April 30, 1803, between those States and France.

ART. 2. It is agreed that, for the term of ——— years, no land shall be granted; nor shall persons who may have settled since the 1st of October, 1800, on lands not granted prior thereto, be permitted to continue within the space defined by the following limits, to wit: by a limit, consisting of the river Colorado on the one side, from its mouth to its source; thence, a straight line to the most southwestwardly source of the Red river, with such defluctions, however, as will head all the waters of that river; thence, along the ridge of high land which divides the waters belonging to the Mississippi and Missouri from those belonging to the Rio Bravo; and thence, a meridian to the northern boundary of Lousiana: and by a limit, on the other side, of the Rio Bravo, from its mouth to its source; and thence, a meridian to the northern boundary of Louisiana.

Such of the settlements within the foregoing limits, not prohibited by the preceding clause, as were not under the authority of the government of Louisiana, shall continue under the authority of Spain. Such as were under that authority shall be under the authority of the United States. But the parties agree that they will, respectively, offer reasonable inducements, without being obliged to use force, to all such settlers to return from the space above limited, and establish themselves elsewhere.

The Indian tribes within the said limits shall not be considered as subject to, or exclusively connected with, either party. Citizens of the United States and Spanish subjects shall be equally free to trade with them, and to sojourn among them, as may be necessary for that purpose; and each of the parties agreeing to restrain, by all proper and requisite means, its respective citizens and subjects from exciting the Indians, whether within or without the said limits, from committing hostilities or aggressions on the subjects or citizens of the other party. The parties agree, moreover, each of them, in all public transactions and communications with the Indians, to promote in them a disposition to live in peace and friendship with the other party.

It shall be free for Indians now within the territory of either of the parties to remove to and settle within the said limits, without restraint from the other party; and either party may promote such a change of settlement by Indians within its territory, taking due care not to make it an occasion of war among the Indians, or of animosities in any of them against the other party.

The United States may establish garrisons sufficient, as security against the Indians, and all trading houses, at any places within the said limits, where garrisons existed at any time under the Spanish government of Louisiana. And Spain may continue garrisons, for the like purpose, at any places where she now has them, and establish trading houses thereat. Either party may also cause or permit any part of the country within the said limits to be explored and surveyed, with a view to commerce or science.

It shall be free for either party to march troops within the said limits against Indians at war with them, and for the purpose of driving or keeping out invaders or intruders.

ART. 3. It is agreed, that, within ——— years previous to the expiration of the aforesaid term of ——— years, due provision shall be made for amicably adjusting and tracing the boundary between the territories of the United States westward of the Mississippi, and the territories of His Catholic Majesty; which boundary shall then be established according to the true and just extent of Louisiana as ceded by Spain to France, and by France to the United States, uninfluenced, in the smallest degree, or in any manner whatever, by the delay, or by any arrangement or circumstance contained in or resulting from this convention. It is also expressly stipulated by the parties, that they will cause the limits which are hereby defined, or may be hereafter defined, between them, to be faithfully observed, by restraining their respective citizens and subjects, by suitable arrangements, from violating them in any manner whatever.

ART. 4. His Majesty and the United States, wishing, in the same spirit of conciliation, amicably to adjust the claims which have arisen from the wrongs and excesses committed during the late war by individuals of either nation, or by others, within the territory or jurisdiction of either, contrary to the law of nations, the treaty existing between the two countries, or the principles of justice, have determined that the same shall be adjusted in the following manner: A Board of Commissioners shall be formed, consisting of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Catholic Majesty, two others by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the fifth by common consent of the four commissioners; and, in case they should not be able to agree on a person for the fifth, the commissioners of each Power shall name one, and leave the decision to lot; and hereafter, in the case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, of any of those already appointed, the remaining commissioner or commissioners of the Power whose commissioner is dead or unable to attend, shall fill the vacancy. When thus appointed, each one of them shall take an oath to examine, discuss, and decide impartially on the claims which they are to judge according to the law of nations, the existing treaty, and the principles of justice. The commissioners shall meet and hold their session in Madrid, where, within the term of eighteen months, to be reckoned from the day on which they assemble, they shall receive all claims which, in consequence of this convention, may be made as well by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, as by the citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries sustained by them in consequence of the wrongs and excesses committed by Spanish subjects, American citizens, or others, within the territory or jurisdiction of either of the contracting parties. The commissioners are to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said demands, and receive as worthy of credit all testimony and evidence the authenticity of which cannot be doubted. The said commissioners shall grant awards for the sums which may be due to the several claimants, with interest on the same, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, to commence from such dates, respectively, as to them shall appear to be just. From the decision of the commissioners there shall be no appeal; and the agreement of three of them shall give full force and effect to their decisions, as well with respect to the justice of the claims, as the amount of the indemnifications which may be adjudged to the claimants: the said contracting parties obliging themselves to satisfy the said awards in specie, in the manner stipulated by the sixth article of this convention.

ART. 5. The said commissioners shall also take cognizance of and estimate all damages which were sustained by the citizens of the United States, by the suppression of the right of deposite at New Orleans by the Intendant of His Catholic Majesty, in the years 1802-3, contrary to the treaty of 1795; for which the said commissioners shall grant a certificate to the Government of the United States, the amount whereof shall be paid to it by the Government of Spain, in the same manner as is stipulated in favor of other claims in the preceding article. The Government of the United States shall pay the sums thus received to the individuals who were injured by the suppression of the said deposite.

ART. 6. It is further agreed that the respective Governments will pay the sums awarded by the said commissioners, under this convention, in the manner following:

The Government of the United States shall pay all such sums, not exceeding ——— dollars, which may be awarded as compensation to citizens of the United States from His Catholic Majesty, in three equal annual instalments, at the city of Washington: the first instalment to be paid in eighteen months after the exchange of the ratifications hereof; or, in case they shall not be so paid, they shall bear an interest of six per cent. per annum, from the time they become due until they are actually discharged; and, in case the aggregate of the said sums should not amount to the said sum of ——— dollars, the United States will pay to His Catholic Majesty, within one year after the final liquidation of the claims cognizable by the said Board, at the city of Washington, so much as the said aggregate may fall short of the sum above mentioned: but, on the other hand, if the whole amount of the sums awarded to citizens of the United States should exceed the sum of ——— dollars, His Catholic Majesty shall pay the surplus, without deduction, to such claimants, within one year after their claims shall be respectively liquidated. The said claims shall, nevertheless, bear an interest of six per cent. from the time of their liquidation until they are discharged.

The Government of the United States shall also pay, without deduction, at the city of Washington, all such sums as may be awarded against them by the said commissioners, for compensation due to Spanish subjects, within one year after their claims shall be liquidated; and, from the time of their liquidation, the said claims shall bear an interest of six per cent. per annum, until they are discharged.

ART. 7. This convention shall be ratified within ——— after the signing thereof, or sooner, if possible, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within ——— days after the ratification by the United States, at the city of Washington.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, January 31, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

The King my master having, on all occasions, given such repeated proofs of his friendship towards the United States, and of his desire to live with them in peace and harmony, could not but hear with pleasure what you have been pleased to manifest in your esteemed note of the 28th instant, relative to the sincere desire of the President of the United States to see the friendly relations of the two countries in a manner the most solid and permanent, and that, for this purpose, the American Government had named an extraordinary mission to this court, to commence such negotiations as might be best adapted to complete an object of so much importance, and founding them on just and impartial principles. His Catholic Majesty, on his part, desires nothing more ardently than that those just and equal principles, so conformable to the rectitude of his royal mind, may direct the discussions and negotiations depending between the two Governments. For this end nothing appears better adapted than the mode proposed by your excellencies in the first part of your note:

"It is proper to examine impartially the several points which are depending between our Governments. To make their friendship perpetual, every cause of complaint and inquietude should be brought into view, and amicably settled. For this purpose, it is necessary to ascertain their respective rights in each case; since, thereby, an unerring rule will be established, by which this adjustment may be made, and their future harmony secured. No just Government will ever demand any thing which will not bear the test of that rule: no just Government will ever refuse to discharge an obligation which it imposes."

According to this principle, proposed by your excellencies, and which, certainly, is highly worthy the good faith of both Governments, it appears the more proper that, before we proceed to examine projects of a convention, which ought to result from discussion of all the different points in dispute, we should first examine each point separately, and in this form determine the respective rights of each country; and then proceed to such negotiations as the interest of each country may require. Under this idea, and following the tenor of your note, it appears that the points depending may be reduced to the following:

First. The damages occasioned, during the last war, by the excesses committed by individuals of both countries, contrary to the law of nations and the existing treaty. This point is nearly decided by the convention of 1802, which has been ratified by the American Government; and His Majesty, on his part, is disposed to ratify the same, after the obstacles which occasioned its postponement shall be removed. Thus there is but little to regulate on this point, considering how far it is already advanced, and that the sincere desire of both Governments is to proceed with candor and good faith.

The second point mentioned in your excellencies' note, relative to the indemnificaton of injuries supposed to have been received by American citizens, in consequence of the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans by order of the Intendant at that city, is a point of discussion which has not as yet been commenced, and it is one on which the Spanish Government is convinced that the United States have neither any motive nor right to found a reclamation.

Third. This point, which is relative to the demarcation of the limits of Louisiana, retroceded by Spain to France, and by her transferred to the United States, by its nature, subdivides itself into two parts, to wit: the demarcation of the limits of Louisiana on the east, or side of the Floridas, and that on the side of the interior provinces of New Spain. As a testimony of the desire with which His Majesty is actuated, that these demarcations may be executed with the skill and justice requisite, and at the same time with all possible despatch, I have to inform you, what is already known to your Government, that, at the commencement of the last year, the King named for his commissioner for these demarcations and limits, Brigadier Marquis of Casa Calvo, who is now at New Orleans with the engineer Don Joseph Martinez. Not having yet agreed upon others of the said points mentioned in your excellencies' note, and they being in their nature unconnected, it appears that it would only be confounding them and multiplying their confusion to treat upon the whole at once; and proceed immediately to form for either party projects of a convention from the mass. Analyze these incorporated points of discussion, and a discussion of them will become much more plain and simple, and, with this new light, it will afterwards be easy to embrace the whole at one view.

This method is clear and simple, and, according to my idea, is what you indicate in the first part of your note. This being the case, it appears to me that we may occupy ourselves, in the first place, in determining the point relative to reclamation; for which purpose, we may take up the convention of August, 1802, by reason of its almost finished state; fix the rights of each country upon each point, and the means will be plain and easy to negotiate them, with that equal utility which both countries may find convenient. I have no doubt but you will find this method of proceeding conformable to reason, and, waiting your reply,

I am, &c. &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, February 5, 1805.

SIR:

We have received your excellency's letter of the 31st ultimo, in answer to that which we had the honor to write to you on the 28th, and beg you to be persuaded that we are highly gratified with the assurance it contains, that His Catholic Majesty is disposed to meet the President of the United States in such arrangements, on just and equal principles, as may be necessary to accommodate subsisting differences, and place the relations of the two countries on a basis of permanent friendship. Since our Governments are animated with such honorable views, it cannot be doubted that their object will be accomplished.

Your excellency observes that it will be proper to examine previously, and separately, each point depending between our Governments, to establish their respective rights in each; and then proceed to the adoption of such a project of a convention as may provide for the whole. In this idea we perfectly agree. It was on that principle, as you justly observe, that our note of the 28th was conceived; by it every topic of complaint, every question of interest, is presented to your excellency's view. It remains only to decide these several points, and, with them, the fortune of the present negotiation.

The case of claims for injuries done to the citizens and subjects of either party, within the limits and jurisdiction of the other, being first in order of time, ought to be first determined. As we presumed that this subject had been already sufficiently discussed, we thought it sufficient in our former note to submit such an arrangement respecting it as we were authorized to propose. Since, however, it seems to be your excellency's desire, we shall not hesitate to communicate more fully the views and sentiments of our Government on this point, and the principles on which they are founded. It is the more necessary so to do, to free it from the complexity in which it may otherwise be involved.

It is known to your excellency, that, by the convention of August 11, 1802, an immediate provision was not made for satisfying the claims of their respective citizens and subjects for all the injuries which they had received in the course of the last war within the jurisdiction of each Power, and for which they were responsible; that it was not then possible for the plenipotentiaries charged with that subject to agree on a mode of arbitrating the claims originating from the excesses of foreign cruisers, agents, consuls, or tribunals, in their respective territories, which might be imputable to their two Governments; and that, in consequence thereof, it was agreed between them to provide then for the adjustment and satisfaction of such as were committed by their respective citizens and subjects only, reserving to each Government, its citizens, and subjects, their respective rights, with liberty to bring forward their claims at such times as might be convenient to them. Had that convention been carried into effect at any time before the present, we should have now to provide for the claims which were then postponed, whose just title to reparation seems to be sufficiently sanctioned by that instrument. But as that convention has not been carried into effect, and, of course, no satisfaction made for that portion of the injuries complained of, it is proper that the whole subject should now be taken into view and definitively settled. It would badly comport with the spirit of the present negotiation, whose object is to adjust every difference, and remove every cause of inquietude, to leave any thing unfinished. Our Government considers its citizens entitled to compensation for every injury which they did receive within the jurisdiction of His Catholic Majesty, contrary to the treaty between the United States and Spain, the law of nations, and the principles of justice sanctioned by them, whether they were committed by His Majesty's subjects and tribunals or those of any other nation. For all such acts, the Government within whose limits they are committed is alone responsible; for over them has it the exclusive jurisdiction. A contrary opinion cannot be advanced without derogating from the established doctrine of the law of nations, or rights of sovereignty incident to each. It is a well established doctrine, that no two nations can, by their accord, or any arrangement between them, change a law adopted by the whole. Such a change, if agreed on by any two nations, can only operate as a special compact between them, which finds an equivalent by the reciprocity of the stipulation, or some other article of the treaty, but can never change the relation of either with other Powers, or the rights and claims of such other Powers on each of those nations. It is equally well established, that protection is due by every Government to foreigners within its limits, in return for which they are entitled to their allegiance while they remain with them, as it is that such protection cannot be withdrawn, or the jurisdiction of a foreign Power be permitted within its limits, to the injury of a third Power. A contrary doctrine supposes separate and independent jurisdictions and Governments within the same limits, and altogether confounds the nature of sovereignty, which is complete, absolute, and exclusive, wherever it exists. It is proper to add, that this doctrine of the law of nations, so clear and explicit, is still further enforced by the stipulation of the sixth article of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain.

In the project which we had the honor to present to your excellency, you will find it is intended to provide for the whole of these claims, whether the convention of August 11th, 1802, is carried into effect or suffered to expire. In the former case, we should expect that an article be inserted in the proposed one, to provide for those cases which were unprovided for in that. We consider it our duty to inform your excellency that we cannot consent to any arrangement which does not provide for the whole subject, having received orders to that effect by a courier who has just arrived with despatches as late as the 3d December last. We owe it to the spirit of candor, which is to prevail in this negotiation, to state to your excellency this fact; and we ask of you to inform us, in the same spirit, whether we are to expect the accord of your Government to such an arrangement as will be effectual to this object.

That our Government is entitled to expect an adequate compensation for the injuries which our citizens received by the suppression of the right of deposite at New Orleans, is a point on which we did presume there could be no doubt. The right to such a deposite is stipulated forever to the United States, by the twenty-second article of their treaty with Spain, either at New Orleans, or on some other part of the banks of the Mississippi equally convenient to the parties. It is the obvious import of that article, that there never should be a moment's interruption in the enjoyment of that right; a right which was so necessary to the interest of those dependent on it, and, of course, to the peace and friendship of the two countries. In exercising the right reserved to His Catholic Majesty to change the place of deposite, and assign some other equivalent establishment, it is equally the import of that article, that the whole arrangement should be made at the same time; that the same act which suppressed the existing deposite should open another; and that the Government of the United States should be apprised of that intention in due time to prevent their citizens being injured by the measure, and also to be consulted on the place which it was proposed to substitute to the existing one. In the proceeding which took place at New Orleans, none of those rules were observed; all respect for our Government and the rights of our citizens was lost sight of. In short, had that act been imputable to His Majesty's Government, the President could have seen in it nothing short of a commencement of hostilities, as much so as if his troops had invaded their territory, or his fleets entered in hostile array any of their ports. But the President never considered that act as imputable to His Majesty's Government; he entertained too high a respect for the good faith of the Catholic King to believe that it proceeded from him; he always considered it as the act of the Intendant, and was happy in the result to find that such was the case. Nevertheless, being the act of His Majesty's officer, his Government is responsible for the injuries resulting from it. Your excellency will find that, as early as March 25, 1803, the minister of the United States accredited with His Majesty, claimed, by order of the President, an indemnity for these injuries, which was repeated in subsequent notes of the 12th and 23d of April of the same year. It has not since been pressed, because, by like order, the subject was reserved with others for final arrangement at this present occasion.

On the subject of limits, we have little to add to what we have already stated in our former note. By it a full view is given of what our Government conceives to be its rights in that respect. The commissioners appointed by His Majesty for the demarcation thereof can do nothing till some agreement takes place between the two Governments to fix the principle which is to guide them. They must remain inactive until it be known by what course, latitude, meridian, or natural boundary, the demarcation is to be made. It is an important object of the present negotiation to fix that principle. We take the liberty also to refer your excellency to our former note, and the pieces which accompanied it, for the views of our Government on the other topics of a territorial nature. It is not in our power to add any thing on those points to what we have therein stated.

The President, being very desirous, with a view to the permanent harmony and welfare of the two nations, to adjust and arrange every question and interest depending between them, and having given us full power for the like purpose, waits with anxiety the result. Having had the honor to submit to your excellency, as was agreed in our first interview, our propositions, for the attainment of that desirable end, by which the subject is presented equally in detail as in a general view, and, having now given the further explanations, which were desired by your esteemed note of the 31st ultimo, we have only to request that you will give us your answer to the same. As every point has been long under the consideration of His Majesty's Government, we do not doubt that its mind is made up as to the course the business is to take. It is in His Majesty's power, by the answer which you give, to fix at once the relations which are to subsist in future between the two nations. The United States have done every thing in their power, which a regard to justice and the rights of their citizens will permit, to place and preserve them on a most friendly footing; and we flatter ourselves that His Catholic Majesty, who is distinguished, among sovereigns, by his regard for justice and good faith, will meet them in such arrangements as may be effectual to the object.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our distinguished consideration and esteem.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Cevallos to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe.

ARANJUEZ, February 10, 1805.

SIRS:

I see, by the tenor of your esteemed favor of the 5th instant, in reply to my note of the 31st ultimo, that we are of the same opinion, as it relates to the principle established, that, to regulate amicably all the points depending between the two Governments, it is necessary, first, to establish the rights of each nation upon each one of the points in dispute, and then proceed to bring forward such negotiations as the reciprocal interests of each country may require; and, in consequence, of the point relative to indemnification for damages, occasioned during the last war, by individuals of each nation, being already so far advanced, that ought, undoubtedly, first to occupy our attention: we will, therefore, in this letter, discuss the points relative to indemnification, leaving for another opportunity the discussion on the limits which is so different in its nature.

It is just that the losses sustained by the citizens or subjects of either nation, during the last war, contrary to the law of nations, or the existing treaty, should be satisfied; and to this effect the convention of the 11th of August, 1802, between the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, was concluded, that the individual sufferers might find a quiet and convenient redress. The intention of the King my master always unchangeable, and always conformable to the accredited honor and justice which characterize him, is now the same that it was at the time that the convention was concluded.

However, some circumstances have taken place, between the time it was concluded and its ratification, which will make several explanations necessary. In the first place, it appears that various subjects of Spain, who had reclamations to make, having been injured by citizens of the United States, in consequence of this convention, came to Madrid from South America, hearing that it was adjusted; but were obliged to return home upon the report that the Senate of the United States had refused to ratify it, during the session of 1803. It was but reasonable, then, that these vassals of His Majesty should be informed that the convention was ratified, that they might come forward to establish their claims; and for this, it was necessary to give them a certain space of time. His Majesty proposed that this space of time should be agreed on between the two Governments, that the ratification might be known to all those interested.

It having come to the knowledge of His Majesty that Congress had, on the 27th of February, approved an act, by which it appears that the President was authorized to establish custom-houses in the territory of West Florida, and as this province belongs to His Majesty, he having conquered it by the valor of his arms, not having received it from France, of course could not retrocede it to her; and as he was in quiet possession of the same, and still remaining possessed, His Majesty could not but be offended at this account. Even should it be supposed that the United States have pretensions to this territory, it certainly was not the way to bring them forward, to proceed to acts of possession, and disturb a friendly nation in her rights, by a solemn legislative act; such conduct must, consequently, appear to His Majesty very little conformable to the friendly relations of the two countries; and, under such circumstances, it did not correspond with the respect due to his royal person, or to the nation which he governs, to ratify conventions, which are acts of political friendship, with those who had violated, in a solemn manner, the rights of his sovereignty until they should give satisfaction, or corresponding explanation. Thus it was just that he should ask this satisfaction, which was done accordingly.

It having also reached the King's notice that the French Government had satisfied the United States for the damages sustained during the last war by her privateers, it appeared not only unnecessary, but capable of producing confusion, to let the sixth article of the convention of August, 1802, exist; by which, as His Majesty did not confess himself responsible for the damages occasioned by French privateers, on the coast and in the ports of Spain, the United States did not strengthen their right which they thought they possessed; and to let it exist would but expose the business to confusion. A desire, therefore, was manifested, that the sixth article should be suppressed. For the purpose of making these circumstances known to the American Government, His Majesty thought proper to suspend the ratification of the treaty, and to send off a courier to the United States, with letters to this effect, to his minister resident there.

Your excellencies are acquainted that your Government, being instructed relative to the observations which were made to them by His Majesty's minister upon the subject, agreed to fix a term, in which His Majesty's subjects interested in the convention might have notice of its ratification, and come forward with their claims before the commissioners; and that each Government should give orders to its respective citizens and subjects, not to commence their operations until a convenient term should expire. Thus, upon this article, there remains nothing to do but to fix this term, in order that the ratification of the convention may take place.

In respect to the second particular, the reply of the American Government was not so decisive and clear, as His Majesty had a right to expect from a Government so friendly. The act of Congress of the 24th of February, 1804, in its obvious and literal sense, disturbed the peaceable possession which His Majesty had, and still has, of West Florida; and the explanations of the President of the United States, contained in his proclamation of the 3d of May, saying that it was to be carried into effect within the United States, could not be considered but as equivocal and susceptible of a double meaning, although the explanation of the Secretary of State of the United States is somewhat more explicit, promising to leave every thing in statu quo, until an amicable arrangement should take place with Spain; and that the port of entry mentioned in the act should be established at Fort Stoddert, within the present territory of the United States. As His Majesty desires to live in harmony with the United States, he wishes to persuade himself that this explanation, although it does not give that satisfaction which he had so just a right to expect, is in some measure satisfactory, so far as it respects his quiet possession of West Florida. But could not His Majesty complain that satisfaction has not been given in explicit and solemn terms, for the publicity of a solemn act, whose obvious and literal sense went to disturb his quiet possession? On the other hand, it is said, in a plausible manner, that the port of entry shall be at Fort Stoddert: but how is it possible to arrive at Fort Stoddert, or go from thence to the sea, without navigating the rivers of West Florida, traversing its territory, and disturbing the peaceable possession of His Majesty? Thus, his well founded motives of complaint, in respect to that act, still exist; and His Majesty intends to keep them in mind, that satisfaction may be given by the United States; but, as it relates to ratifying the convention of August, 1802, His Majesty agrees, from this time, to be satisfied in this respect; and thinks, in so doing, that he gives an unequivocal testimony of his friendship towards the United States.

Two obstacles to the ratification of the convention being removed, we should now only treat of what relates to the sixth article of said convention. His Majesty expressed a desire that this article should be suppressed, under the idea that its insertion would neither add to nor diminish the rights of the United States or of His Majesty. The clear and obvious sense of that article is, that the two contracting parties, not having been able to agree relative to the indemnities reclaimed by the United States for damages occasioned by French privateers and tribunals, on the coast in the ports of Spain, reserved to themselves, for a future day, the rights they might have; the United States to reclaim, and His Majesty to show that he was not in any manner bound to satisfy them. In this particular, therefore, no right is given to the citizens of the United States, or taken away from them, by this article; and during the long space of time that has passed between the adjusting the convention and its ratification, His Majesty thinks he has demonstrated, in a most evident and decisive manner, that he is not responsible for the said indemnification. It appears superfluous to permit the existence of an article that can neither give nor take away any right, and which can only serve to produce confusion.

It never was the intention of His Majesty, nor is it now, that the suppression of the said article should imply a renunciation, by the United States, of the right they think they have to reclaim the said indemnification, but, on the contrary, only that they should not believe that His Majesty renounces, on his part, the right he thinks he has to resist the payment of it.

But should the American Government have any objection to the suppression of the said article, His Majesty will not oppose its continuance, provided it be understood in the ratification that, by the insertion of the sixth article, it is not in any wise to be inferred that His Majesty renounces the exceptions which are occasioned by the convention concluded between the United States and France, the 8th Vendemiaire, year 9; the context of the treaty of the sale of Louisiana concluded between the same Powers; the affirmation of the French Government, through the medium of Lucien Bonaparte, its ambassador, that the damages sustained by the United States, during the last war, were satisfied by France; and other strong reasons by which this pretension is opposed.

The American Government cannot be surprised that His Majesty wishes to make this explanation in his ratification, if it is recollected that such an explanation is undoubtedly contained in the sixth article. It mentions that His Majesty reserves to himself the rights which belong to him, although it is not particularly or expressly mentioned what are the rights which His Majesty believes to belong to him; and, at present, to avoid ambiguity, he thinks it necessary to explain in the ratification what these rights are, which are reserved by the sixth article, and to make mention of them.

If the United States, on their part, wish to validate the rights which they think they have to exact indemnifications, and also to reserve them in the same article, it will then be beginning a separate pretension, which in no wise ought to embarrass the regular course of the convention of 1802. It should be reduced to this question: whether Spain is responsible or not for the damages and losses occasioned by French privateers and tribunals within her jurisdiction, during the last war? Spain believes that she is not responsible, and thinks that she can demonstrate it to a certainty.

But as this is the second point in order relative to the pretensions which your excellencies have manifested, it appears to me convenient to treat it separately, also, after the plan proposed in my note of the 31st ultimo. In the mean time, referring you to what I have already written on this point, relative to indemnification for losses sustained by French privateers, &c. &c. to Mr. Pinckney, under date of 23d of August, and 5th of October, 1803, and to save your excellencies the trouble of referring to the correspondence of that year, I take the liberty to enclose copies of them, and also of opinions of lawyers the most celebrated in the United States, who have been consulted upon this subject, and who unanimously declared that Spain was not responsible to satisfy said indemnities; and in which declaration, these lawyers gave a proof of their rectitude, by their sincere confession of the slender foundation on which these reclamations of their country rested.

I conclude this letter by assuring your excellencies that His Majesty is disposed to ratify the convention of the 11th of August, 1802, in the form which has been mentioned; and that, should your excellency find no difficulty in so doing, as I hope will be the case, immediately after the ratification of the convention, we will proceed to the depending points, and finally to those negotiations which the reciprocal interests of both countries may require.

I renew to your excellencies the sincere demonstrations of my distinguished considerations, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

SIR: ARANJUEZ, February 12, 1805.

We have received your excellency's letter of the 10th instant, and have considered it with the attention which was due to an interesting communication on a subject of great importance to the United States. By it we perceive, with regret, that an accord is not likely to take place between us on the point to which it refers, since it appears that His Catholic Majesty is not disposed to make any reparation to the Government of the United States for all the injuries which their citizens received under her jurisdiction, of the character described in our former notes, whether the same were committed by his subjects or those of any other Power. Having had the honor to inform your excellency that we could accede to no arrangement which did not provide for every injury, it seems useless to prolong the discussion on that point. We submit it to your excellency's consideration on what we have already said.

Your excellency having expressed a desire to leave the other points to be discussed afterwards, it is proper now to proceed to them; and as we have already submitted the claims of the United States for injuries arising from the suppression of the right of deposite at New Orleans, and as to boundaries, with our opinions thereon, and the wish of our Government that the same should be amicably adjusted, we take the liberty to request that your excellency will have the goodness to state to us what are the views of His Majesty's Government on these points, particularly as to the eastern and western boundary of Louisiana; and how far His Majesty is content to cede all his claims to the territory lying eastward of the Mississippi; whether he is willing to adopt the plan of a neutral territory, and in what extent. By being possessed of His Majesty's sentiments and propositions on these points we may be enabled to take a view of the whole subject, and see whether it is yet possible to come to some accord by a general arrangement, which, while it keeps out of sight questions, on which, unfortunately, there has been so much difficulty and disagreement, may, in the end, do substantial justice to all parties. Believing this to be the most effectual and speedy mode of concluding the business, we shall wait with anxiety and impatience your excellency's answer to this communication. We beg to repeat that we shall receive with consideration, and weigh with attention, whatever propositions by His Majesty's order, your excellency will do us the honor to communicate, having in view the amicable adjustment of the whole business.

We have the honor to request that your excellency will accept the assurance of our high consideration.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, February 16, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

The contents of your esteemed note of the 12th instant, in answer to mine of the 10th, have caused me some surprise, as well on account of not having found in it, as I promised myself, that your opinions are for continuing the discussion relative to the reclamations of individuals of both nations, as of your determination to suspend the discussion upon the matter of this subject, unless the Spanish Government will make itself responsible for the losses occasioned by French privateers. It is my opinion that, as there are two species of reclamation, so different in their nature, they can easily be divided into two; and that, after the convention upon the first point is ratified, the discussion upon the second can take place without inconvenience; and I am persuaded, that, in justice to the individuals of both nations, who have received reciprocal injuries during the last war, we ought to terminate and satisfy, as soon as possible, those reclamations, on which both Governments are agreed, without prejudice to, or discontinuing the examination of the other points.

It appears, however, that your excellencies wish to leave this point unsettled, and, moreover, refuse to enter into ulterior discussions on the point of indemnifications for losses occasioned by French privateers. In this state of the affair, and notwithstanding the manner in which your excellencies have chosen to proceed, I cannot but repeat to you, what the accredited honor of my Government requires, to wit, that His Majesty is now, and ever will be, disposed to do justice to the citizens of the United States injured by Spanish subjects during the last war, and to conclude and ratify any convention relative thereto. But as it relates to injuries occasioned by French privateers on the coast and in the ports of Spain, His Majesty thinks he cannot accede in this point to the pretensions of the United States, because he believes that he has demonstrated, in the most convincing and evident manner, that Spain is not responsible for such indemnifications.

Although in my letters to Mr. Pinckney of the 23d August and 5th October, 1803, and in the reply of the lawyers of Philadelphia and New York upon this point, of which I enclosed you copies in my note of the 10th instant, it is clearly demonstrated that the Spanish Government is not responsible for such indemnifications, I had nevertheless determined that, when (in the order proposed) we should have arrived at this second point of the pretensions of your Government, to have extended my observations thereon, so as to demonstrate the solid reasons by which the Spanish Government could refute such pretensions. But as your excellencies believe that it is not necessary, or that it is incompatible with your instructions to lose time in such discussions, I do not wish to molest your attention, and only again refer you to the letters before mentioned, and also to the reply of the American lawyers. But your excellencies will permit me to make known to you how far the French Government is persuaded of the unfounded right which the American Government has to reclaim any thing from Spain, for damages occasioned by French privateers within the jurisdiction of Spain, and of the surprise which the notice of such a demand from the United States has occasioned to France. For this purpose, I shall copy, for the information of your excellencies, the expressions made use of in the latter part of a note under date of the 27th of July, 1804, written by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the ambassador of His Catholic Majesty at that court.

The French Government erroneously believed that Spain had gone so far in her condescensions to the United States, as to make herself responsible for the said indemnifications, and, in consequence, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs explained himself in the following manner:

"And, certainly, if I had been informed that the ministers of His Catholic Majesty had carried their condescensions towards the United States so far as to engage Spain to be responsible to it for the indemnities for pretended violations made by France, I should most assuredly have received from my Government an order to manifest the discontent which France would have experienced by a condescension so improper; a discontent that would have been more strongly expressed towards the Government of the United States, than towards Spain. Besides the explanations which have already been given to your court on this subject, (alluding to the communication of the ambassador Bonaparte,) and those which I have authorized to be again made to the Government of the United States, by the chargé d'affaires of His Imperial Majesty, ought to leave the presumption that, from the opinion which His Majesty has adopted on this question, that as it has already been the subject of a long negotiation, and of a formal convention between France and the United States, it cannot again become the subject of a new discussion."

The expressions of the French minister are clear and pointed, and portray, in a convincing manner, not only that France has satisfied the United States for the damages which they pretend to claim from Spain, but also the just surprise which has been caused to his Government by the notice of such pretensions on the part of the United States, pretensions which are directed to obtain a double indemnity for one and the same debt.

Under this supposition, and continuing the order we proposed, to fix, in the first place, the rights of each nation upon each one of the points in controversy, I will proceed to that of indemnifications, which your excellencies reclaim for the suspension of the right of deposite at New Orleans. To determine whether Spain is or is not responsible for the damages which your excellencies suppose to have been sustained by the citizens of the United States, by the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, in consequence of the edict of the Intendant of that city, it is necessary to examine what are those damages, and from whence they have arisen. The edict of the Intendant of

New Orleans, suspending the deposite of American produce in that city, did not interrupt, nor was it the intention to interrupt, the free navigation of the Mississippi; consequently, these pretended injuries are reduced to this small point, that, for a short time, the vessels loaded in the stream, instead of taking in their cargoes at the wharfs. This obstruction will appear still less, when we consider that, during a great part of the time that the deposite was suspended, it was in the middle of winter, when the exportation of produce from the western parts of the United States by the Mississippi is very inconsiderable. If the erroneous opinions which were formed in the United States upon the occurrences at New Orleans; if the complaints published in the papers of your country, as false as they were repeated, that the navigation of the Mississippi was interrupted; if the virulent writings by which the public mind was heated, and which led to compromit the American Government, and tarnish the good name of that of Spain, were causes that the inhabitants of the Western territory of the United States could not form a correct idea of what passed at New Orleans; and if, in this uncertainty, they were disappointed in the extraction of their produce, or suffered other inconveniences, they ought to attribute the same to internal causes, which originated in their own country, such as the writings before mentioned, filled with inflammatory falsehoods, the violence of enthusiastic partisans, and other occurrences, which, on those occasions, served to conceal the truth. The Government of Spain, so far from being responsible for the prejudices occasioned by these errors and erroneous ideas, ought, in justice, to complain of the irregular conduct pursued by various writers and other individuals of the United States, which was adapted to exasperate and mislead the public opinion, and went to divulge sentiments the most ignominious, and absurdities the most false, against the Government of His Majesty, and his accredited good faith.

Estimate the damages which may have arisen to the citizens of the United States by their erroneous conception of what took place at New Orleans, and they will be found to be no other than the trifling inconvenience before mentioned, of their ships loading in a situation not so commodious—an inconvenience for which the Government of Spain is not responsible, (neither ought it to be,) and which does not, in any manner, merit to be mentioned, more especially when it is considered that those who experienced it, had been enjoying the rights of deposite for four years more than was stipulated in the treaty, and this, notwithstanding the great prejudice it occasioned to His Majesty's revenue, by making New Orleans the centre of a most scandalous contraband trade, the profits of which it is not improbable but that some of those individuals have, in part, received, who now suppose themselves injured by said trifling inconvenience.

After four years more than the treaty expressed, to wit three years, making in all seven years, the Intendant thought that it was his duty no longer to permit a deposite, which grve an opportunity for carrying on a fraudulent commerce, prejudicial to the interests of His Majesty, for which he was accountable; he thought it was necessary that New Orleans should no longer be the place of deposite, on account of those inconveniences, and, in consequence, prohibited the same.

Before proceeding to such a determination, the Intendant ought to have asked instructions from his Government; but, perhaps, he thought he might compromise, by delaying this measure. His Majesty, as soon as he was informed of the edict prohibiting the deposite, was pleased to revoke it, wishing thereby to give another testimony of his friendship for the United States. What, in strict justice, was the deposite at New Orleans? A generous and gratuitous concession of the King my master for three years. It is true that His Majesty agreed, in the twenty-second article of the treaty, to continue the favor of the deposite, if it should be found that no inconvenience resulted from it, and of this no person was a better judge than His Majesty, and his agent in that colony. If the United States desired, after the expiration of three years, to continue the deposite at New Orleans, in a less precarious manner, or to have obtained another place for the deposite, they ought to have solicited the same; for it is more natural that those who aspire to a favor should solicit it, than that those who have the possession of the same should propose the cession or continuance of it.

By this it is not intended to support the edict of the Intendant; His Majesty has disapproved the act; giving, thereby, a proof of his friendship for the United States. However, this subject ought not to be treated on in the light of exacting indemnifications resulting from it, but should be examined to see if, in strict justice, the Intendant, or the Spanish Government, could or could not prohibit the deposite at New Orleans; four years more than the three stipulated in the treaty having expired, and during which time the Royal Treasury experienced the most serious prejudice. Most certainly, the Intendant had a right to prohibit the deposite, and, consequently, the Government of Spain cannot be responsible on this point; and this reflection acquires a double weight, if we consider the trifling inconvenience occasioned by the true effect of the said edict, of its short duration, and, on the other hand, the serious damages which the King's revenue has experienced by the continuance of the deposite for four years over and above the term stipulated in the treaty. I think your excellencies will be convinced of the force of these arguments; and it is to be desired that, in consequence of what I have represented to your excellencies, and to Mr. Pinckney in particular, upon the various points of indemnifications reclaimed by your Government, we may now be of the same opinion, and proceed to fix the rights of each nation, on the other question, relative to the limits of Louisiana, which is in its nature different; because, to have the first points in dispute undecided on, and even without discussing their merits, cannot but augment the confusion of the business; for it is very difficult to settle, in an amicable manner, the whole of the points in dispute, there being an essential difference of opinion on some parts of them.

I am also disposed to enter into a discussion upon the limits of Louisiana, but in the manner proposed by your excellencies, and adopted by me in my note of the 31st ultimo, to wit, to fix, in the first place, the rights of each country, and then proceed to such negotiations as may be convenient to both nations.

With demonstrations of my most distinguished consideration and respect, I remain, &c. &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, February 18, 1805.

Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Monroe have the honor to present their compliments to his excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, and request that he will be so good as to honor them to-morrow with a conference, or at such other time as may be more agreeable to him. They think proper to ask this conference, in consequence of the note of his excellency of the 16th instant, received this morning, which appearing calculated to put a prompt end to the negotiation, and that not in an amicable manner, they are desirous of obtaining it, before they give an answer to that note in the manner which their recent instructions make necessary, to see if it is yet possible to arrange amicably the differences which subsist between the two countries.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, February 24, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

In my note of the 16th instant, I informed your excellencies that, after having examined the point relative to the indemnifications claimed by the United States, I should be equally disposed to enter into discussions upon the limits of Louisiana. In this mode of proceeding, I follow the plan laid down in your excellency's first note, to wit, first to fix the rights of each nation, and then proceed to such negotiations as may be proper for both.

On my part, I continue to follow this plan—a plan which is so conformable to the wishes of both Governments, and so well adapted to the purpose of terminating amicably their differences. We will now begin the examination of the limits of Louisiana, whose boundaries, by their nature, are divided into parts essentially distinct; and, for this reason, we will examine them separately. They are the limits of Louisiana on the east, or side of the Floridas, and its boundary on the side of the interior provinces of New Mexico. The first shall be the object of this letter.

If the declaration of the act of Congress of the 24th February of the last year had not anticipated the declaration of the pretensions of the United States, to extend the limits of Louisiana on the east as far as the river Perdido, including within them the greater part of West Florida, I should have been surprised to have seen this pretension manifested in the first note of your excellencies. It appears as if the title alone of the treaty, by which His Majesty retroceded Louisiana to France, and to whose title the United States have succeeded, was sufficient to banish even the most distant idea that His Majesty had by it ceased to be the proprietor of West Florida, a province which Spain never received from France; for the possession of which she was only indebted to the valor of her arms many years before the acquisition of Louisiana; and, never having received it from France, it could not be included in a treaty founded entirely on the principle of retrocession. But as, notwithstanding this reflection, so obvious and clear, the United States pretend to stretch the limits of Louisiana to the river Perdido, I find myself under the necessity to manifest more fully the unshaken and solid principles by which His Majesty founds his right to the possession of the province of West Florida.

By the treaty of sale of Louisiana, signed at Paris the 30th April, 1803, the United States have acquired the right which France held, in virtue of the retrocession of that province, made to her by His Catholic Majesty, at St. Ildefonso, the 1st October, 1800. The stipulation, which ought to serve to found the pretensions of the United States, cannot be any other than the third article of the treaty of retrocession, which is in these terms: "His Catholic Majesty promises and engages, on his part, to cede to the French republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein, relative to His Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States."

The first thing which calls our attention, in explaining the said article, is the expression retrocede, and which also serves to denominate the treaty of St. Ildefonso, called the treaty of retrocession. The sense of this expression is obvious; it cannot be misinterpreted or confounded; its meaning is evidently this: that His Catholic Majesty returns to France the territory which he had received from her. Now let us examine if France put Spain into possession of the territory which occasions the present discussion. It is, without doubt, that, by the treaty of 1763, it was agreed that the separation between France and England of their possessions in that quarter, should be, by a line through the middle of the rivers Mississippi and Iberville, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea; consequently, France ceded to England the river and port of Mobile, as well as all her other possessions on the east of the Mississippi, the island and city of New Orleans excepted. From that time this territory formed a part of the possessions of the English, under the name of West Florida, and France lost all claim and title to it. Thus it became an English possession; and, during the war of 1779, Spain conquered from England all that the latter possessed by the title of West Florida; and, in the definitive treaty of 1803, [1783,] England ceded to Spain, under a guaranty, both Floridas. It is then seen, by this plain and simple exposition of facts, that the title by which Spain holds possession of the territory on the east of the Mississippi, called West Florida, was acquired to her by the right of conquest, at the expense of her treasures, and the blood of her soldiers; and, also, by the cession made by England under the treaty of 1783. From that time the title of Spain to that territory is entirely independent of France, and of the cession of Louisiana made by her; and, consequently, Spain could not give back to France what she did not receive from her. We will continue the discussion on the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso.

In the first place, it is said that His Majesty retrocedes Louisiana, "with the same extent of territory which it now has in the hands of Spain." This expression confirms most explicitly the right which Spain preserves over the said territory to the east of the Mississippi; because it is well known that Spain possesses West Florida not as Louisiana, but as Florida. This circumstance, so notorious, is confirmed by the title of the Governors of the Havana, who, in their character of Captain Generals, have always governed under the title of Captain Generals of the two Floridas; and by all the most authentic public acts, which have passed since His Majesty has been in possession of the said territory, this title has been preserved. It will be sufficient to mention the treaty concluded between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, in 1795, in the second article of which we read the following conclusive words: "that the southern limits of the United States, which separate them from the Spanish colonies of East and West Florida," &c. It is then proved, in the most authentic manner, the separation of West Florida from Louisiana, and their different appellations; and it is a thing generally understood that names of countries, bartered, ceded, or retroceded by a treaty, should be considered according to the general acceptation existing at the time of making the treaty; it is clear that if, in that of St. Ildefonso, it had been wished to include West Florida, it would have been expressly mentioned by the name which authenticated it, and under which it is generally known: for it would have been ridiculous to have given the name of Louisiana to that territory, because it had once formed a part of that province, as much so, as it would be at present to call the State of Ohio Louisiana; consequently, no doubt remains that, as His Majesty was in possession of the said territory, under the name and quality of West Florida, it could not be included in Louisiana; because it was in the hands of Spain on the 1st October, 1800, the epoch of the treaty of St. Ildefonso; and because the before mentioned clause of the third article, in its natural and explicit sense, excludes France from a right to West Florida.

The second clause or expression of the same article, "and which it had when France possessed it," alludes only to the manner in which France possessed it in 1763, when she delivered it to Spain; for if any other sense is given to it, that expression cannot be consistent with the anterior, which says, "with the same extent which it now has in the hands of Spain:" for if in the second clause a greater extent should be given to Louisiana than that which it had in the hands of Spain, how could it be "with the same extent it had in the hands of Spain?" It is repugnant to common sense that the delivery had to be with the same extent and with greater extent; it being with more, it could not be with the same. It is then clear that the obvious sense of both clauses together, and the only one which is not absurd and contradictory, is the following: that Louisiana was retroceded with the same extent it had in the hands of Spain in 1800, and that which it had when France possessed it, and gave it up to Spain. The expression "when France possessed it," not marking any fixed time, it is clear that it ought to be determined by the clauses of the same treaty, and interpreted in terms which will not give an absurd sense, or contradict the other expressions of the same article; since, if we should admit the expression "when France possessed it" in all its latitude, it would result that Spain had obligated herself by the third article, to give France a part of the State of Kentucky, all the State of Ohio and territory of Indiana, and that France should hold a right, by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, to resell the said States as a part of Louisiana "when France possessed it," and also to prohibit the navigation and deposite to the Americans, because that France had to receive Louisiana "as she possessed it." Absurb reasoning! which does not merit to be refuted, which arises in consequence of the undefined latitude which is pretended to be given to "when France possessed it." It is a principle incontrovertible of the law of nations, that treaties should not receive an odious or absurd interpretation, when they can admit of a clear and simple one. It would be both odious and absurd to suppose that Spain had ceded Louisiana to France, with all the extent with which she had possessed it at an epoch anterior to the treaty of 1763; for it would thence result that she had engaged to give to France part of the United States, as before mentioned; and it would be equally absurd in France, because she abandoned by the treaty of 1763 all her rights and pretensions to the country east of the Mississippi to Great Britain; and by her treaty of 1778 with the United States, she was bound in such manner that she could not acquire a territory east of the Mississippi without the consent of the United States, and only by that of conquest. At the same time, it would do very little honor to the United States to maintain an interpretation, the consequence of which would make it appear that that part of the United States formed by the Ohio, a part of Kentucky and Tennessee might be comprehended, and become the object of stipulations and cessions between two foreign Powers, such as France and Spain, who have no right to meddle with them.

The third clause of the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso is still more decisive, and offers other arguments in favor of Spain, since it says, "such as it ought to be according to subsequent treaties between Spain and other Powers." The treaties here alluded to are not, nor can be, others than those of 1783, between Spain and England, and 1795, between Spain and the United States. By the first, His Majesty acquired the territory east of the Mississippi, under the name of West Florida; and, consequently, to be "as it ought to be," since the treaty of 1793, is with the exclusion of a territory acquired at that period, and with a name so different. By the second, His Majesty permitted the deposite, and fixed the limits between Louisiana, the Floridas, and the United States, to be "as they ought to be" after the treaty of 1795, is with the exclusion of France to the rights of the United States in this treaty. And thus, as the treaty of St. Ildefonso could not affect the rights which the United States acquired by that of 1795, so neither did it affect, nor could it affect, the rights acquired by His Catholic Majesty, by the treaty of 1783 with England.

It would be unnecessary to accumulate more proofs in a case so clear in its nature: but I cannot but mention to your excellencies, in support of the unquestionable right which Spain has to the territory in question, the respectable and undeniable opinion of the celebrated geographer of the United States, Mr. Ellicot, whose knowledge and talents occasioned his being named by the Government of the United States to run the line of division between the said States, and the Spanish provinces on the south of them, according to the treaty of 1795. This person, who, perhaps, has more knowledge of what relates to the territory in question than any other, in the preface of his work, published in 1803, under the title of the "Journal of Andrew Ellicot, late Commissioner in behalf of the United States," &c. &c., speaking of the sale of Louisiana made by France, says, dated Lancaster, 22d July, 1803, "It does not appear, by the cession of Louisiana to the United States, we obtain the whole of both sides of the Mississippi: for, by consulting No. 5, of the maps, it will be seen that the island of New Orleans, which lies on the east side of the Mississippi, only extends north to Manshak; from thence, northerly, along the east side of the river, to the southern boundary of the United States, is still held by His Catholic Majesty as a part of West Florida." He again says, "the important and safe harbors in both the Floridas still remain in the possession of His Catholic Majesty." These expressions, so notable, corroborate and confirm, in the most positive manner, the incontestable right of His Catholic Majesty to all the territories which are on the east of the Mississippi, under the line of the thirty-first degree, excepting the island of New Orleans.

Besides what has been said, it cannot be doubted that the treaty of retrocession of 1800 was a contract between Spain and France; and, consequently, it was for France to have represented, in case she had not received all the territories expressed in that stipulation. And it is certain that the Prefect Laussat, charged to carry the treaty into effect, being perfectly instructed in it, and being possessed with the intentions of his Government, has expressed himself satisfied with the manner in which it was carried into effect, without his having been put into possession of the territory in question. Thus the United States, having succeeded to the rights of France, have no ground to pretend to what France has thought did not belong to her.

I could, by an accumulation of various proofs, establish in different ways the incontestable right of the King my master to West Florida; but it appears to me that what has already been said is sufficient, so as not to leave a doubt in the mind of any one who will examine the question impartially, not even in the mind of Mr. Ellicot, who, notwithstanding the love he bears to the Government that employed him, and in whose favor he has wrought, could not do less than give that just homage to truth and justice which they merit.

With assurances of my distinguished consideration, I remain, praying to God to preserve your lives many years.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, February 26, 1805.

Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Monroe present their compliments to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, and have the honor to enclose him their answer to his note of the 16th, which was prepared and intended to have been sent in yesterday. They avail themselves of the opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of his excellency's note of the 24th, received last night, respecting the eastern limits of Louisiana, to which they will pay immediate attention.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, February 26, 1805.

SIR:

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 16th instant, whose contents and tone have equally surprised us. We should consider ourselves failing in the respect which we owe to our Government, if we did not express our sentiments on it, in both respects. In so doing, it is necessary to review concisely what has already passed between us.

Your excellency will recollect that, in our interview which took place immediately after Mr. Monroe had the honor of being received by His Majesty, the objects of his mission were fully communicated, and that it was agreed that we should present to your excellency a project for the adjustment of every point, to which you were so good as to promise an early and explicit answer. In compliance with that arrangement, we did present to your excellency, on the 28th ultimo, the project which we had promised, in which we stated fully the views of our Government, with its opinion of the rights of the United States on each point, which we illustrated in those cases which had not been already exhausted, and, of course, where illustration could be necessary, or was even likely to be agreeable. We had a right to expect, and we did expect, an answer, equally full and explicit to every point. In this, however, we were disappointed. On the claims to indemnity for injuries, your excellency thought proper, it is true, to intimate, in respect to spoliations, that His Majesty was willing to ratify the convention of August 11, 1802, after the obstacles which occasioned its postponement should be removed; and, in respect to that arising from the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, that Spain was not accountable for them, but without giving any reason for the assertion. On the great question of territorial rights and limits, as on the mode of providing for their security, and, with it, the peace and harmony of our Governments, on which we did ourselves the honor to make to your excellency what we deemed liberal and salutary propositions, we received what could not be considered as an answer, since it neither rejected our propositions, offered others, nor expressed any sentiment respecting them. If it was proper to open the whole subject, as was admitted in our first interview, it was equally so to answer it. And that it was proper so to do, is not only proved by the agreement referred to, but by the situation of the two countries at the present time. The several points are, it is true, in their nature distinct; yet is obvious that the whole must be brought into view and settled together. We do not perceive the means, nor has your excellency suggested them, of adjusting a part, and leaving the others unfinished.

Although we could not but be hurt at receiving an answer so vague and unsatisfactory to our letter, yet we deemed it inconsistent with the respect we owed to both our Governments, to your excellency, and to ourselves, as with the spirit of conciliation which we wish to preserve through the negotiation, to express that sentiment. We did more; we met the invitation which your excellency seemed to give us, without, however, furnishing the example, by proceeding to explain further the views of our Government, and illustrate its rights on the two points, on which you had given any opinion. The claims to compensation for injuries arising from spoliations on our commerce, and the suppression of the right of deposite at New Orleans, had been long before our Governments, and their merits were well understood. That for spoliations, more especially, had been so fully and amply discussed, both here and in the United States, as to leave no doubt that such discussion was not necessary to enable either party to make up its mind on it.

By entering into it, therefore, we gave your excellency a convincing proof of our desire to accommodate with your wishes, in the hope that it would produce, on your part, a corresponding result. We flattered ourselves, that, as the whole subject was again presented before you, in all its points, with the explanation which you had invited on the two first, we should have received a full answer from His Majesty's Government on each, and, of course, on the whole. In this, however, we were again disappointed. We received, in substance, only the same proposition which had been made to us before, which we had, as we presumed, clearly proved to be incompatible with the rights of the United States, and the principles of justice, and which, as we had taken the liberty to inform your excellency, the repeated and recent orders of our Government prohibited us from accepting. Under these circumstances, we considered it our duty to acquaint your excellency, respectfully, that we deemed it useless and improper to prolong the discussion on that point; at the same time requesting you to be so good as to communicate the sentiments and propositions of His Majesty's Government on the whole subject, that we might see whether it would be possible, while we avoided discussions of an irritating tendency, to adopt some plan, which, by a general arrangement, might provide for this as well as the other objects, and thereby render justice in the most acceptable manner to all parties. To this proposal, the most respectful and friendly that we could make, one which is warranted by the uniform practice in similar transactions and cases of all Powers, especially the most friendly to each other, we received a letter which is addressed in a very different spirit. By it we are charged with refusing to discuss points which we had already discussed, and on which we had given to your excellency our ulterior opinion; our Government is charged with the dishonorable attempt to obtain a double indemnity for the same object; many of our citizens are denounced as unprincipled contrabandists; and others, if not the whole nation, as enthusiastic partisans, calumniators, and disfigurers of truth, for, in respect to the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, all America had but one opinion, and spoke with one voice. In the article of the press, the freedom of our internal institutions, which all nations have a right to regulate, and do regulate as suits themselves, is attacked; the right of the Intendant to suppress the deposite at New Orleans is justified; and the right itself, though stipulated and made permanent by a solemn treaty, a stipulation which had its equivalent in the other articles of the same instrument, and was otherwise prompted by the law of nature, of reason, and the interest of Spain, is represented as a gratuitous or charitable donation to the United States, which His Majesty had a right to suppress, and keep suppressed, until their Government should implore him to open it to them again. On this note, we think proper to observe that it was impossible for us to have received one which could have been more unexpected. It was the more so, because, in all our communications, we had been studious, in obedience to the orders of our Government—orders which we executed with pleasure—to manifest its high respect for His Catholic Majesty, and we were not conscious of having failed in that which we entertained for your excellency.

We forbear to make any further comment on the tone of this last note at present, because it is probable it may convey sentiments which are not entertained. We are aware that, in the zeal of an important discussion, incidents of that kind often occur, and are prompted by patriotic motives, even with those who are the most guarded. We trust that the character of the American Government and people, which is well known, and we flatter ourselves held in just estimation by other Powers, will not be injured by the spirit of conciliation and moderation which animates us on this occasion. On the presumption, therefore, that no premeditated outrage was intended, and with a sincere desire to adjust amicably the differences subsisting between our countries, we will proceed to answer the several objections urged in your excellency's last note to what we consider to be the just claims of our Government.

Your excellency insists that His Catholic Majesty is not answerable for the spoliations that were committed on the commerce of the United States, within the jurisdiction of Spain, in the course of the last war, by French cruisers and tribunals; and you urge, in support of the doctrine, first, that those claims were satisfied by the treaties which have taken place between the United States and France; second, that Spain was not in a situation to prevent those aggressions on our commerce. We will examine with candor both these pretensions, which we are persuaded it will be easy to show are unfounded. Two treaties have latterly taken place between the United States and France; the first on the 30th of September, 1800, the second on the 30th of April, 1803. Permit us to ask by which of these was such extinguishment made? If by the first, it is not likely that the subject would have been thought of in the second; if the second is relied on, it is an admission that it was not done by the first. Your excellency seems disposed to rely on both, which cannot be considered otherwise than as a proof that neither alone had done it. It is equally obvious that it was not done by both together, since, whether we examine them separately or together, they expressly preclude the idea.

By the second article of the convention of 1800 between the United States and France it is agreed, for certain considerations therein specified, to postpone their respective claims to indemnities to a more convenient time; and, by the ratification of that convention, those claims were relinquished forever on both sides.

By the fifth article of the same convention, it is agreed that certain specified claims or debts should be recoverable in the same manner as if no misunderstanding had taken place between the parties.

By the first and second articles of the second convention, entered into on the 30th of April, 1803, provision is made for the payment of the debts which were comprised under the second and fifth articles of that of 1800, whose amount, it was expressly stipulated, should not exceed twenty millions of livres.

These are the only articles in those conventions which have any reference to the point in question. If the claim of the United States on Spain for French spoliations and condemnations within her jurisdiction was satisfied by the treaties and conventions between the United States and France, it was by one of these articles. We will examine, first, that pretension, as founded on the second article of the convention of 1800. On a view of that article, and, indeed, of the whole instrument, we find that it regulates only questions and interests that were depending between the United States and France. A misunderstanding had unhappily taken place between those Powers, and it was the object of this convention to adjust it. Not the most distant allusion is made, in any article of the convention, to Spain or her concerns. Had Spain then been a party to that misunderstanding, she could not have been benefited by that convention. The reason is much stronger why she could not, as she was not a party to it, since there was no variance, and there certainly was none between the United States and Spain, it is more evident that it could not have been in the contemplation of the parties to adjust what did not exist. It may be added that if it had been contemplated to release Spain from any obligation which she owed to the United States, from any just claims which they had on her, the release would have been complete; it would have extended to every object, especially of the same kind; and settled every ground of difference between them. The fact, however, is admitted by all parties to be otherwise. It has never been contended by Spain, that the spoliations which were committed by her own people were satisfied by that convention. Hence it is clear that Spain was not discharged from the claim of the United States for French spoliations committed within her limits, by the second article of the convention of 1800. It is equally clear that she was not discharged by the first and second articles of the convention of 1803. It is evident, on a slight view of these last articles, and indeed of the whole instrument, that they had no other debts in contemplation but those which were made recoverable by the convention of 1800; that, in truth, the convention of 1803 did no more than provide funds for the payment of the debts that were due under that of 1800. Thus the claim of the United States on Spain for these spoliations was not discharged by this last convention. Other circumstances prove clearly, not only that this claim was not discharged, but that a provision or discharge of it by those conventions was not even contemplated by the parties to them. It is very well known that the Government of the United States never made a demand on that of France for the payment of these spoliations; that it always claimed the payment of Spain, and her only, considering her only as responsible for them. It is not presumable that the parties should intend to provide for a claim not made, for a debt not supposed to be due. The conduct of Spain, through the whole of this epoch, corresponds with that of the other Powers in this respect. The minister of the United States at Madrid pressed the Government of Spain for an indemnity for that and other claims. Had it been contemplated by Spain to obtain her discharge through the medium of France, her ambassador at Paris would have been seen in both those negotiations, especially that of 1800; and, had he succeeded, a provision to that effect, in explicit terms, would have been introduced into that convention. But nothing of this kind took place. Indeed, the success of such an attempt was so improbable, that it is not presumable that the idea ever occurred. With the claims that were in the contemplation of the parties, and for which France was truly answerable, it was difficult to accomplish an amicable adjustment of their differences. Had these been swelled by the addition of those on Spain, it is probable that the negotiation would have proved abortive. It was not until some years afterwards that this pretension on the part of Spain was heard of, and then it was founded on a pretext as singular as it was unexpected—that of her being released by a treaty between the United States and another Power, in which she was not even mentioned. With respect to these claims having been discharged by the convention of 1803, it has already been shown that that convention could not, by any possible construction, be considered as having any reference to the subject; it may be added, that the funds provided by it were not only intended for other objects expressly stipulated, but that there is reason to think they are not commensurate with those objects.

As to the pretension that Spain was released from this claim, by the release made to France of other claims of a similar nature, it is easy to prove that it has not the slightest foundation. It has already been shown that France was not released from this claim, because it was never made on her. We shall proceed to show that it was properly made on Spain, and that she was, and is still, answerable for it.

It will not be controverted that it is the duty of every independent state to observe, that the citizens or subjects of every other independent state are secured, in their intercourse with it, in the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges to which they are entitled by the law of nations, and treaties with such Power. This principle forms the basis on which the whole system of public law rests. It is the standard by which every question between independent Powers must be examined, and their respective rights in all cases settled.

It is equally true that, for every violation of those rights on the citizens or subjects of one independent state within the jurisdiction of another, the Government of the latter is responsible, whether the same be committed by its own people, or those of another Power. The reason of this rule is obvious. Every Government being sovereign within its own limits, the subjects of every foreign Power are regarded there for the time as its own subjects, and, as such, it is responsible for their conduct. While such Government retains its independence, it cannot divest itself of this duty, or the obligation to discharge it. The principle is the same, whether such acts be performed by the private individuals of a foreign Power, or its public agents. In the latter case, indeed, the claim to an indemnity by the party injured, on the Government under whose jurisdiction it was received, is stronger, since, being done under color of public authority, and especially if persevered in, they become the acts of the Government itself. These principles are too well established by writers on the law of nations to require further illustration.

Hence it appears clearly that Spain was answerable for French spoliations committed under her jurisdiction, in the same manner as if they were committed by her own people. To her, then, the American Government was bound to look for reparation. Whether France was eventually liable or not, it is not material to inquire. Where was the injury rendered? What Government had cognizance of the case? Whose laws were violated by the proceeding? or by whose laws was the injury permitted, or, what amounts to the same thing, suffered? By that Government is the reparation due, and by it ought it to be made. If France has actually paid any of those claims, such payment will, of course, be considered as a discharge. That the suffering individuals may have applied elsewhere and every where, to save themselves from ruin, or rather retrieve themselves from it, is possible; but neither will the course which their distresses may have compelled them to pursue, nor will the fortune of some particular applicants, in case any have succeeded, affect the merits of the present question. It is known that the sentiments and conduct of the American Government have invariably been the same on it. It has thought, in every stage, that Spain was responsible for those spoliations, and it has uniformly sought the indemnification of her, and of her alone.

If France was responsible for those claims, the injuries having proceeded from her officers and agents, it was only eventually in case satisfaction was not obtained of Spain; for, as already shown, having been committed under the jurisdiction of Spain, where she only had authority, the redress was strictly due by her. For injuries committed by a Spaniard to an American citizen at Paris, we should not think of making application for redress to the Government of Spain, nor for like injuries committed at Madrid by a Frenchman, to the Government of France. The application, in both cases, would be to the Government having jurisdiction of the territory where the offence was committed, and of course cognizance of the case, to the Government whose laws were offended, and who had the power of redress. If France was eventually answerable to us for those claims, which we deny, we admit that she was released from them by the convention of 1800. But can Spain, who was answerable primarily, if not solely, to whom application had been made, to whom it was then, and has since been, made, claim an exemption from them, under a treaty to which she was not a party, and in which her name was not even mentioned? We are of opinion, by the uniform and well established doctrine of the law of nations, by the clearest principles of justice, that she cannot.

With respect to the opinions which you have been pleased to communicate to us of the Minister of Foreign Relations, and the late ambassador of France, on this subject, we have received them with the consideration which is due to the very respectable authority from which they emanate. We are not willing to believe that they oppugn the principle above laid down, or apply to those cases which are justly chargeable on Spain, because our Government, for the reasons above stated, and by the clearest conviction, thinks otherwise. On all treaties between independent Powers, each party has a right to form its own opinion. Every nation is the guardian of its own honor and rights; and the Emperor is too sensible of what is due to his own glory, and entertains too high a respect for the United States, to wish them to abandon a just sense of what is due to their own. We do not believe that the view which our Government takes of this subject was ever presented to that of France, since we are not aware that there ever was an occasion for it. By those treaties with His Imperial Majesty, all differences between the United States and France were happily terminated, and the relations of the two countries placed on a footing of permanent friendship. In all questions growing out of them, in which France and the United States are interested, their Governments are perfectly of accord. We should regret much if they were not so, in the present case, as indeed in all others between the United States and Spain.

As to the doctrine held by certain respectable professional characters in the United States, whose opinions have been asked and given in this case, that France and Spain were associate parties in the injuries complained of, the former as principal, and the latter as accessory, we are sorry to be called on to make any remark on it. Delicacy for those gentlemen makes this an unpleasant duty. From that motive we will confine what we say to the doctrine itself. We will admit that we have not made up our minds to a censure of their conduct, since, if such an interference is justifiable under any Government, it certainly is so under that where it is their happy destiny to dwell. In noticing their opinion, we have to observe, that they have evidently mistaken the case, by applying to nations a maxim of local municipal law, which is applicable only to individuals. Among nations it is believed that there is no such thing as principal and accessory. All are principals, and are to be regarded as such, in all their transactions. In case of a war, to which there are several parties, allies on each side, nothing is more common than for one to make its peace, and withdraw from it. It was never contended that an adjustment made by one party, in such a case, or any other, settled the differences of the other party. The doctrine of principal and accessory, of a release or discharge to one Power, by virtue of an accommodation with another, was never heard of among them. Indeed, it would be strange if any one nation should undertake to adjust the concerns of another, without its authority. It would be more so if any adjustment between two parties should be so construed as to produce an important benefit to a third, not only without its authority, but the knowledge of any one of them. Suppose that an adjustment made by one of the parties for a third one, should be highly detrimental to it, would such third party be bound by it? Had France, for example, stipulated that Spain should pay for all those spoliations, and a great proportion of her own, would Spain have allowed her right to do so? Ought she, then, or has she a right to claim any advantage from a transaction to which she was not a party, by which she could not be bound, and which, in its nature, could not be reciprocal?

With respect to the plea on which the opinion of those gentlemen is, in part, founded, that Spain was not in a situation to prevent those violations of her territory by France, and is, therefore, not accountable to the United States for the injuries resulting from them, we find ourselves precluded, by the high respect which we entertain for His Catholic Majesty, from dwelling on it. We shall be permitted, however, to observe, that we utterly deny the fact. Spain was never placed in that dilemma. Having, from very remote antiquity, held a very distinguished rank among the Powers of Europe, she still enjoys it. In her late war with France, nothing occurred which placed her in the condition of a conquered nation. Her troops behaved with gallantry in the field, and her Government obtained an equal and honorable peace. If, then, she did not prevent those violations of her territory, it was not because she was not able to do it, but because they were sanctioned by some treaty which secured her, in other respects, an equivalent; or that she chose to permit them from some motive of policy at the time; in either of which cases she is responsible to the United States for the same.

We have thus answered fully the arguments urged by your excellency against the claim of the United States on Spain, to an indemnity for the spoliations on their commerce by the cruisers and tribunals of France, within the territory of Spain, in the course of the last war, and, we are persuaded, shown, in the clearest manner, that that claim is well founded. We should have gone more fully into this point on our former notes, had we not believed that it was already fully illustrated by the communications which had taken place on it between our Governments, in the United States and here, to which we beg leave to refer; a note of which latter is here annexed. We have, however, been happy, at your excellency's suggestion, to review the subject, being very solicitous to prove, on all occasions, that our Government makes no claim which is not founded in justice; and being likewise so to avail ourselves of every suitable opportunity to give new proofs of its respect for, and desire to preserve the most friendly relations with, His Catholic Majesty.

On the point respecting the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, we regret that it is altogether impossible to assent to the doctrine which is insisted on by your excellency. On a careful perusal of the treaty, we find in it nothing which justifies the idea that there ever was to have been a moment of interruption in the enjoyment of that right, either at New Orleans, or at some other suitable place on the banks of the Mississippi. It is not, it is true, stipulated that, in suppressing the existing deposite, and opening another, the Government of Spain should give notice of the design, and hold communication with that of the United States on the subject. On the other hand, it may also be said, with equal truth, that it is not stipulated, in taking that measure, that that friendly proceeding should not be observed, but that His Majesty may do it, and keep the deposite altogether suppressed until the Government of the United States should make application for the opening of it. In all such cases, the policy of the measure, the object of the treaty, and the intention of the parties, are to govern in the interpretation of it; and, by these, it appears to us to be unquestionable, that another deposite ought to have been opened at the moment the existing one was closed. It is on that principle that the United States consider themselves entitled to an indemnity for the injury which was sustained by that measure. What the precise amount of that injury may be, it is not in our power to state; from what we have understood, however, it is by no means of the trifling nature your excellency seems to suppose it. We have not sought, as an indemnity for it, any precise sum. We have only proposed that it should be referred to the judgment of impartial arbitrators, on such proof as might be presented before them, to estimate it: a proposition which we deemed too just and reasonable to admit of objection.

On the subject of limits, and others incident to it, having already stated to your excellency the views of our Government, we deem it necessary only to refer again to our former communications. As neighbors, desirous of living together in peace and friendship, it is certainly an object of essential importance to adjust and arrange these very interesting points at this time, in a clear, definite, and satisfactory manner. At an epoch so extraordinary, and big with such important events, it may be productive of much harm to leave any thing unfinished, and thereby exposed to casualty. In cases of unsettled boundary especially, where the pretensions of the parties differ, and those of either may be carried, under colorable pretexts, to great height, there is always danger, by delay, of their becoming the cause of serious controversies, and even of destructive wars. Aware of this danger, the President of the United States is sincerely desirous of averting the evil incident to it, while it is practicable. It is with that view that he has sought, by the present negotiation, to settle amicably and finally all the points depending between the two nations.

The propositions which we have had the honor to make on this point are deemed reasonable and just, and we flatter ourselves that they will be so considered by His Majesty's Government.

We have now the honor to submit to your excellency again the full view of our Government, on all the points depending between the United States and Spain, and, in so doing, consider it our duty to repeat what we stated in our former notes, that it is equally incompatible with justice, as it is with our instructions, to enter into any arrangement relative to claims for spoliations which does not provide, in some equitable and satisfactory mode, for the whole. To reserve a right, in respect to those which were committed by French cruisers and tribunals, without making any provision for it, could, at this stage, be considered in no other light than an abandonment of it. We have forborne to state, in detail, the extent of these injuries, comprising, in the whole, two hundred and seventy-two vessels and cargoes, or the aggravated circumstances attending many of them, which have involved in ruin many of our most respectable and wealthy citizens, because it has been our object rather to heal than to open wounds. It is well known that, at the time these injuries were rendered to our citizens, there did not exist, on the part of Spain, the slightest cause of complaint against the United States, whose Government, peaceable and friendly, has borne them with a patience and moderation of which history furnishes no example in equal degree. Many years have elapsed since these injuries were received; during which time, the sufferers have looked to their Government for reparation without effect. Their last hope is founded on this negotiation, and great would their astonishment and disappointment be, if they were told that more than one-half of them were to be abandoned. We repeat, however, what we took the liberty to state in our letter of the 12th instant, that, if it is possible, on being possessed of His Majesty's sentiments and propositions on the whole subject, to provide by a general arrangement for this and the other objects, in any mode consistent with our duty, which may be satisfactory to him, we shall be happy to do it.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our high consideration and respect.

CHARLES PINCKNEY,
JAMES MONROE.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, February 28, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your esteemed note of the 26th instant, in which you reply to mine of the 16th; and before I make the observations necessary in answer to the same, it appears to me indispensable to satisfy, by a separate letter, the complaints of your excellencies on the tone and expressions of my said note. The King my master being animated by the most sincere sentiments of friendship and distinguished consideration towards the United States, your excellencies will be pleased to do justice to these sentiments of His Majesty and to mine, as being persuaded that I, who have the honor to be the interpreter of them, could have no design nor the most distant idea, I do not say to injure, but even to be wanting in those manifestations of consideration and respect for the United States, and their Government, to which they are so justly entitled. Commencing with this declaration, your excellencies will permit me to examine the different expressions of my letter of the 16th, which have given rise to your complaints. Your excellencies say, in the first place, that, on my part, I impute to you a refusal to discuss some of the controverted points; but if your excellencies will take the trouble to read my note a second time, I hope you will acknowledge that I am far from imputing any thing on that subject; and that I only wished to say on it, that, while your excellencies believe it useless, or incompatible with your instructions, to continue the discussion upon the indemnifications reclaimed for injuries committed by the French privateers, as I understood by the expression of your excellencies, "it seems useless to prolong the discussions on that point," I found myself obliged to treat the subject less extensively than I thought I could, not to molest your excellencies too much on it. I am far from supposing that this could involve the smallest disrespect, as it is only reducing it to a difference of opinion, your excellencies believing that the point was sufficiently discussed, and I, that it wanted to be a little more so. In the second place, your excellencies show yourselves dissatisfied that I have expressed that the claim of your Government for satisfaction for French spoliations should go to demand two indemnities for the same debt, which expression your excellencies believe injurious to your Government: but your excellencies will permit me to observe, that to demand two satisfactions for the same thing would be dishonorable to the American Government, knowing itself already satisfied by France, should still demand satisfaction of Spain; but as your Government does not believe itself satisfied by France, it cannot be dishonorable to pursue its demand of satisfaction from Spain, while it continues in the belief that it has not received satisfaction from France. Spain, on her part, believes she has shown that the United States have received satisfaction from France, and it is in this belief she may say that the United States claim two satisfactions for the same debt; more she cannot say, nor have I said, or thought to say, that they claim it with improper designs, knowing they demand two satisfactions, or that they believe they demand more than one; in which there is nothing dishonorable: although the United States might be mistaken, as Spain believes they are, in founding her belief in reasons which I have already explained to your excellencies, and thinking, on this occasion, exactly in conformity with the opinion of the most enlightened jurists of your country.

In the third place, your excellencies complain that, in my note, I have denounced many of the citizens of the United States as contrabandists; on which your excellencies will permit me to observe, that I do not find any thing of this in my letter in positive terms, but in doubtful ones, as the expression denotes, "it will not be extraordinary;" a doubt which the representations of those employed in the royal revenue have given rise to, whose truth I do not pretend to guaranty; nor does the doubt fall upon many of the citizens of the United States, but upon some very small numbers of them, as they very often use much in this sense, although there have been but one or two cases. I do not see the injury that can arise to the American nation in expressing a doubt that there may have been some individuals concerned in contraband business, or giving pretexts to Spaniards to do so; nor have I either attempted to discriminate between the two.

In the fourth place, your excellencies complain that I have said that some of the Americans, carried away by party spirit, had calumniated Spain on account of the deposite at New Orleans, and have disfigured what has happened in the capital; and your excellencies suppose that I designed likewise, in a manner, to attribute this to the American nation, the whole of whom, you say, had but one opinion on the subject of the deposite. On this point I cannot do less than feel myself hurt at the construction which is given to my expressions: in my letter I cannot find a single expression which can have the most remote allusion on the subject, either to the American nation, or its Government; it treats only of some individuals; and so far from making the least reflection on the conduct of the American nation and its Government during the suspension of the deposite, on the contrary, I have afforded many proofs of the satisfaction the conduct of the American Government has given on that occasion; notwithstanding it is not less certain what I have said, that there were some individuals, especially some writers, who published things on that subject injurious and calumniating to Spain, and the result of which was, that some of the inhabitants of the Western States, (as was not extraordinary,) not knowing the truth of the facts, suspended the shipping their produce to New Orleans, and suffered other injuries not imputable to Spain. In the first days of the suspension of the deposite, it was published by some North American, that the navigation of the Mississippi was obstructed: this was a falsehood, whose currency was injurious to the good faith of the Spanish Government, which had stipulated for the free navigation of the said river, and at the same time was prejudicial to the inhabitants of the Western States, who, remaining in this uncertainty, did not choose to undertake a voyage of such length, while there was danger of the outlet being interrupted. Afterwards they said, and it was repeated in the writings and speeches of some individuals, that the suspension of the deposite, and what they might expect respecting the navigation, flowed from France having influenced Spain to take upon herself the odium of this measure, that France might receive Louisiana free from the obligations imposed by the treaty of 1795, than which there could be no expressions more calumniating and unjust; it being an indubitable fact, that, in the treaty of retrocession of Louisiana of the 1st October, 1800, His Majesty had taken the most scrupulous care to secure the rights of the United States in the clause of third article, which says, "telle qu'elle doit être après les traités passés subséquemment entre l'Espagne et d'autres états." As to what respected the "enthusiastic partisans" of which I spoke in my note, your excellencies will permit me to remind you, that I alluded to the attempts of some of the inhabitants of the Western States, who (as the public papers then announced) showed a disposition and design to descend to Louisiana with an armed force, and, without other legitimate authority, to take justice into their own hands; on which occasion there now exists, in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States, the representations of His Majesty's minister made to have such attempts chastised and corrected. These are the attempts to which I allude in my note of the 16th, and on no account to the conduct of the American Government and nation, which was prudent and just. But can it be denied that the consequence of these errors thus published, and which were, that some or many of the peaceable inhabitants did not carry their produce to New Orleans, are not to be, nor cannot be, attributed to the act of the Intendant, but to the occurrence which took place in the said country. There is nothing in my note which has reference to the liberty, or otherwise, of the press, nor with the institutions of the American Government, which, as your excellencies observe, every Government is free to regulate as it pleases, but I only insinuated that the writings published with this motive, gave to the Western inhabitants a wrong idea of what passed in New Orleans, and that this was not imputable to Spain, or the edict of the Intendant.

This, and this only, is all which I wished to say in my note of the 16th, in which I am extremely sensible that, contrary to my intention, your excellencies have found motives for complaint; to remove which, it appears to me proper immediately to enter into this explanation, which, although somewhat diffuse, will, I hope, have answered the end I intended. It appeared to me proper to do this in a separate letter, reserving to myself to answer, with all possible despatch and brevity, the other points contained in your excellencies' esteemed note of the 26th.

In the interim, I renew to your excellencies the demonstrations of my distinguished consideration and esteem. I pray to God to preserve your lives many years.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, March 4, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

Immediately after I received your esteemed note of the 26th ultimo, I believed it my duty not to lose a moment in replying to the complaints you had been pleased to make on some of the expressions in my note of the 16th: it not being consistent with my sentiments to let your excellencies remain for a moment in the suspicion that I was wanting, in any degree, in the respect due to the United States, or its Government, or to persons so respectable as your excellencies, not only in your individual capacities, but as representing the Government you do. I flatter myself I have removed, by my note of the 28th ultimo, all motives for those complaints; but if any doubt should still remain on that subject, I am equally ready to satisfy it, should your excellencies be pleased to express it.

This done, I proceed to examine the other points contained in your note above mentioned of the 26th. It is certain that, in my first letter of the 31st January, I did not enter upon the points in dispute between the two Governments: but it appears to me that, in the same note, I gave the reasons of my proceedings on this occasion; the object of that note was to show to your excellencies that, in my belief, it was somewhat premature to begin to examine projects of a convention upon all the points, without analyzing them first, and fixing the right of each country as far as possible: because, as your excellencies well know, before we can proceed to a convention upon the whole, it is necessary to know as distinctly as we can what are the rights and obligations of His Majesty and the United States. This knowledge of the detail ought to be the beginning of the negotiation; because it is clear that, according to the extent, which they suppose the rights or obligation of each party ought to have, so ought the convention for the whole to be the more or less enlarged. This is what I believed your excellencies wished to remark in your first note, by the following expressions: "each of the depending points between the two Governments ought to be examined impartially, and all motives of complaint and inquietude considered and terminated amicably, and to do which it is necessary to determine the respective rights," &c. Understanding it thus in my first note, I did nothing more than enumerate the points on which it appeared to me we had to fix our respective rights, and to request your excellencies' opinion as to the order in which they should be treated. In my second of the 10th ultimo, I spoke of the reclamations for injuries committed by the individuals of both nations, and told your excellencies that His Majesty was disposed then to terminate this point; and at the same time spoke, but not extensively, of the damages committed by the French privateers. In my third note of the 16th, not to molest your excellencies too much, I touched shortly on the same subject, and treated of the damages occasioned by the suspension of the deposite; and, lastly, under date of the 24th, I commenced the examination of the limits of Louisiana, with those which relate to the Eastern boundary.

In the context of all the letters together, and of that which I promise to transmit, respecting the western limits of Louisiana, I hope your excellencies will see I have not omitted entering upon all the points contained in your esteemed notes, only with the difference alluded to from the beginning, that it appeared to me most proper and clear to treat each point separately, according to its different nature.

It is true that, to the present time, I have not been able to say to your excellencies, as you wish, what is the disposition of His Majesty upon the whole; but the reason is, as I have thought from the beginning, that it is not possible for His Majesty to determine what part he will adopt upon the whole, without being clear what are his rights or what his objections on each particular point. This examination being made, your excellencies ought not to doubt that His Majesty will be ready to enter upon such a convention as shall be judged proper to conclude the claims and promote the interest of both parties. The King wishes to give proofs of his friendship and good neighborhood to the United States, and to fix them in the most permanent manner.

Having said this, and proceeding in the order of the notes which have passed between us, I must stop to remark a little on the reflections which your excellencies have made, as to the assertion that Spain is persuaded that the United States are satisfied for the damages occasioned by French cruisers in her ports and on her coast. Your excellencies wish to know by which of the conventions that have been made between France and the United States, Spain believes these damages to have been satisfied. I answer by that of 1800, and by the context of its ratification. In speaking of the second convention, it is only, as your excellencies yourselves say on this subject, an explanation or compliance with the first; or, to go to the point at once, one of the reasons which convinces Spain and induces her to believe that she is not responsible for the damages occasioned by French cruisers in her ports and on her coasts, is, that it is notorious that the United States have agreed with France to consider themselves as satisfied for all the damages they have received from her (France) during the last war.

It is true, in the convention no mention was made of Spain; because, in the manner in which they treated, it was absolutely superfluous to do so, and the high contracting parties considering it so, omitted without doubt to mention that which, by the nature of things, could not be less than a necessary and inevitable consequence of what they stipulated. Nothing is more common in law, than that an act between two parties may be, by its nature, and even independent of the will of the contracting parties, general to a third: for example, if a creditor releases a debtor what he owes him, this act between the two is general to the security of the debtor, who, by the nature of things, remains released, although no mention is made of him, and, what is more, although both creditor and debtor have wished that he should not be released; because, by the nature of things, it is impossible the security should remain when the principal obligation has disappeared. In the same point of view ought to be considered the obligation of Spain, if ever there did exist any from her to the United States, with respect to the damages committed within her jurisdiction by French privateers. France was the offender, and, of consequence, the obligation, and the act or agreement which released France, extinguished the obligation, which was one and indivisible, as justly observe the learned gentlemen of Philadelphia. The release of this claim supposes the same thing as the receipt of satisfaction, and no other can be demanded without requiring two satisfactions for the same offence, which are the identical words of the said learned gentlemen, (from whose answer I took them, when I inserted them in my note of the 16th,) and as the same gentlemen observe, if the Power A (that is, Spain) was yet responsible, and paid to B, (the United States,) Spain could then apply to France to be reimbursed, as she was the offender, and France would not gain any thing by the release of the United States, which would become, by this indirect mode, null; and as it is very evident every legitimate act ought to carry with itself every thing that is necessary for its validity, it is undoubted that the convention between the United States and France ought to be general to Spain, as much as is necessary for its validity, that is, absolving her from her responsibility, if she had any; because, on the contrary, by the United States reclaiming against Spain, and Spain against France, the latter would, by this indirect mode, have at last to pay for the damages occasioned by her privateers.

Your excellencies knowing well the force of this reasoning, attempt now to establish that Spain is the principal obliged for the said damages; that her obligation is not accessory, as presume the learned gentlemen of Philadelphia, who you say have confounded the case, applying the maxims of municipal law to nations, among which there is no such thing known as principal and accessory; and, finally, your excellencies deny that France can be responsible for the damages committed by her privateers on the coast and in the ports of Spain, and admit that at the most, it can only be eventually so. But I cannot for my part conceive how these assertions can be supported. In the first place, I am persuaded that the principles of universal justice, on which the learned gentlemen have founded their opinion, is as applicable to nations as individuals: nations as well as individuals are bound by them; if an individual releases a debtor nothing can be demanded of the security; so if a nation confesses itself satisfied for a claim it had against another, the same cannot be repeated against a third, although she bore a part in the responsibility; the reason of this is not a principle of municipal law, as you say, but an eternal and imprescriptible principle of universal justice, which is, that two satisfactions cannot be demanded for the same debt. Your excellencies say among nations, that they know nothing of such thing as principal and accessorial obligations, but I do not agree to this. Among nations, as among individuals, they may have accessorial obligations, by mutual agreement, and also by the nature of things, since if two nations agree in an act from which results responsibility, for example, an injury or spoliation, it is indispensable that the responsibility and the obligation shall be proportioned to the intervention each party had in it; that which committed the injury shall be first responsible; that which did not avoid it when she could and might, shall have less responsibility, having had less to do in committing the act, and this second responsibility may be called accessorial, or eventual, if your excellencies prefer that term: in which I observe, that if your excellencies acknowledge the possibility that there might be eventual obligations between nations, I do not know how you can refuse to admit the possibility of accessorial obligations; as, to my judgment, it is the same idea, but only expressed by different words. But, in the present case, if we were even to suppose that Spain and France, the first accessory, and the latter principal, associated, and both being principals, it will come to the same thing; the obligation having disappeared by the payment of France, Spain remains released, as the obligation was one and indivisible.

Your excellencies will say that in the case on which we treat, Spain was the principal, and not only so, but the only one bound: but to me it is inconceivable how Spain can be considered, in any manner, as the only one bound, because it is not possible to imagine how France, who was not at war with the United States, could seize, condemn, and appropriate American property without incuring some responsibility on her part; it would be a case never seen or heard of and which combats all principles, and is contrary to common sense. We will see, at least, if Spain can be said to be the principal obliged.

It is evident that the obligation which an offender has to repair his offence, and the right the offended has to demand reparation, arise in the same moment that the offence is committed. Let us apply this principle to what has occurred with respect to French cruisers and the American vessels. Spain was in alliance with France, and the two at war with Great Britain; of consequence, the French had a right to arm privateers, and the Government of Spain to permit them to arm in her ports. They armed against the subjects of Great Britain; but when they went out, they committed infractions, and violated the rights of other nations; and these are things which in reality the Government of Spain neither could foresee nor check. It results from this that these offences existed and might exist before Spain knew any thing of it, and that, of consequence, the right of satisfaction existed before she had knowledge of the fact, and existed against the aggressor, which, without doubt, constitutes the principal obligation. When Spain might, if at all, with more propriety, be considered as accessory, was after her knowledge of the offence: but in reality she ought not even then to be considered as such, because the injury terminated and was completed by the definitive sentence which took place in the tribunals of France, in which they efficaciously and finally decided the sale of American vessels. In proof that the Americans who were injured considered this subject under this aspect, we find the tribunals of cassation full of the demands of those interested in vessels taken within the jurisdiction of Spain, and that these applications are supported, as I am informed, by the officers of the American agents in France; but as, when they pleased, it is evident that the United States, not being at war with France, always had the door open to commence their reclamations against her, this circumstance in the present case constitutes a most essential difference.

1st. Because the offender not being at war with the United States, could not be less than the first, if not the only one responsible for the illegitimate act.

2d. Because the United States had the door open to make the demand of the Government of France, and thus had direct communication with the offender, which could not be the case if war was declared.

3d. That Spain not considering the United States as in war with France, could not foresee the excesses that cruisers armed in her ports against England might commit against American citizens, nor less avoid the definitive sentences of the tribunals of France which completed the offence. Besides, it is well known that, among civilized nations, it is customary to demand from privateers a bond or security that they shall not cruise except against the enemies of the state; and as this bond or security could not exist but in France, it is a proof that it is there they ought to go to seek the responsibility, that is, in France; and the United States having renounced this, or being satisfied for these damages, nothing can be demanded of Spain. If upon this point there could remain any doubt, the positive affirmation of the Government of France, that they are satisfied is sufficient to make it vanish. The Government of France ought to know without doubt, what were the offences she satisfied, by the convention of 1800; and it is not credible she would venture to say it was concluded, without a strong and intimate persuasion and conviction it was so, and which comes with great force from a third Power, who does not find herself immediately interested in the present discussion, as are Spain and the United States. On the other hand the information of France is of the greatest importance to establish the rights of Spain in this case: because if we suppose for a moment that Spain did pay to the United States the damages arising from the spoliations of the French privateers, there is not the least doubt she would immediately apply to France to be reimbursed; but she would, in reply, very justly refuse the reimbursement, saying that Spain had done wrong to make the payment, as France had previously communicated to her that the United States had been satisfied.

I have not attempted to avail myself of the argument, as your excellencies seem to suppose, that Spain could not prevent the injuries committed against the American vessels, although it was in a great measure the case; because it was not possible to prevent injuries of which we had no knowledge, such as the French privateers committed, which were armed in our ports against the English: my defence is founded in the assertion that the said damages are already satisfied by France, and so did the learned gentlemen of Philadelphia understand it, when, in their argument, they say, "but even leaving impossibilities out of the question, and admitting that the power A could have prevented the injury which was committed by the power C, in that case the power A is no longer liable to any responsibility in damages on account of its acquiescence."

I have insisted principally on this method of defence, because, founding it in an act clear and notorious, and of the most easy examination, it appeared to me to be the most convenient to repel a claim which Spain could oppose with many other reasons and arguments.

It is not demonstrable that a nation is obliged to satisfy the damages and injuries committed on her coast by the subjects of other Powers, and cases without number might be cited to the contrary among civilized nations. Denmark had her ports open during the last war to the belligerent Powers, and condemnations of prizes were made in them without there being, on this account, any responsibility demanded of her; many other neutral Powers suffered, during the same war, various damages from the French cruisers on the coast and in the ports of Spain, without having demanded any other thing of Spain, than to interpose her good offices, and co-operate in obtaining redress for the injury. Spain, when she has been injured, has not demanded such indemnifications, and has only demanded that the Government whose flag or coasts have been violated should pass efficacious offices for the reparation of the offence. This, and this only, is all to which Spain obliged herself by the sixth article of the treaty with the United States, in which, after offering defence and protection reciprocally for the vessels of both countries within the extent of their respective jurisdictions, it says, that, in case of offences of the nature of which we treat, each Power in whose jurisdiction it is committed, shall employ all its efforts to recover and have restored to the lawful owners, the vessels or effects which have been taken within the extent of its jurisdiction; from which it results, that the only thing which it can be pretended Spain has obliged herself to, is to employ all her efforts to recover and have restored the vessels and effects so taken; but in no degree exists any obligation in her to make reparation, should such efforts not produce the desired effect: because if it had been the intention of the high contracting parties to do this, it would have been expressly stipulated. As, on account of this article, your excellencies pretend to be persuaded that Spain is the only one responsible for the excesses of the French privateers, I could not omit observing that the obligation of the Power which has to restore could not but be greater, and more principal, than that whose obligation only is reduced to the making efforts that they might be restored; and that France being in the first case, and Spain in the second, it cannot but follow that the principal obligation rests on the first, and only that of accessory on the second.

Proceeding now to the damage occasioned by the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, I will endeavor, also, to answer, with the utmost brevity possible, your excellencies' remarks in your esteemed note. In the first place, your excellencies will permit me to declare, that I see with regret that, in what I said in mine of the 16th, as to the deposite at New Orleans, being a generous and gratuitous concession of His Majesty, and other parts of my letter, I did not explain myself as I wished. Your excellencies understood that I wished to say that the deposite, not only in the capital, but on any other point on the banks of the Mississippi, was a charitable donation of His Majesty, revocable at pleasure, either before or after the three years fixed for its being at New Orleans; and that it might remain revoked until the United States implored His Majesty anew to restore it. It is not honorable to me, that such assertions should be attributed to me; I said, and it was my intention to say, that, in its origin, the right of the deposite granted to the United States in New Orleans flowed from a wish in His Majesty to grant it generously, and oblige himself to maintain it there for three years, as a convenience to the United States. Nothing is more common than for a nation to impose on itself an obligation, gratuitously, in favor of another, without more interest than the satisfaction of having done it a useful service without injury to itself. After making the stipulations and conclusion of the treaty of 1795, there was, no doubt, an obligation to maintain and comply with it; but, in the case of the deposite, there are two things essentially distinct, which ought to be considered: the deposite at New Orleans, and the indefinite deposite in some other place on the banks of the Mississippi. The three years being over, and injury arising to the royal revenue from the continuance of the deposite at New Orleans, to have continued it there notwithstanding, cannot be considered less than as a favor of the King my master, because no obligation existed on his part to do so; and, if the United States had desired that the deposite at New Orleans should have continued in a manner not precarious, but established and obligatory, it was necessary to have a new stipulation, because His Majesty was not obliged to do so. At present, as to what regarded the right of deposite in the other place, the United States did not require a new stipulation, because they had it by the treaty; but as the new place was not established by the treaty, it is clear the United States had to ask the fixing of it on the spot which they thought convenient, or the two Governments had to understand each other in the establishing it; for, as it was to be fixed to the satisfaction of the American Government, Spain could not do it alone, or without saying what were the qualities it ought to have to answer their ends. The difficulty is not in this, which is in itself simple, but, it is in examining its situation after the end of the three years in the capital, and the other four years in which His Majesty generously continued it there, being under no obligation to suffer the inconveniences which were encountered in the said four years. And the question now is, whether he could or not suspend the deposite in New Orleans, before agreeing with the parties, concerning the fixing another; or, in other words, if, after the conclusion of the three years of the deposite at New Orleans, the King was obliged to suffer the inconveniences of its continuation, until they could enter into a convention or agreement respecting another place; or further, if the United States could, in rigorous justice, be made to suffer the intervening inconveniences of the suspension for the time necessary for the two Governments to agree upon the fixing it. The treaty says nothing of this, and I hope I have shown that good neighborhood and friendship should have permitted, for a short time, the inconvenience of the deposite at New Orleans, before proceeding to suspend it; and, for this reason, His Majesty revoked the edict of the Intendant. But speaking of what, in rigorous justice, can be supposed to be due to the solicitude of being indemnified for the same, I am of opinion, that, as the treaty said nothing about it, His Majesty was not obliged to continue the deposite at New Orleans, nor to suffer its inconveniences; although he was bound to consent to its establishment in another place, on which His Majesty could not determine alone, it being necessary that it should be fixed equally to the satisfaction of the United States. I repeat, that it is not my intention to approve the conduct of the Intendant, nor to diminish the rights of the United States under the treaty, but to examine points unsettled in it, and to deduce from thence whether Spain was or was not liable for the indemnifications arising out of the suspension of the deposite at New Orleans; an examination which may, in my opinion, have been excused, from the short duration of the existence of the injuries which might be considered as really attributable to the edict of the Intendant.

I beg your excellencies to accept the assurances of my respect, and hope that God will preserve your lives many years.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, March 8, 1805.

SIR:

We have now the honor to answer your excellency's note, of the 24th ultimo, respecting the eastern limits of Louisiana, the receipt of which has been already acknowledged.

We are happy to find that we shall not differ as to the material facts on which the question depends, to wit, that France held Louisiana prior to the treaty of 1763, to an extent eastwardly to the Perdido, comprising in it the greater part of West Florida; that she ceded it, by that treaty, to Great Britain, who, in 1783, ceded it to Spain, Spain having possessed herself of it by her arms in the course of that war; that the treaties referred to in that of St. Ildefonso, whereby Spain ceded Louisiana to France, as having passed subsequently between Spain and the other Powers, are that of 1783, between Great Britain and Spain, whereby the former ceded to the latter that portion of Louisiana called by her West Florida, and that between the United States and Spain, in 1795. None others were made by Spain relative to that object; they, therefore, only could be referred to. We admit, also, that they were referred to by a real and sufficient motive.

We are also happy to find that we shall not differ in opinion on the principles of the law of nations, or the rules by which treaties are to be construed under them, especially the following, to wit, that treaties must not have an odious or absurd construction, when it is possible to give them a plain and simple one; that the intention of the party to a treaty is to be collected from the whole article; that each clause is to be taken into view, and the import of the whole collected from that of each clause; and that no part is to be supposed superfluous to which a rational meaning can be given.

We should be happy if we could agree in the application of these facts and principles to the point in question. We draw, however, from them, by the clearest evidence and most satisfactory reasoning, a conclusion, that, under the treaty between the United States and France of 1803, which is founded on that of St. Ildefonso, between Spain and France, in ——, West Florida was comprised in the cession of Louisiana to the United States. Your excellency, it appears, is of a contrary opinion.

Before we proceed to the inquiry, and to answer your excellency's note, we think proper to premise that it would have been more agreeable to the United States to have obtained the cession of that province of France, by a short definition of its boundaries; since, in that case, they would have known distinctly what they had acquired, and avoided the necessity of a discussion with Spain. But as these had not been traced between France and Spain, it was impossible to give such a definition. It was therefore agreed that France should cede to the United States precisely what she had acquired of Spain; and, that the extent of that cession might be known, that the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, between France and Spain, should be inserted in that of Paris between the United States and France. Thus, that article, and it alone, became the extent of the right which the United States had thus acquired. There is nothing in the treaty, nor did any thing occur in the negotiation, to detract from its just and rational import. The United States were at liberty, as France would have been, had the cession not been made, to examine, under it, the extent of their rights, and, in so doing, to appeal to those facts and principles, which, in the estimation of the enlightened and impartial world, ought to govern in the case. It is by this investigation that the Government of the United States has formed its opinion of their rights; and it is from a regard to justice, and motives of respect to His Catholic Majesty, that they are now made the subject of amicable discussion with his Government. Having made these remarks, we proceed in the proposed inquiry.

We observe that your excellency relies much, in support of the pretensions of Spain, in the point in question, on the import of the term "retrocede," which is found in the treaty; that you consider it as going far to decide the question in her favor. We cannot but express our surprise that such reliance, or indeed that any, should be put on a term, vague and equivocal, at best, which, it is easy to show, neither has, nor was intended to have, any influence in the question. If it were of any importance to analyze that term, it might be contended, that, as France once possessed that province, a cession of it back to her, by any Power who had obtained it of a third, was a retrocession of it. By ceding it back to France, the former proprietor, it would, in respect to her, be a retrocession, although not one acre of it had been received of her by the Power making it; and it is very likely, under such circumstances, that such would have been the title of the treaty, or the phraseology of the article applicable to the subject. In the present case, all the territory which was ceded back to France had belonged to her before. Nineteen-twentieths of it, supposing West Florida to be a part, had been previously ceded by her to Spain, and that twentieth part had been ceded by her to another Power, to accommodate Spain, of whom Spain had obtained it. Was it not natural, then, when Spain ceded back this territory to France, that the term retrocession should be made use of? Had it been the object and studious endeavor of the parties to characterize in the treaty the former propositions and transactions respecting the territory, and no more could have been intended, it is not known how, even with the import annexed to the term by your excellency, a more suitable or just one could have been adopted for the purpose. But, as already observed, this term is of no real importance in the case, nor was it intended to have any by the parties, in the sense alluded to, as is perfectly evident by the other parts of the article. We find in it three distinct members or clauses, which were introduced for the express purpose of explaining what was intended to be done. By these, is fully and accurately defined what proportion of that province should be transferred to France, and what other proportion of it should be exempted from the operation of the treaty. If it had been intended that the term "retrocede" should be understood in the sense insisted on by your excellency, it is presumable that none others would have been used, since, not being necessary to illustrate, they could only serve to obscure and perplex. The introduction, therefore, of other clauses, plainly proves that that term was not to be relied on as expounding the object of the parties, but that those clauses were to do it. It will not be denied, that, although the title of the treaty might be what it is said to be, under the term "retrocede," introduced in every page, and although Spain had never received one acre of the territory from France, she might, nevertheless, by suitable operative clauses, convey and transfer to France all that portion of Louisiana which she possessed, if she was so disposed.

It is by the operative clauses of every treaty, and of every article in each, that their meaning is expounded. It is to them that we must respectively refer, in the present instance, for the intention of the parties in that of St. Ildefonso, and the extent of the rights of the United States acquired under it.

By the first clause of the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, Spain cedes to France the province of Louisiana, "such as it is in the hands of Spain." It is to be observed, that the reference here made to that province was in its integral state, that is, while in the possession of France, and, of course, prior to the cession made of it by her in 1763, as will be more fully seen by the next clause. The simple question, then, on this clause is, what portion of Louisiana was in the hands of Spain when the treaty of St. Ildefonso was formed? All that portion, be it what it might, was clearly and positively comprised in the cession, and transferred to France; all that portion, be it what it might, not in the hands of Spain, was as clearly and positively excluded from it. This is the plain and obvious import of the clause; indeed, it admits of none other; by adhering to which, every thing of an absurd and odious tendency is avoided, simplicity in the construction is preserved, and, what is of equal importance, the integrity and fair intentions of the parties are manifested. All that portion of Louisiana, according to its ancient limits, which lies eastward of the Mississippi, from the 31st degree of north latitude to the northern limits of the United States, had been ceded, by the treaty of 1763, to Great Britain, to which France, Spain, and Portugal were parties, and afterwards confirmed by her to those states, at the close of the war of their revolution, in 1783, to which France, by her treaty with those states, in 1778, had already renewed her special sanction, as did Spain afterwards, by her treaty in 1795, with the addition of the right of deposite at New Orleans. It would, therefore, have been highly improper in the parties to the treaty of St. Ildefonso, to have formed it in such manner as to have admitted the cession to have applied, by any possible construction, to any part of the territory or rights belonging to it. Accordingly, we find, by the clear and obvious import of the article, that such a construction is altogether and absolutely precluded, and by terms the most suitable and judicious that could have been selected. We find, also, that the article is equally clear and explicit as to the position of the province which it was intended to cede. By ceding that portion, and that only, which was in her hands, Spain did what she had a right to do, and no more, of which a very distinct idea was conveyed in both respects. She excepted from the cession all the territory above described, which, of right, ought to have been excepted. She comprised in it all that she had a right to cede, including, of course, as being her property, and in her hands, West Florida.

In the second clause, the cession is further explained and confirmed in the following terms: "such as it was when France possessed it;" by which a clear and explicit reference is made to the province, at a period preceding the treaty of 1763, when France possessed the whole. This clause would, of course, have been understood to have comprised the whole, had no part been specially excepted from the cession. But we have already seen, that, by the operation of the first clause, all that portion of the province, according to its ancient limits, as known before the treaty of 1763, now belonging to the United States, was clearly excepted from it. In every other respect, however, its operation is uncontrolled. It certainly comprises all that part which was then in the possession of Spain, from whatever Power, or by whatever means, obtained. By referring to it, at an epoch anterior to the treaty of 1763, that is, when France possessed it, it was obviously the intention of the parties to reject all idea of subsequent divisions, modifications, or applications, by either of the Powers who were since possessed of it. It was well known that Great Britain had called that portion which was ceded to her by the treaty of 1763, West Florida; and it was probable that Spain might have called some other portion of it, adjoining Mexico, by some other name. Hence, it was possible, if, by any construction, an allusion to the province had been admitted at any period after 1763, that these distinctions and terms might have created some embarrassment in the meaning. To avoid that danger, it was deemed advisable to go back to an anterior epoch, and thereby put them entirely out of the question. This clause, then, shows still more clearly, that it was the intention of the parties to include West Florida in the cession, since, by taking them together, and giving to each and both their just construction, it is impossible to mistake their meaning. By the first, all that portion of Louisiana which was in the hands of Spain was transferred to France; but, as it was possible, for reasons just mentioned, that doubts might arise whether West Florida was comprised in the cession, by this it is expressly declared that no part of the province in the hands of Spain, which France had ever possessed, should be exempted from it.

By the third clause of the article, the cession of the province is declared to be in an extent "such as it ought to be after the treaties passed, subsequently, between Spain and other Powers." The treaties referred to here are, that between Great Britain and Spain, in 1783, whereby West Florida was ceded to the latter; and that between Spain and the United States, in 1795, whereby the boundary adopted in their treaty with Great Britain, with the right to the free navigation of the Mississippi, and of deposite at New Orleans, were established. What, then, is the effect of this third clause? To us, nothing can be more simple or intelligible. We will first examine it in reference to the first treaty, which alone creates the difficulty. By that, Spain became possessed of a portion of the province of Louisiana, which she had not acquired of France; by means whereof, such addition is brought within the scope of the two first clauses, already noticed, and is transferred by them to France. It is brought within the scope of the first, because "it is in the hands of Spain." It is brought within the scope of the second, because it is a part of the province, "such as it was when France possessed it;" and by the terms of this last or third clause, it is expressly designated as a portion of the territory which it was intended to cede, by that treaty, to France. If we examine impartially the import of these terms, we shall find that it is impossible to give them any other rational interpretation in reference to this object. The terms are, "such as it ought to be after the treaties passed subsequently between Spain and other Powers." This portion, having been a part of the province when France possessed it, and being now, by the treaty of 1783, vested in the hands of the same Power who held every other part, not expressly excepted from it as belonging to and secured to the United States, by many treaties, as already stated, ought to be considered as a part of it again. Had Spain possessed, and ceded that portion of Louisiana to Great Britain, by the treaty of 1783, or at any time before that of St. Ildefonso, this clause would have exempted it from the cession, as would both the others. Being out of the possession of Spain, those clauses could not have operated on it; and being ceded by Spain to another Power, in a treaty passed subsequently, that is, after 1763, the cession would have been sanctioned by this clause. But Spain did not cede that territory to Great Britain; on the contrary, she acquired it of her; and it is inconceivable to us, how that acquisition, which brought it into her possession, and subjected it to the control of the two first clauses, should be supposed to have exempted it from such control; how a treaty, which enlarged the limits of the province in her hands, without producing any other effect, should be construed as lessening the extent of the cession. The reference made by this clause to the treaty of 1783 must be considered as intended to produce an effect in the present one, correspondent with the spirit of that of 1783. It would be strange, indeed, if it counteracted that spirit, and produced an opposite effect. And in judging of the effect which it was thus intended to produce, not only the spirit of that treaty is to be regarded, but this clause must be construed in connexion with the preceding ones, so as to give them their just effect also. It is a well known rule in the construction of treaties, that "the interpretation ought to be made in such a manner that all the parts appear consonant to each other; that what follows agrees with what went before, at least, if it does not manifestly appear, that, by the last clause, something was changed that went before." If we apply this rule to the present case, the conclusion is unavoidable, since, by the construction we contend for, all the clauses have their just import, are consonant to each other, unite in the same object, and produce the same effect; which is to show that it was the intention of the parties to comprise West Florida in the cession.

With respect to the effect of this clause on the other treaty referred to in it, to wit, that of 1795 between the United States and Spain, it is obvious, that it was the intention of the parties to secure to those States, in the hands of the new proprietor, the rights which they had acquired on that territory by that treaty. It was, it is true, impossible for those parties, or any others, in any treaty between them, to destroy the rights of a third one. It was, nevertheless, very proper and honorable in them to insert a provision in this, for the security of those rights. Having thus examined carefully and impartially the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, under which France ceded to the United States the province of Louisiana, and, as we presume, proved incontestably, by a just construction of the several clauses, that West Florida was a part of the cession, we will now proceed to notice some of the other remarks of your excellency which merit a more particular attention.

Your excellency observes, that, as the territory in question, to wit, that lying between the river Iberville and the Perdido, was called by Great Britain West Florida after it was ceded to her by the treaty of 1763, and as that name had been preserved to it by His Catholic Majesty in the title to his Governor at the Havana, since it came into the hands of Spain, it cannot be considered as comprised in the cession to France by the treaty of St. Ildefonso. But we have already shown, and we presume satisfactorily, that that objection is altogether unfounded, supposing the fact as thus stated to be correct in both cases; though it is proper to observe, that we had understood that the territory in question had been governed as a part of Louisiana after the treaty of 1783. Be that, however, as it may, it is proved, by referring to Louisiana at a period when it was possessed by France to characterize the cession made, that it was an essential object of the two first clauses to get rid of that objection; and that they have done so as effectually as if that division or name had never existed. It was also observed, that any construction of those clauses which should comprise West Florida within the cession, might, with equal propriety, be considered as applicable to all that portion of Louisiana which lies within the limits of the United States. We cannot perceive on what principle this remark is founded, since, as the facts are different, there is certainly no analogy in the cases. To support the doctrine, it ought to be shown, that West Florida is not in the possession of Spain, but of the United States, or some other Power. We have shown, by a fair construction of the clauses, that it is by virtue of that portion of the province being in the possession of Spain, that it was comprised in the cession; and by virtue of the other portion of it, that is, what belongs to the United States, being out of the possession of Spain, that it was excluded from it.

Your excellency observes, also, that if it had been the intention of the parties to include West Florida in the cession, it would have been easy to have expressed it. We do not know that it would have been possible to have expressed it in a more clear manner than is done; we are satisfied that other terms more comprehensive, and guarded in reference to all the objects which it was proper the parties should have in view, more intelligible, less free from objection, and, at the same time, so concise, could not have been found. With strict propriety may we say, that if it had been the intention of the parties to exclude West Florida from the cession, it was very easy to have done it, and that the means were obvious, since it was only necessary to have stated, that Spain retroceded to France that portion of Louisiana only which she had received from her. Had that been done, there would have been no occasion for the subsequent clauses, especially the two first, to explain the meaning of the parties, and define the extent of the cession. We might add, that, if the case admitted of any doubt, which, however, we deny, for, in our judgments, there never was a clearer one taken into consideration, from the nature of the transaction, that doubt ought to operate against Spain, since it is a well established doctrine of the law of nations, in the construction of treaties, that in all cases of cessions or grants, "if the party making them fails to explain himself clearly and plainly, it is the worse for him: he cannot be allowed to introduce subsequent restrictions which he has not expressed." We do not, however, think that the present case admits of any doubt.

We cannot suppose that the French prefect, M. Laussat, had any instructions from his Government by what limits he was to receive the province of Louisiana from the officers of Spain, or that he had its orders to surrender it to the United States by any of a definite nature. This opinion is founded on the treaty between the United States and France, by which the cession was made to those States, and in which no limits were defined, for the reasons stated in the commencement of this note. We entertain, as already observed, a very high respect for His Imperial Majesty, and we can never believe that he would, by any act of his, be willing to invalidate any of the rights which the United States had acquired under that treaty.

With respect to the opinion entertained by Mr. Ellicot on this point, we have only to observe, that, although we believe him to be a good astronomer and geographer, we are far from considering him in the light of an able civilian. It is presumed that he ran the line between the United States and Spain correctly, in the case alluded to, and that his charts may also be correct; but we doubt whether he ever read with attention either of the treaties on which the present question depends, or would be an able expounder of them, if he had. In making his book, which it appears he had completed before he was acquainted with the cession of Louisiana to the United States, or with the nature of that made by Spain to France, which was then for the first time known, it was natural that he should consult the old maps of the country, and regard the divisions that were made of it prior to that epoch, especially in conformity to the treaty of 1763. Under such circumstances, and in consideration that this question depends on treaties, your excellency will, we presume, see the evident impropriety of paying that deference to Mr. Ellicot's opinion which you have been disposed to allow it.

We have read, with much attention, your excellency's note of the 4th, on the subject of French spoliations committed within the limits of Spain, and are sorry to find, that the opinions which we respectively entertain on it are as remote from an accord as they were in the commencement. We have read with equal attention, your remarks on that of the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, in which you do not seem to assent to the ideas which we deemed justly applicable, and thought it our duty to express, relative to that interesting and unexpected occurrence. Having said all that we have to observe on those points in our former notes, and having communicated fully our sentiments in this, as in that first presented, respecting the eastern limits of Louisiana, it remains that we should now proceed to the last topic depending between us, to wit, the western limits of that province. Having already had the honor to present our view of the rights of the United States on that point also, we shall be happy to be favored with that of your excellency on the same.

We avail ourselves of this occasion to observe, that we received with much pleasure your excellency's note of the 28th ultimo, in reply to our remarks on that of the 16th, the purport of which was further confirmed in that of the 4th, since it gives us the very satisfactory assurance, that it was not your intention, by any expressions in that note, to convey the unfavorable sentiments in regard to our Government and country, which we had supposed it did. It was with much reluctance, that we communicated to your excellency the impression which that note made on us, which we certainly should not have done had we not believed that it would have produced a similar one on our Government, on whom, we were persuaded, it was neither your wish nor intention to produce it. The frank and honorable explanation which you have given us in that respect, is a full confirmation of what we had anticipated on that head, and an ample assurance that, whatever may be the result of this business entrusted to us, we shall carry with us the sentiments of that high respect and consideration for your character which it justly merits.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our high consideration and respect.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, March 14, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your esteemed letter of the 8th, in which you are pleased to answer mine of the 24th ultimo, relative to the limits of Louisiana, and I cannot do less than immediately to reply to it.

I agree at once with your excellencies, that treaties ought not to receive odious and absurd interpretations, which are capable of clear and simple ones, and that the intention of the parties ought to be collected from the whole context, and from each article: from these principles and mode of examination of the third article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, I deduce consequences from the same, very different from those which your excellencies have done.

Your excellencies believe to be of very little importance to the decision of the present question the word "retrocede" or "retrocession," which is the title of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and is found in the said third article, and suppose it a term vague and equivocal, which has no influence on the question; and that, if it had been important to analyze it, it might be easily made to appear that with the expression "retrocede," it also intended to denote that West Florida, or a part of it, ought to return to France, although she had not ceded it to Spain. For my part, I cannot but be surprised that your excellencies should consider vague and indeterminate an expression which serves to denominate the treaty, whose title literally copied is as follows: Traité préliminaire et secret entre la république Française at Sa Majesté Catholique, touchant l'agrandissement de Son Altesse Royale le Duc de Parma, en Italie, et la rétrocession de la Louisiane," and which governs the whole proceeding, and is conspicuous in all the clauses of the third article of the said treaty. On a single reading of this article, there is no one but must know that, according to grammatical order, and the common use of language and words, the words "to engage to retrocede" is the principal action of it, and this principal intention is conspicuous through all the context and clauses of the article; and that, although the following expressions may modify it, they can in no degree contradict it without giving to the whole an absurd meaning, and as repugnant to common sense as to the most simple rules of grammar and the art of writing; nor can it be said without discredit to the contracting parties, that they should avail themselves of an expression vague and equivocal, and use it exactly in the most important article, and upon one of the most interesting objects of the treaty; and that, with a view to find such vague expressions, they should select the word "retrocede," having at hand the word cede, which, followed by other explicit clauses that might have been inserted, would have explained with facility and precision the return of Louisiana to its former owner, and the cession of West Florida, if such had been the intention. But it was no doubt the intention of the parties that the expression "retrocede," which has given the name to the treaty, and serves to express the principal design of the third article, should be marked with all the exactness and grammatical rigor possible; nor is it susceptible of doubt that the expression "retrocede," in its obvious and grammatical sense, means to cede to one what it has received from it. Your excellencies ought not, therefore, to think it extraordinary that I have believed, and do believe, that this expression is of the greatest consequence to the decision of the present question. The force it carries with it makes us see at once with what exactness and simplicity the other parts of the article quadrate with it. If we set out from the beginning to give to the expression "retrocede" a meaning which it has not, it will not be extraordinary if we find some embarrassment and difficulty to decipher the said article. It says, in the first place, that it retrocedes Louisiana "avec la meme étendue qu'elle a entre les mains d'Espagne;" but this expression, in the mode in which your excellencies contrive it, appears absurd and contradictory. It is indubitable that Spain possesses West Florida as Florida, not as Louisiana, and this act, founded on an authenticity the most notorious, is marked, in the treaty of 1783 and 1795, in a manner which cannot be contradicted or admit of a doubt; consequently, Louisiana, "avec la meme étendue" which it had in the hands of Spain, is without West Florida, and to suppose that the cession could have comprehended this province, it was impossible to suppose it could be Louisiana, with the same extent, without incurring a palpable contradiction. Your excellencies know the force of this difficulty and wish to explain the first clause by the second, which says, "et qu'elle avoit lorsque la France la possédoit." But I ask, has the second clause a fixed epoch, which determines the time when France had it? Certainly not. Then the want of this fixed epoch alludes to the last time when France had it, that is, when she delivered it to Spain; an expression the more convenient, as in any other manner it will be contradictory with the first, which says, "avec la meme étendue qu'elle a entre les mains d'Espagne," if it was with more, it could not be with the same. It is more natural that a clause which has a fixed epoch, as the first has, should serve to clear up the sense of the second which has no epoch, or extent fixed, than that we should give so much force to the doubtful epoch of the second clause, as to make it destroy the clear and marked meaning of the expression "retrocede" in the first clause "avec la meme étendue." Admitting the explanation of your excellencies, the second clause is in contradiction with the first; admitting mine, both explain and combine simply, and prove that Spain delivered Louisiana to France, with the same extent that it had in her hands in 1800; and as France possessed it when she delivered it to Spain, but as neither in the one or other epoch West Florida made a part of Louisiana, the two clauses perfectly unite with each other, and both with the principal action "retrocede," which governs all the clauses of the article.

The third clause which your excellencies suppose can also be brought as a proof that West Florida is included in the retrocession of Louisiana made to France, is, to my understanding, a new proof of the contrary; it says, "et telle qu'elle dût être après les traités passés entre l'Espagne et d'autres Puissances." It is impossible to make any thing clearer than that the treaty did not alter any thing in the treaties which Spain had made with other Powers on this subject. There were two, one of 1795 with the United States, and one with England in 1783, by which Spain had acquired the territories to the eastward of the Mississippi, not as Louisiana, but as Florida, and, consequently, to be, as it ought to be, after this treaty, was with the exclusion of a territory possessed by England as West Florida, conquered by Spain as West Florida, and acquired irrevocably as West Florda, by the treaty of 1783, and received, in each of these solemn acts, a new qualification of its total separation from Louisiana and of the limits which separate them. Your excellencies contend that the treaty of 1783 was a new incorporation of the said territory to Louisiana; but I do not see in the said treaty of 1783 any thing but a confirmation of the right of conquest which His Majesty's arms had made of an English province called West Florida; the cession which France had made to England of the said territory had been an alienation, perfect, irrevocable, and perpetual. The territory became an English possession, and afterwards a Spanish one. That Spain, on the other side, and by other titles, should have acquired Louisiana, and that the two territories should return to be united in the one hand, in which they were before united, does not import, nor could it import, a legal incorporation of them, because their titles and times of acquisition were different. Spain had no Louisiana but what she received from France, and it was undoubtedly Florida she received from England.

It is not conceivable or imaginable, how the cession of a province or territory could occur without mentioning or naming it, or that it could be made only by designating it with a name, which, by the consent and notice of all the nations concerned, and the most authentic public acts, it had lost many years ago. This territory was called West Florida, and it was so called authentically; and by this name the contracting parties would have called it, had they imagined it was comprehended in the cession; as it is an acknowledged principle that the territories they change or cede ought to be designated by the names they then officially have; nor can it be said that, by its entrance into the possession of Spain, it returned to its ancient State and name, because all the public acts since its entrance into the possession of Spain, from the treaty of 1783, inclusive, have confirmed its separation from Louisiana, and its difference of name springing from the difference of its title of acquisition; after a separation so qualified, it was only an express and positive stipulation that could reunite it to Louisiana in its retrocession. Your excellencies have attempted in your note to persuade me that the treaty of 1783 reunited West Florida to Louisiana anew, attributing it to the motive which made France cede to England, in 1763, the territory to the east of the Mississippi, and this motive, your excellencies say, was to favor Spain. But, on my part, I cannot agree to this. France ceded this territory because she felt it her interest to do so, or was obliged to do so: but this is of no importance; for, be the motive what it may, the cession cannot be considered less than an effectual, irrevocable, and perpetual alienation, with all the consequences which were to make West Florida an English possession. Being so, Spain could conquer, acquire, and receive it from England, having this original and just title to it; and this alone is all she requires to make it her property in every sense of the word, and as independent of Louisiana as it was in the hands of England.

It results from this, that the contracting parties had no intention to include West Florida in the treaty of St. Ildefonso; this is the more confirmed, if we recollect that France could not do it, nor could she stipulate for the acquisition of any territory to the eastward of the Mississippi, without the consent of the United States, as she had obliged herself to this by an express stipulation contained in the sixth article of her treaty with the United States; which article says, "Le Roi très Chrétien renonce à posséder jamais les Bermudes, ni aucune des parties du continent de l'Amérique Septentrionale, qui, avant le traité de Paris de 1763, ou en vertu de ce traité, ont été réconnues appartenir à la couronne de la Grande Bretagne." It is to be seen from this, that France could not (if the United States did not consent, when she had bound herself by this treaty) acquire West Florida, which, by the treaty of 1763, belonged to the crown of Great Britain. If in the treaty of St. Ildefonso France had intended or proposed to acquire West Florida, it is clear she could not do so without the consent of the United States, and that this consent ought to precede all other stipulations; on the contrary, if France should have infringed the rights of the United States, which can in no manner be supposed, it would not be decorous in the United States to give to the treaty of St. Ildefonso an interpretation, from which it must result, as a necessary consequence, that France had violated their treaty with the United States, and that they founded their right to West Florida on this violation.

The opinion of the astronomer and geographer Ellicot, which is so exactly conformable to the ideas I have just stated, and whose concluding expressions I transmitted you in my letter of the 24th, is of very great weight and consideration on this subject. I do not suppose it, as your excellencies do, a question for a lawyer or civilian; it is, in its whole extent, entirely geographical; it only treats of the question, whether the territory to the east of the Mississippi, at the time of the retrocession, was Louisiana or West Florida. What person more proper to give an opinion on this subject than the one who has merited to be employed by the United States, in fixing the limits of the very territory he treats about? It is dishonoring his talents to say that he had not with him the maps, both ancient and modern, of the said territory, and the most authentic documents respecting it; and using, as he does, the expressions I copied for your excellencies in my letter of the 24th ultimo, after he knew of the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States, leaves no doubt that his love of truth and justice forced from him this sincere confession of the incontestable right of Spain to the territory of West Florida.

But all further reflections are unnecessary upon this subject, when it is considered that the treaty of St. Ildefonso was a contract between France and Spain, and that, of consequence, on whatever point of it (however it might appear doubtful,) on which France and Spain are agreed in their understanding and explanation of it, this uniformity of understanding has as much force as the most explicit and determinate stipulation, because no one can know as well as the contracting parties what the one was to cede, and the other to receive. The United States, who have succeeded to the right of France, can have no other right or claim than that which France supposed she had. France has been, and is now, persuaded that, by the treaty of retrocession, she neither did nor had any intention to acquire West Florida. The prefect Laussat, charged to carry the treaty into effect, instructed perfectly in its contents, and being depositary of the intention of his Government, was satisfied of the manner in which it was carried into execution, without being put into possession of West Florida; which act leaves no doubt of the manner in which France understood the treaty of St. Ildefonso should be executed. But if your excellencies should still consider this as insufficient proof, will you permit me to send you a copy of a declaration the most positive which can be imagined, in which the Government of France declares that it never thought of acquiring territory to the eastward of the Mississippi by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, much less has ceded it, or could cede it to the United States. The Minister of Foreign Relations of France has written upon this subject, on the 30th August last, to His Majesty's ambassador in Paris, and in his letter are the following remarkable expressions: "Les limites orientales de la Louisiane sont indiquées par le cours du Mississippi, et ensuite par la rivière d'Iberville, le lac Pontchartrain, et le lac Maurepas. C'est à cette ligne de demarcation que se termina le territoire cédé par l'Espagne à la France, en vertu du traité de 30 Ventose, an 9. La France n'auroit rien démandé à l'Espagne au delà de cette limite; et comme elle n'a fait que substituer les Etats Unis aux droits qu'elle avoit acquis, ils ne peuvent pas exiger de l'Espagne une cession de territoire plus étendue, à moins que cette concession ne soit négociée et stipulée entr'eux et l'Espagne par quelque convention ultérieure."

These expressions are so determinate and clear, as not to permit me to make any further reflections on them, persuaded that the simply reading them is sufficient for the conviction, that, as Spain did not think of ceding, nor France of acquiring, West Florida by the treaty of St Ildefonso, it is clear that the United States, who have succeeded to the right of France, could not acquire that which she supposed did not belong to her, and which she has declared she did not acquire, nor think of acquiring. This point appears to me so little susceptible of doubt after what I have said, and had the honor to say to your excellencies in my note of the 24th ult., to whose contents I again refer you, that I am confident the justice and well established good faith of the United States will acknowledge that they cannot found any right to West Florida from the treaty of St. Ildefonso.

In concluding this letter, I cannot but declare my satisfaction to your excellencies, that I see, by yours of the 8th, you are persuaded of my unalterable sentiments of respect and consideration for the United States, and also of my constant esteem for and wish to please your excellencies, which I now have the honor again to renew; praying God to guard your lives many years.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, March 16, 1805.

SIR:

We had the honor to receive yesterday your esteemed note of the 14th, and are sorry to find that we still continue so distant in our opinions upon the subject of it.

In our last, we gave your excellency so fully the view which our Government entertains of the right of the United States to West Florida, and are still so firmly persuaded of their undoubted right to the same, that we think it unnecessary to remark further on that point.

All the questions in controversy between us having been discussed at length, and having been favored with your excellency's opinion on each of them, except the western limits of Louisiana, we now take the liberty to request you to furnish us with the same, in answer to our communication on that subject.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our profound consideration and respect.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAS. MONROE.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, March 30, 1805.

The undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary of the United States of America, have the honor to inform His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, that the length of time since their last note to his excellency, to which no answer has been given, induces them to suspect that his silence is intended as an intimation of his desire that the negotiation should cease. They are sorry to add that the spirit with which the friendly advances and overtures of their Government have been received, would leave no doubt in their minds on this point, if his excellency had not given them reason to expect, by his note of the 4th instant, some propositions, on his part, for the fair and equitable adjustment of the differences subsisting between their Governments. Having completely fulfilled the orders of the President, in proving, by their communications, and by the time they have attended his excellency's propositions, the justice and moderation of his views, as of his friendly disposition and high respect for His Catholic Majesty, it remains that they should not be unmindful of what they owe to the Government and country, which they have the honor to represent. It neither comports with the object of the present mission, nor its duties, to continue the negotiation longer than it furnishes a well founded expectation that the just and friendly policy which produced it, on the part of the United States, is cherished with the same views by His Catholic Majesty. Under such circumstances, the undersigned consider it their duty to request of his excellency information whether it is his desire to terminate the negotiation on the point it now rests. In case it is, they think proper, in expressing their regret at the result, to add, that they shall not hesitate promptly to comply with it. But if it is still his excellency's desire to continue the negotiation, they have to request that he will be so obliging as to give them the sentiments of His Majesty's Government respecting the western limits of Louisiana, and that he will also accompany it with such propositions as he may think proper to make for the adjustment of the very important and interesting concerns between the two nations.

The undersigned have the honor to offer to, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

ARANJUEZ, March 31, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your esteemed favor of yesterday, in which you were pleased to inform me that the delay of my answer to your favor of the 15th has made you suppose it was, perhaps, the disposition of this Government to put an end to the negotiation in its present state. In answer, it is my duty to inform your excellencies that it has always been the disposition of this Government to continue, until concluded, a negotiation which has for its object a termination of the discussions that exist between the two countries; examining, first, each controverted point, and endeavoring to fix, as far as possible, the rights of each country; to begin, afterwards, the negotiations that may be convenient to both: that, with this view, and according to this plan, we have examined and discussed the greatest part of the said points. There is now remaining to treat only respecting the western limits of Louisiana, on which point I promised to transmit to your excellencies the opinion of this Government with the greatest possible despatch, as I have already assured you; being very sorry that my many indispensable avocations, and the attention which a subject of this nature requires, have not yet permitted me to execute it, and that your excellencies should have interpreted my silence since as a wish to put an end unreasonably to the negotiation.

With demonstrations of my sincere respects, I renew to your excellencies, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Mr. Monroe to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, April 3, 1805.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, and requests that he will appoint some day and hour convenient to his excellency, when he shall have the honor of a conference.

Mr. Monroe repeats to his excellency the assurance of his high consideration and esteem.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, April 9, 1805.

The undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary of the United States of America, have the honor to inform His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos that they consider his omission to answer their notes relative to the western limits of Louisiana, for so long a term, with his refusal to accept their propositions of the 28th January, or to propose any others in their stead, for the amicable adjustment of the differences between the United States and Spain, as having evinced the sentiments of His Majesty's Government on that interesting subject, in terms too strong to be misunderstood. By refusing to answer propositions until a discussion was ended, in the mode which his excellency thought proper to pursue, and declining to bring it to an end, even in that mode, within the term which naturally belonged to it, the indisposition of his Government to such an adjustment is as strongly declared as if it was announced to them in form. They think proper to add, that, by exacting of them in the commencement a discussion in that very dilatory mode, they had even then anticipated unfavorably of the result. To their propositions, which embraced every object in a frank and explicit manner, they had expected a correspondent answer. In discharge, however, of this great trust confided to them by their Government, they were resolved to keep in mind, and to fulfil, in the best manner they could, all its duties, among which they considered it an important one not to fail in any circumstance of respect which was due to His Majesty or his ministry. On that principle they entered into the discussion in the manner proposed by his excellency, although it was contrary to their inclination, to their judgment of what was proper in such a case, and to what was agreed between them in their first interview. They did so, in the presumption that the discussion would be of but short duration; that it would not consume more than a few weeks before they reached its object; and that a conclusion of the negotiation afterwards, in one mode or other, would require a still shorter time. They well knew that the subject had been long before His Majesty's Government; that every part had been acted on by it, and was, of course, well understood; they were aware, also, that the extraordinary mission, which the President had appointed to His Catholic Majesty, had been announced to him, and been some time expected by his ministry. Under these circumstances, the undersigned could not doubt that His Majesty's Government would be prepared to meet that mission on every point, and to terminate it with the utmost promptitude. What, however, has been the result, and how has their accommodating spirit been requited? If the first indications were unfavorable, they have been fully confirmed since. The United States will be astonished to learn in what manner the friendly advances and liberal overtures of their Government have been received; that, after exacting from their ministers a form of discussion which tended unavoidably to delay, His Majesty's ministers had ceased at length to discuss at all.

The undersigned have thought proper to communicate to his excellency their sentiments of what has passed with that frankness which the nature of the subject requires, and which is due to the Government and country they have the honor to represent. In conformity with those sentiments of the conduct of His Majesty's Government towards the United States, at a period which, under existing circumstances, is made signal by the proof which the President has furnished of his strong desire to preserve the relations of friendship between the United States and Spain, it might be expected that, considering the negotiation as thereby terminated, as in truth it essentially is, they would take the step which is incident to that state of things, and that Mr. Monroe, retiring from Spain, would repair to his station at London. It is, perhaps, their duty to take that step at this time. They are, however, willing to make one further effort to accomplish the objects of the mission, and to add a new and solemn proof to those which already exist, that its failure, should such be the case, shall in no respect be attributable to their Government or themselves.

With this view, whose just and friendly character will, they presume, be duly appreciated, the undersigned have the honor to inform his excellency that they shall still remain in Aranjuez a reasonable time, to receive from him such propositions, on the part of His Catholic Majesty, for the amicable adjustment of all subsisting differences, and other objects of interest depending between the United States and Spain, as he may think proper to propose. With such propositions, should any be made, they will be happy to receive any illustration of them, which his excellency may be disposed to give. But it is proper to add, that they consider it incompatible with their duty to proceed in the discussion of the subject, or any part of it, until those propositions, which are again invited, are presented to them; that they cannot view his continuing to withhold them in any other light than as an explicit declaration that the further pursuit of the object of their mission is unacceptable to His Majesty. It may, indeed, be thought that, after having possessed his excellency with the propositions of their Government, they compromitted its character, by proceeding in the discussion in any mode, before they received his in return. To that proceeding they were prompted by a spirit of conciliation, which may justify it to a certain stage. Should they, however, persist in it after what has passed, they would forfeit all claim to that apology.

In inviting again propositions of His Majesty for the amicable adjustment of the points depending between the two nations, the undersigned have the honor to repeat to his excellency the assurance that they will receive them with the high consideration which is justly due to them. The sentiments of the Government of France have been communicated on two points, which grow out of the treaties between the United States and that Power. The sentiments of one party to a treaty, as is well known, cannot affect the rights of the other, in points which arise between the parties themselves, much less in those which have reference to a third Power unconnected with it; nor ought they to influence its judgment, if the other party is an independent Power, as the United States are. This principle, which is invariable, is more especially sound in the cases referred to, for the reasons which have been heretofore given. The sentiments, however, of His Majesty the Emperor of France, on those or any other points in which the United States are interested, especially such as grow out of their treaties, are entitled to much consideration on their part. The undersigned have not failed to bestow it on those, which have been communicated to them by his excellency, as has been shown by their replies; they shall also be ready to show it in the treaty which they are desirous of forming with His Catholic Majesty, so far as a due regard to the rights of the United States and their indispensable duty will permit. The propositions which the undersigned had the honor to present to his excellency on the 28th January last, which embrace the whole subject, are, in their judgment, founded, in every particular, in the strictest principles of justice; they are such as the President ordered them to propose; they are such as he expects that His Catholic Majesty, from his known regard to justice, will not hesitate to adopt. They think proper, however, to add, that, in receiving the propositions which His Majesty may make for the amicable adjustment of those important concerns between the two countries, should any be made, and a difference in opinion appear on any point, they are disposed to do every thing to conciliate an agreement which their instructions will permit. It is the sincere desire of their Government to adjust amicably, at this time, with His Catholic Majesty, all these high concerns, in a firm belief that the interest of both countries would be essentially promoted by that result. To accomplish it, the undersigned will omit nothing on their part which it is in their power to do.

The undersigned have the honor to inform his excellency that they expect an early answer to this communication, and that by it will their future conduct be governed. They consider the negotiation as essentially terminated by what has already occurred; and, if they pursue it, it will be only on the proof of such a disposition on the part of His Majesty's Government as shall convince them, that there is just cause to conclude that it will terminate to the satisfaction of the United States. Having acquitted themselves, in every particular, to what was due to the just, the pacific and friendly policy of their Government, it remains that they should not be unmindful of what they owe to its honor, its character, and its rights. If His Majesty is disposed to adjust these important concerns, by an amicable arrangement between the two nations, on fair and equal terms, it may be easily and speedily done. Each party knows its rights, its interests, and how much it ought to concede, in a spirit of conciliation, to accomplish the objects of the negotiation. The undersigned feel the force of that sentiment, and will not fail to respect it. Should His Majesty's Government, however, think proper to invite another issue, on it will the responsibility rest for the consequences. The United States are not unprepared for or unequal to any crisis which may occur. The energy which they have shown on former occasions, and the firmness of their past career, must prove that, in submitting with unexampled patience to the injuries of which they complain, and cherishing with sincerity the relations of friendship with His Catholic Majesty, no unmanly or unworthy motive has influenced their conduct.

The undersigned request, &c. CHAS. PINCKNEY.
JAS. MONROE.

Mr. Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

ARANJUEZ, April 9, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

In my letters of the 21st February and 14th March, I had the honor to explain to your excellencies the incontrovertible reasons on which His Majesty founded his right to West Florida. I showed to your excellencies, among other things, that the United States could not pretend to more right, nor to more extent of territory, than France had acquired by the treaty of St. Ildefonso; and that, confessing as France confessed, that she had not acquired, or thought of acquiring, by the said treaty, territory eastward of the Iberville, neither could she transmit to the United States any right over it.

Besides what I have said in the said notes, I consider it as indispensable to hand to your excellencies the adjoined copy of a note which the Minister of Exterior Relations has addressed to the chargé des affaires of His Majesty at Paris, under date of the 26th ultimo, showing, in the most positive terms, that France neither acquired any territory to the east of the river Iberville, nor transmitted any to the United States; which declaration ought, in my opinion, to remove the most remote idea of doubt upon the subject, as very pointedly observes the Minister of Foreign Relations of France, "faire connoitre les droits que la France avoit acquiré, c'est indiquer l'étendue et les limites de ceux qu'elle a transmis au Gouvernement Federal."

It not being possible, in my opinion, to contradict the evidence of this proof in favor of the rights of His Majesty over West Florida, it will be conformable to the good faith of both Governments, and contribute very much to facilitate the course of the present negotiation, that it should be considered as established between us, and as indubitable that the United States have not acquired any right to West Florida. Being about to enter immediately into the examination of the western limits of Louisiana, it cannot do less than embarrass the course of the discussion to leave behind and still depending a point which has been proved to demonstration. The acknowledgment of the right of His Majesty over West Florida, by the American Government, which is not more than an act of rigorous justice on their part, will facilitate and simplify very much the course of a negotiation, which has for its foundation the good faith of both Governments, and their wish to terminate their differences.

I renew to your excellencies the testimony of my distinguished consideration, &c. &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

P. S. After writing and signing this, I received the esteemed letter of your excellencies of yesterday, to which I will answer as soon as possible.

P. C.

M. Talleyrand to M. le Chevalier de Santivanes.

PARIS, 5th Germinal, year 13.

SIR:

I have received the letter which you have done me the honor to address to me on the 14th of March, which particularly relates to the limits of Louisiana on the side of West Florida.

This question cannot become the object of a serious discussion between Spain and the United States, if a view is taken of the clauses of the treaties of cession which have successively transferred Louisiana to France and to the Americans.

Spain retroceded to France the territory only which she had received from her. The rights of France have been since passed to the United States, and it was only with the same extent that she had acquired them.

This principle has been constantly pursued by His Imperial Majesty equally towards the court of Spain and the Federal Government. His Majesty having no pretensions but to the territory situated to the west of the Mississippi and of the river Iberville, he had not authorized his commissary at New Orleans to take possession of any other province, and he did not cede any other to the United States.

His Imperial Majesty has repeatedly authorized me to make the declaration, and I have repeatedly addressed it in his name to the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States accredited near him by the Federal Government. His Majesty persuades himself that this frank exposition of facts ought to be sufficient to prevent any difference between Spain and the United States relative to the demarcation between Louisiana and the Floridas. To make known the rights which France had acquired, is to indicate the extent and the limits of those which she transmitted to the Federal Government.

Accept, sir, the assurances, &c. &c.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, April 12, 1805.

SIR:

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 9th, with an extract of one from the Minister of Foreign Relations of France to the chargé des affaires of Spain, relative to the eastern limits of Louisiana.

Having had the honor to inform your excellency, in our note of the 9th, that we considered the negotiation as essentially terminated by the disposition which His Majesty had shown, and the part it had acted in it, and that we deemed it incompatible with our duty to proceed in the discussion of the subject, or any part thereof, until we were furnished with His Majesty's propositions for the adjustment of the whole business, we have only to refer, in reply to this communication of your excellency, to what was stated in that note on the most solid reasons. As soon as your excellency complies with that request, we shall endeavor, by all the means in our power, in the sentiments expressed in that note, to manifest the high respect of the United States for His Majesty the Emperor of France, and their disposition to conciliate, in the treaty they are desirous of forming with His Catholic Majesty, the mutual interest of both countries.

We repeat our desire to be furnished, as soon as possible, with your excellency's propositions, which have heretofore been so often requested in vain, for the adjustment of all the points that are depending between the two nations. If it is the disposition of His Majesty's Government to meet in this negotiation the friendly advances and overtures of the United States, there can be no motive for longer delay; but if the contrary continues to be shown, we shall hasten to withdraw from a situation, which, while it compromits the character of our Government, cannot be agreeable to ourselves.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance of our high consideration and esteem, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Cevallos to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe.

ARANJUEZ, April 13, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

Complying with my promise, I proceed to examine, in this letter, the opinions of my Government, on the western limits of Louisiana; following the plan established from the beginning, proposed by your excellencies, and adopted by me, to examine each of the points depending between us, and determining, as far as possible, our respective rights on each. But before I proceed on the question, I should be wanting in the respect I owe my own Government, to those considerations to which my public character will not permit me to be inattentive, and also to that of which I believe I have not been undeserving in my private one, if I did not state to your excellencies my surprise at reading your esteemed letters of the 30th March, and 9th of the present month. It is only fifteen days since I had the honor to write to your excellencies my last note relative to the eastern limits of Louisiana, to which your excellencies did not find it convenient to answer, except in the general terms that we did not agree, and that we would pass to the other point of the western limits of Louisiana; and on the 30th March, notwithstanding my promise, and my word given, that I would treat the last depending point, as I had done the rest, your excellencies supposed you ought to state to me, that my silence for those days had induced a belief in you that I intended it as an intimation of my wish to end the negotiation. On a view of a discussion, pursued with so much punctuality and activity on all the controverted points, it appears to me as more natural, not to say more just, that your excellencies should have believed that the nature itself of the point I was about to treat on, or the indispensable occupations of my ministry, might have occasioned the delay, than to suspect that I wished to put an end to the negotiation, thereby breaking my word which I had pledged. My delicacy not permitting me to suffer such a suspicion to remain in the breasts of your excellencies, I stated, in my letter of the 31st ultimo, the sensibility which this had caused me; the motives which had prevented my writing more quickly upon the point of the western limits of Louisiana; and, lastly, I reiterated my promise to do so with all the despatch possible. Notwithstanding this your excellencies have thought proper, in your note of the 9th, to insist upon what you call my omission, and say that the ministry of His Majesty intend to cease the discussion entirely, with other assertions to the same effect, which cannot do less than make me feel very much, both as they respect my public and private character.

In answer to these, I shall confine myself to only stating to your excellencies, that the nature of the point itself of which I am about to treat, has been the cause of the small delay which I have had the misfortune to have so unfavorably interpreted by your excellencies.

The question upon the western limits of Louisiana is not a point which can be examined or discussed, upon viewing one or two documents, or other pieces of that kind which may be possessed at the first view. To treat this point with exactness, it is necessary to examine a collection of plans and documents and historical relations which include a space of more than one hundred and fifty years. These documents are not to be found in the department under my care; many of them belong to the Department of the Interior, besides those which are in the Vice-Royalty of Mexico. It has been necessary to search and examine those which are here, and to give them a certain classification. It was my intention to form a memoir, which should comprehend all the most important topics, accompanying them with the necessary maps and plans, and handing them to your excellencies, being anxious to make the opinions of my Government appear with all the exactness which the nature of the subject would permit; but the manner in which your excellencies express yourselves in your said letters is a sufficient excuse to me to alter my plan, and reduce it to a few pages, that I may not still lengthen a delay which has given rise to such disagreeable suspicions.

The western limits of Louisiana never having been fixed in the exact manner which can be done in territories sufficiently peopled and of small extent, it ought necessarily, at the time of fixing them, to be the object of a negotiation, in which both parties should be agreed as to the principal basis, and by a commission of limits which should regulate themselves by that basis in fixing the demarcation. The principle which ought to serve as a rule for the establishment of the said basis, cannot be any other than the knowledge of the possession which each party had acquired in these territories, and the different establishments made, by each in the said places, by the Spaniards in the province of New Spain, and also those belonging to Louisiana, drawing a line which shall divide the one from the other side, and continuing it by the most natural points of demarcation possible.

It results from this principle, that the examination into the above named limits is in a great degree historical, as it treats of the fixing the origin of many Spanish establishments, of the interior provinces, and of the French establishment of Louisiana.

If it had been proper to enter into a detailed examination at present, I would make a succinct historical detail of the Spanish establishments in the interior provinces of New Spain; but not to molest your excellencies with details that may be inconvenient at present, I will confine myself to saying something on the province of Texas bounding on Louisiana, upon the demarcation of which depends the present questions. The province of Texas, where the Spaniards have had settlements from the seventeenth century, bounds by the east with Louisiana, and contains the extensive country which lies between the river Medina, where ends the Government of Cohacula, to the post, now abandoned, of Nuestra Señora del Pilar, of the Adaes, which is distant a few leagues from the fort of Natchitoches; twenty leagues from the Mission of Ais; forty from that of Nacogdoches; one hundred and fifty from the abandoned post of Oreoquisaw; two hundred from the bay of Espiritu Santo; and forty from the post of St. Antonio de Bejar.

It is beyond all doubt that, in the year 1689, by a commission from the Viceroy of Mexico, the Marquis de Moncloa, Captain Alonzo de Lem, who was then Governor of the province of Cohacula, went to examine the bay of Espiritu Santo, and the river St. Mazers which empties into it, to whom the Indian chief of Texas presented himself in the most friendly manner, and in 1690 he took possession of the territory, and founded the mission of St. Francisco of Texas.

By a royal order of His Catholic Majesty, November 12, 1692, they ordered new discoveries to be made in the said province by land and sea, which was in consequence then executed, and among other things they undertook the examination of the river Codachos. Twenty-two years after, the Duke of Lenares, being then Viceroy of Mexico, introduced from Louisiana, as far as the Spanish port of St. Juan Baptista, a Frenchman, Louis St. Dennis, and other three Frenchmen from Louisiana, with passports from the Governor of Louisiana to buy cattle in the Spanish missions of Texas: which Frenchmen were carried to Mexico, and then the fourth expedition was resolved upon to Texas, naming as chief of it the Alfarez Don Domingo Ramon. The expedition was received with inexpressible friendship by the Indians; and the Captain Ramon named the chief of the said Indian nations, and also son to the Governor of Texas, and he left there founded the four establishments and missions of St. Francisco, La Purissima Concepcion, St. Josef, and Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe, situated seven leagues from Natchitoches. By the royal order in 1719, they made various alterations in the command of the Spaniards employed in the province of Texas, and a little after died the said Captain Ramon in the port of St. Juan de Baptista on the river Granada. War having broken out between Spain and France during the regency of the Duke of Orleans, the French attacked the Spanish mission of Adaes, and its inhabitants were transferred for the moment to the post of St. Antonio de Bejar. But the Viceroy of New Spain, the Marquis de Valero, accepted the generous and honorable proposal which the Marquis St. Michael de Aguago made, offering his purse and person to dislodge the French of what they had unjustly seized and occupied, and to make war upon them. On being named Governor General of the New Philippines, or province of Texas, and of New Estremadura, the Marquis of Aguago raised five hundred dragoons and two companies of cavalry, and undertook his march for the province of Texas in 1179, and without opposition arrived at the Adaes, the French having returned to port Natchitoches. The King of Spain being informed of this expedition, and the recovery of the province of Texas, determined to fortify it, and that all hostilities should be suspended against the French.

The Marquis de Aguago re-established the other missions and founded the establishments, among them the posts of Nuestra Señora del Pilar de los Adaes; that of Loretto, on the bay of Espiritu Santo; that of Dolores, which is now known by the name of Ozquisau, and improved the situation of St. Antonio de Bejar by placing the establishment between the rivers of St. Antonio and St. Pedro.

The province of Texas being thus at peace, and re-established and increased, the Marquis of Aguago solicited the reunion there of two hundred Flascalan families, and as many from Galicia, in Spain, or the Canaries; and with some of these families, the King having agreed that four hundred families should go from the Canaries, they peopled the village of St. Fernando, close to the post of Bejar.

At the end of the year 1730, the Spaniards undertook several expeditions from the post of Bejar to the north of said province, on account of a disagreement with the Indians; and, in 1758, the Indians made an attack from the northern part on the post of St. Saba, and killed some soldiers and priests; on which account a detachment was ordered against the said Indians, under the command of Colonel Don Diego Ortiz de Parilla.

A little after, it was determined to organize a general and uniform establishment of posts to cover the interior provinces of New Spain, and they ultimately gave a commission to the Marquis de Rubi to go and revisit and examine their state. And the result of this commission, which it appeared lasted some years, was, that on the 10th of September, 1772, the regulation of posts had so extended itself as to establish a cordon of them from the coast of Señora to the bay of Mexico, where was situated the bay of Espiritu Santo, there being then in the province of Texas those of St. Antonio de Bejar, and that of the bay of Espiritu Santo, having neglected that of Arquisau and that of Nuestra Señora de los Adaes, which were no longer useful, as Spain was then the mistress of Louisiana.

From this simple and short explanation of those notorious and authentic facts, to prove the truth of which we find the most incontestable documents, supported by uninterrupted possession, results evidently the ancient and exclusive right which the Spaniards have to the province of Texas; that the possession of the province of Texas was acknowledged and respected by the French while they possessed Louisiana; and that the said province is belonging to, and has always belonged to, His Majesty.

That claim must be extremely illusory and unfounded which shall attempt to carry the western limits of Louisiana to the Rio Bravo, including therein great part of the interior provinces of New Spain, acquired and established at the cost of the treasures of Spain and the blood of her subjects, as has been proved to demonstration in the case of Texas, and can be strengthened more and more by a continued series of events and proofs relative to the said province of Texas and others of the interior provinces of New Spain, and also the acts and dates now existing respecting the subject. There are also many despatches, maps, and documents respecting this question, to be found in the Viceroyalty of Mexico, which is the principal centre of authority for all these provinces.

On my part, I have read with the greatest attention the memoir on the limits of Louisiana, which your excellencies enclosed me in your note of the 28th January, anxious to see if any thing could be found to support or give a color to the claim of the United States to carry their limits to the Rio Bravo; but the said memoir goes principally to treat of the establishment of Louisiana. I only find that your excellencies support the claim—first, in a gratuitous supposition that the coast belonged to France—a supposition that is contradicted by the most positive acts and dates abovementioned, by which it is proved that the province of Texas and its coast are belonging to the dominions of His Majesty. And, in the second place, in the general terms of the patent granted by Louis XIV. in September, 1712, in favor of Anthony Crozat, granting him the exclusive commerce of the country of Louisiana, whose extent was, as your excellencies understand it, with all the waters which directly or indirectly discharge themselves into the Mississippi, and the countries which they water. It would be very easy to make it appear that the most exaggerated claims of France never had the extent which your excellencies wish to give to Louisiana on this side. But even if they should have had such claims, or France positively should have tried to include, under the name of Louisiana, the territories which His Catholic Majesty possessed, what right or claim could be founded in a document which Spain never has recognised, nor does recognise, and which never could prejudice in any manner her acquired rights? The answer of Spain on this occasion is as simple as just: that, if Louis XIV. or the Government of France exceeded its powers in granting territories or rights over territories which were not their own, or that Spain claimed possession of, or property in, that grant ought to be considered as null as far as it extended over these territories, and that it flowed, without doubt, from the total ignorance which prevailed in those days with respect to the geography of the territories situated at a little distance to the west of the Mississippi, and of the establishments of the Spaniards in those parts. More ancient, and proved by repeated acts of possession, than the aforesaid patent of Louis XIV. is the royal order of the 12th November, 1692, already cited, by which His Catholic Majesty ordered them to make new expeditions to the Texas; and the same are the other authentic acts and establishments of the Spaniards in that quarter.

The limits between Louisiana and the Texas have been always known, even when the French possessed Louisiana. Near the beginning of the last century, the venerable Alanjet, of the order of St. Francisco, founded, in the province of Texas, towards the confines of Louisiana, different missions, among them that of Nacogdoches. And a few years after he wrote, and it was generally known in the writings of those times, that the province of Texas, or New Philippines, had its boundaries about the middle of the Gulf of Mexico to Poncenes, the Rio Grande, and to the East Louisiana. Depending on Louisiana, we find upon the river Colorado, which discharges into the Mississippi, the post of Natchitoches, which the French took from Spain. But, at seven leagues from this, you find the aforementioned post of Nuestra Señora de los Adaes, belonging to the province of Texas; and it is undoubted that the Baron de Riperda, being Governor General of this province, and successor of Don Angal de Manos, appears to have made treaties and conventions with the Indians of the same province of Texas, stipulating that the Spaniards might make among them such establishments as they pleased, acknowledging from that time as depending on the province of Texas, the Indians Stydes, Nacogdoches, Asenares, Nobedacuis, Vidais, Ozquires, Malayes, Ocuanes, Tancques, and Apaches. To the year 1770, there always was in the fort of the Adaes, from the time of its establishment, a competent number of Spanish soldiers, and the same in that of Ozquisaz et St. Saba; and it was not until the year 1773 that the Lieutenant Don Josef Gonzales evacuated the post of Adaes, whose garrison was no longer necessary, as Spain possessed Louisiana.

It follows, therefore, that the boundary between the provinces of Texas and Louisiana ought to be by a line which, beginning at the Gulf of Mexico, between the river Caricut, or Cascassia, and the Armenta, or Marmentoa, should go to the north, passing between the Adaes and Natchitoches, until it cuts the Red river. And as from this point the limits which ought to be established on the northern side are doubtful and little known, it appears indispensable to refer them to the prudent investigation of commissioners to be named by both parties, in order that they, viewing the territory, and having with them the documents and dates that will be given them, rectifying what ought to be rectified, and furnishing the necessary light to both Governments, upon limits which have never been fixed or determined with exactness, may thus enable them to fix the demarcation completely conformable to the wishes of both.

With these views, the Government of Spain, ever since it had definitively fixed the retrocession of Louisiana to France, named a commissioner of limits, destined to complete this important object jointly with the commissioners France might think proper to name on her part. In the same manner, it appears to me indispensable to do now, if the demarcation is to be made with the necessary exactness; and that the United States, naming on their part a commissioner of limits, that they should proceed by common accord, and make upon the territory the investigation which may be necessary. It is more than a year that the Brigadier General the Marquis de Casa Calvo, and the Engineer Don Josef Martinez, have, with a sufficient number of persons to form the said commission on the part of His Catholic Majesty, been waiting in New Orleans the arrival of the commissioners of the United States to begin their labors.

It is only after the researches and investigation of the commissioners of both parties, furnished with such instructions as may be proper, that we can pursue the exact demarcation of limits, which, never before having been fixed with the requisite exactness, cannot now be determined upon with prudence, but upon a view of the territory, and having present the dates and documents necessary to illustrate the subject.

Although upon this point of the western limits of Louisiana I could have extended myself much more in detail, and accompanied my illustration with maps and documents, my wish to answer your excellencies on this point with promptitude prevented me. I, however, reserve to myself the power of doing so hereafter should it be necessary.

I hope your excellencies, on reviewing what has been urged on this point, will please to state to me your opinions upon the subject, and that you will acknowledge that, as well in it, as in the whole course of the negotiation, I have not deviated a jot from the principle proposed by your excellencies in your first letter of the 28th January, and adopted by me in that of the 31st of the same month—"Each of the points depending between the two Governments ought to be examined impartially, and all motives of complaint and inquietude considered and terminated amicably; to do which," &c. &c.

As I had the honor to state to your excellencies in my letter of the 5th March, and believe it indispensable to repeat here, on perusing the contents of your excellencies' letters of the 30th March and 12th April, I cannot but still consider it as premature to enter upon the forming of projects for a convention on the whole or upon the aggregate of the depending points, without analyzing them first, at least to a certain point, and without fixing the right of each country as far as possible; because, as your excellencies must know extremely well, before we can proceed to a convention on the whole, it is necessary to know, as far as possible, what are the rights and obligations of His Majesty, and what are the rights of the United States and their objections; which knowledge by detail ought to be the foundation of the negotiations, it being clear that, according to the extent which we believe the right and obligations of the one and the other party ought to be, so ought the convention, upon the whole, to be the more or less extensive.

I hope to have the honor of receiving your excellencies' answer on the point which is the object of this letter, and reiterate to you the demonstrations of my distinguished consideration, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, April 20, 1805.

SIR:

We had the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 13th, to which we hasten to give a reply. It is not without much surprise, that we find by it that your excellency should have construed the apprehension which we expressed in our note of the 30th ultimo, that you intended, by your silence, in not answering ours respecting the western limits of Louisiana for so long a term, to intimate a desire to terminate the negotiation at that point, as conveying any unfavorable imputation to your excellency either in your public or private character. We do not hesitate to disavow any such intention, and to assure you that nothing was more remote from our views. In making this frank declaration, we must be permitted to add, that we do not think that that note, or any other that we have written, ought to have had such interpretation. We are persuaded that, in all negotiations, each party has a right to terminate that in which it is engaged, whenever it thinks proper, and that it is responsible for so doing to its own Government alone. This right seems to be incident to the very nature of such transactions, and not to be restrained by any promise made in the commencement, or afterwards, by either party, of what it proposes to do in the sequel, in respect to the mode of prosecuting it. Such promise must always be made on the idea, and be so understood by the other party, that the negotiation will be continued. It can never be construed in such a manner as to compel the party to continue it in case any thing should occur to make it improper, in its judgment, so to do. It was in this light that we considered your excellency's promise, and were, therefore, far from supposing that, in making the inquiry which we did, under existing circumstances, we violated any rule of decorum or delicacy. Whether there was sufficient cause for the impression we had taken in that respect, we will not pretend to say. It is, however, most certain that we thought there was, and for the following reasons: 1st, because unusual delay had occurred since our last communication, which we could not otherwise account for; 2dly, because, as your excellency had repeatedly insisted on the relinquishment of the claim of the United States on Spain for compensation for French spoliations within her limits, and seemed in your note of the 15th to put the continuance of the negotiation on that issue, we were naturally led to suspect, on our repeating the assurance that we were decidedly of a contrary opinion, and could not abandon the claim, especially after so long an interval, that you had come to that resolution. Having this view of the subject, we did not know but that your excellency had adopted that mode of making known to us the views of your Government, as the one which was deemed most suitable to the purpose, and had even expected such an application on our part to lead to a more full and explicit declaration of them. In making the application, which we did with regret, we followed no rule, but were governed by an impulse which the occasion excited, and we trust merits to be considered as an honorable one—one to which your excellency has shown too great a sensibility, or you would not have so much misconstrued our meaning. We repeat, therefore, that we neither intended, nor do we think that any of our letters ought to be construed to convey any imputation unfavorable to your excellency in your public or private character, for which we renew the assurance of our high consideration and respect.

Our note of the 9th instant (for that of the 12th was only founded on it) was intended as a justification of the part which, under existing circumstances, we deemed it our duty to take. We intended it as a justification of our conduct equally to His Majesty's Government and our own. We were of opinion, for the reasons therein stated, that, as there was no prospect of obtaining an accord on such terms as our Government thought reasonable and just, and as our Government and ourselves were compromitted by the manner in which the negotiation continued to be conducted, that it was not only useless but highly improper for us to pursue it. It is usual, in all negotiations, especially in important concerns, for one of the parties to present to the other a project of a treaty or convention for the arrangement of the objects in contemplation, founded on his instructions, and to receive from the other party a like one in return, in case any difference of opinion appeared on any point between them. It is by an exchange of such projects, that the views of their respective Governments are seen, and each party is enabled to determine at once whether there is any prospect of an agreement, and to act accordingly; it is by such exchange that the points of agreement and difference between them are shown, and that the topics of discussion are distinctly marked, in case the negotiation is carried to that length; it is, in short, by it, and by it alone, that the basis of the negotiation is formed, and the parties to it placed on equal ground. Whenever this rule is departed from, it must be to the disadvantage of the party whose case forms an exception to it. It is in the power of the other to continue the negotiation as long as he thinks fit, and finally to break it off, if he is so disposed, on his own terms. When we did ourselves the honor to present to your excellency, on the 28th January, our project for the arrangement of the points in question, with our note explanatory of it, it was in the expectation that we should have received a counter one in return, in case its conditions were not approved, with a note explicit to every point. We do not say that an express agreement to that effect was entered into, but as it was agreed that we should commence the negotiation in that mode, and as it was known to be the established usage in such cases, we concluded that the business would necessarily take that course. In that expectation, however, we were disappointed in both respects. It was, perhaps, our duty to have declined proceeding in the negotiation until we were furnished with such a communication; and, had we done so, we presume it could not have been refused. By proceeding in it as we have done, in the mode adopted by your excellency, we were governed, as heretofore observed, by a spirit of conciliation, in the belief that in that mode we should obtain the same end, without any essential difference in point of time. In these latter respects we were also disappointed. Your excellency has repeatedly observed, that you had followed the mode which we had recommended; but you will permit us to remark that, in this respect, your excellency has altogether misapprehended our idea, in one of its most important features. We said, it is true, in our first note, that it was proper to ascertain the rights of each nation on each point, and we still say so. But did it follow from thence that we were willing to dispense with the ordinary mode of proceeding in such cases? with the just claim to a counter project or proposition from your Government? Did we consent to a mode of discussion in which each point should be made the subject of separate notes, and that these should be subdivided, and each subdivision become so?—a mode which tended to create unavoidable delay. Most certainly nothing can be found in any communication from us, which gives the slightest approbation to such a proceeding. It is contrary to that which we expected would have been pursued in the negotiation; it is contrary to that in which we commenced it; and it has been the subject of serious and frequent complaint on our part since. It was after we saw with regret that three months had been consumed without effect, that unusual and unexpected delays had taken place in the discussion which seemed likely to be protracted to an indefinite length of time, that no basis of the negotiation was laid; no propositions were presented, though often requested with as much earnestness as delicacy would permit; and that to those which we did ourselves the honor to present, we were answered, not in a spirit of accommodation, but with demands that we should surrender unconditionally the just claims of our Government in some of the most important points, that we wrote that letter. To a situation so improper, it was impossible for us to remain longer insensible. We could not but recollect, independent of the justice of our pretensions, that some consideration was due to the friendly and respectful advance that was made by our Government; that special missions in their nature require despatch, and generally receive it; that on former and important occasions those of the United States had received it from France, Spain, and Great Britain; that to the present one, by many causes, the public sensibility had been much excited, and that our Government waited with anxiety the result: in addition to which, that one of the parties to it was the representative of the United States at another court, where their interests suffered by his absence. It was on a full view of these circumstances that that measure was taken—circumstances which appeared to us to be too imperious to have any cause for hesitation. In writing the letter, we meant, as already observed, to vindicate our own conduct to both Governments. We did not mean in the slightest degree to call in question the right of His Majesty's Government to manage the negotiation, or to conclude it in such mode as it thought fit. We only claimed to ourselves a right to withdraw from it, and report the result to our Government when it appeared to us impossible, after making due exertions, to accomplish the objects of our mission.

In our letter of the 9th, we invited again your excellency's propositions, which have not been furnished. Your excellency has, however, furnished us with your observations on the last point of discussion, that of the western limits of Louisiana, by which the negotiation approaches a conclusion in its ordinary form, by treaty or otherwise, which your excellency seems desirous to give it. Our wish has been invariably the same on this point, and we now feel ourselves called on, under existing circumstances, to give a new and signal proof of our disposition to conciliate. Anxious to adjust at this time the subsisting differences, and to place the relations of the two countries on a basis of permanent friendship, by arrangements founded on their common interest, we will not put to hazard these great concerns, by any act which may possibly impute the failure to us. Influenced by these considerations, we shall proceed to discuss this last point in reply to your excellencies' note, although the propositions have not been furnished, in the expectation that, after the discussion on this point is finished, as we trust it hereby will be, we shall experience on your part an equal co-operation to conclude the negotiation itself with the utmost promptitude.

We have gone thus into detail, to place in its true light the part we have acted in these concerns, and the motive of it. The present negotiation naturally forms an interesting epoch in the political relations of the two Powers, and it is important to the United States that it should be seen that nothing was omitted on their part which was due to the claims of justice and good neighborhood on the part of His Catholic Majesty.

In examining the question respecting the western limits of Louisiana, we are to be governed by those facts and principles which would have been applicable to France had she never parted with the province. All the rights which she formerly possessed over it were restored to her by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and by her transferred to the United States by that of Paris, 1803: to ascertain these, it is necessary to go back to that epoch when the river Mississippi, with the waters which empty into it, and when the bay of St. Bernard were just discovered. The boundary to the West was never traced by an exact line of demarcation between that province and the possessions of Spain; and, in settling it at this day, the same principles and facts must govern as if it had been then made.

The facts which are material in the case are such as relate to the discovery and possession of the territory referred to by the subjects and under the authority of each nation. The principles are those which have been recognised by European Powers in similar transactions, and which of course ought to govern in the present one. It is by a correct view of the material facts, and the faithful application of these principles to them, that the right of each nation will be established in this point, and thereby the boundary between them.

By the memorial which we had the honor to present to your excellency on the 28th January last, the epoch of the discovery of the Mississippi and of the waters which empty into it, and of the bay of St. Bernard, and of the taking possession of the same, and of the country dependent thereon, is proved by documents which cannot be questioned. By these it is established, in respect to the Mississippi, its waters, and dependent country, as low down the river as the Arkansas, by the Sieurs Joliet and Marquette from Canada, as early as the year 1673, and to its mouth by the father Hennison, in 1680, and by De la Salle and Joutel, who descended the river with sixty men to the ocean, and named the country Louisiana, in 1682, and in respect to the bay of St. Bernard, in 1685. This was done at those periods in the name and under the authority of France, by acts which proclaimed her sovereignty over the whole country to other Powers, in a manner the most public and solemn, such as making settlements and building forts within it. Of these, it is material to notice in the present inquiry two only, which were erected in the bay of St. Bernard, on the western side of the river Colorado, by M. de la Salle, who landed there from France with two hundred and forty persons, in 1685. It was on the authority of the discovery thus made, and of the possession so taken, that Louis XIV. granted to Anthony Crozat, by letters patent, bearing date in 1712, the exclusive commerce of that country, in which he defines its boundary, by declaring that it comprehended all the lands, coasts, and islands, which are situated in the Gulf of Mexico, between Carolina on the east, and Old and New Mexico on the west, with all the streams which empty into the ocean within those limits, and the interior country dependent on the same. Such are the facts on which the claim of France rested: such are those on which that of the United States now rests.

The principles which are applicable to the case are such as are dictated by reason, and have been adopted in practice by European Powers, in the discoveries and acquisitions which they respectively made in the new world: they are principles intelligible, and, at the same time, founded in strict justice. The first of these is, that when any European nation takes possession of any extensive seacoast, that possession is understood as extending into the interior country, to the sources of the rivers emptying within that coast, to all their branches and the country they cover; and to give it a right, in exclusion of all other nations, to the same, (memoir ——, page 116,) it is evident that some rule or principle must govern the rights of European Powers, in regard to each other, in all such cases; and it is certain that none can be adopted in those to which it applies, more reasonable or just than the present one. Many weighty considerations show the propriety of it. Nature seems to have destined a range of territory, so described, for the same society to have connected its several parts together by the ties of a common interest, and to have detached them from others. If this principle is departed from, it must be by attaching to such discovery and possession a more enlarged or contracted scope of acquisition; but a slight attention to the subject will demonstrate the absurdity of either. The latter would be to restrict the rights of a European Power, who discovered and took possession of a new country, to the spot on which its troops or settlements rested: a doctrine which has been totally disclaimed by all the Powers who made discoveries and acquired possessions in America. The other extreme would be equally improper; that is, that the nation who made such discovery should, in all cases, be entitled to the whole of the territory so discovered. In the case of an island, whose extent was seen, which might be soon sailed round, and preserved by a few forts, it may apply with justice; but in that of a continent, it would be absolutely absurd; accordingly, we find that this opposite extreme has been equally disclaimed and disavowed by the doctrine and practice of European nations. The great continent of America, north and south, was never claimed by any one European nation, nor was either portion of it. Their pretensions have been always bounded by more moderate and rational principles. The one laid down has obtained general assent.

This principle was completely established in the controversy which produced the war of 1755. Great Britain contended that she had a right, founded in the discovery and possession of such territory, to define its boundaries, by given latitudes in grants to individuals, retaining the sovereignty to herself from sea to sea. This pretension, on her part, was opposed by France and Spain, and was finally abandoned by Great Britain in the treaty of 1763, which established the Mississippi as the western boundary of her possessions. It was opposed by France and Spain on the principle here insisted on, which of course gives it the highest possible sanction in the present case.

The second is, that, whenever one European nation makes a discovery, and takes possession of any portion of that continent, and another afterwards does the same at some distance from it, where the boundary between them is not determined by the principle above mentioned, the middle distance becomes such of course. The justice and propriety of this rule is too obvious to require illustration.

A third rule is, that, whenever any European nation has thus acquired a right to any portion of territory on that continent, that right can never be diminished or affected by any other Power, by virtue of purchases made, by grants or conquests of the natives within the limits thereof. It is believed that this principle has been admitted and acted on invariably since the discovery of America, in respect to their possessions there, by all the European Powers. It is particularly illustrated by the stipulations of their most important treaties concerning those possessions, and the practice under them, viz: the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, and that of Paris, in 1763. In conformity with the tenth article of the first mentioned treaty, the boundary between Canada and Louisiana on the one side, and the Hudson's Bay and Northwestern companies on the other, was established by commissaries, by a line to commence at a cape or promontory on the ocean, in 58° 31′ north latitude, to run thence, southwestwardly, to latitude 49° north from the equator, and along that line indefinitely westward. Since that time, no attempt has been made to extend the limits of Louisiana or Canada to the north of that line, or of those companies to the south of it, by purchase, conquest, or grants from the Indians. By the treaty of Paris, 1763, the boundary between the present United States and Florida and Louisiana, was established by a line to run through the middle of the Mississippi, from its source, to the river Iberville, and through that river, &c. to the ocean. Since that time no attempts have been made by those States since their independence, or by Great Britain before it, to extend their possession westward of that line, or of Spain to extend hers eastward of it, by virtue of such acquisitions made of the Indians. These facts prove incontestably that this principle is not only just in itself, but that it has been invariably observed by all the Powers holding possessions in America, in all questions to which it applies relative to those possessions.

The above are the principles which we presume are to govern in the present case. We will now proceed to apply these principles to the claim of the United States, as founded on the facts above stated, relative to the discovery and possession of Louisiana by France, and to designate the limit to which we presume they are justly entitled, by virtue thereof, in the quarter referred to.

On the authority of the principle first above stated, it is evident that, by the discovery and possession of the Mississippi, in its whole length, and the coast adjoining it, the United States are entitled to the whole country dependent on that river, its several branches, and the waters which empty into it, within the limits of that coast. The extent to which this would go, it is not in our power to say; but the principle being clear, dependent on plain and simple facts, it would be easy to ascertain it.

It is equally evident, by the application of the second principle, to the discovery made by M. de la Salle of the bay of St. Bernard, and his establishment there on the western side of the river Colorado, that the United States have a just right to a boundary founded on the middle distance, between that point and the then nearest Spanish settlement, which, it is understood, was in the province of Panuco, unless that claim should be precluded on the principle first above mentioned. To what point that would carry us, it is equally out of our power to say; nor is it material, as the possession in the bay of St. Bernard, taken in connexion with that on the Mississippi, has been always understood as a right to extend to the Rio Bravo, on which we now insist.

In support of this boundary, we rely much on the grant of Louis XIV. to Anthony Crozat, in 1712. That grant, it is true, establishes no new right to the territory. The right had already accrued by the causes and to the extent contended for, which was never abandoned afterwards, except by the treaty of 1763, which does not affect the present question.

This boundary is also supported by the opinions of the best informed persons who have written on the subject, with which we have become acquainted. By an extract from a work on Louisiana, written by the Colonel Chevalier de Champigny, in 1773, who, being of the country, was doubtless well informed, the Rio Bravo is laid down as the western boundary of that province. This fact is again asserted, with more minuteness, in his second note to that work, in which he states that Louisiana was bounded, before the treaty of 1763, to the west, by the mountains of New Mexico and the Rio Bravo. In a book containing several memoirs on different subjects, published about three years since at Paris, is one entitled a "Memoir, historical and political, on Louisiana, by the Count de Vergennes, minister of Louis XVI," in which it is stated that Louisiana is bounded to the east by Florida, and to the west by Mexico. The opinion of geographers, in general, confirms that of other writers. By a chart of Louisiana, published in 1762, by Don Thomas Lopez, geographer to His Catholic Majesty, it appears that he considers the Rio Bravo as the boundary of the province, as it does by that of De Lisle, of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, which was revised and republished in 1782. Others might be quoted, but it is useless to multiply them.

Having thus shown the principles on which the United States found their claim to the Rio Bravo as the western boundary of Louisiana, we will proceed to examine the claim of Spain which is opposed to it, as presented by your excellency, in your esteemed note of the 13th inst. We find by it, that all the facts relied on in support of the claim of Spain, relate to the province of Texas, the whole of which lies eastward of the Rio Bravo, and, as we suppose, within the limits of Louisiana. They amount to this, that, at different epochs, certain religious missions were established within that province, the first of which was in 1690; that, in 1692, a royal order issued, directing new discoveries to be made in it, under which the river Colorado was explored; that, in 1714, Louis St. Denis, a Frenchman, with a passport from the Governor of Louisiana, made a visit to Mexico on some commercial projects, passing by the Spanish post St. John the Baptist, on the Rio Bravo, at which time Don Diego Ramon was sent into the province of Texas, where he was well received by the Indians, among whom he then founded several religious missions, one of them at a post within seven leagues of Natchetoches; that treaties were afterwards made with some tribes of Indians, who acknowledged their dependence on Spain; that, during the regency of the Duke of Orleans, hostilities took place between the French and Spaniards, in which the former attacked the latter at Adais, and broke up the establishment for a time; that, in 1730, the situation of the post Antonio de Bejar was improved by the Marquis de Aguago, who settled a certain number of families in its neighborhood; that, in 1755, hostilities took place with the Indians, who attacked the post of St. Saba, and killed some soldiers and priests; in consequence of which, a detachment was sent against them, under the command of Don Diego Otiz Pamille; that, after this, the Marquis de Rubi was empowered to organize a system of defence for the provinces of New Spain, which was completed in the year 1772. These, we believe, are all the facts stated by your excellency, on which we think proper to make a few remarks.

It is evident, as every fact above stated was posterior, and even by many years, to the completion of the title on which the United States rely, that if the principles by which they support that title are sound, there is not the slightest foundation for the claim of Spain to rest on. Every act of Spain, within the limits which it appears justly belonged to France, was an encroachment, which the friendly relations between the two Powers might authorize in a wilderness, but which could give no title. That those acts were considered by the French as encroachments at the time they were made, is proved by many facts and documents the most authentic. In respect to the Spanish post, in the neighborhood of the Natchetoches, on which your excellency seems chiefly to rely, we beg to refer you to Colonel Champigny's work, page 10 of his notes, by which it is stated, that the post which the Spaniards had established there was on the territory of the French. We refer you also to Du Praty's History of Louisiana, volume 1, page 12; by which it appears that the Spaniards were introduced there under the auspices of the French, by Louis St. Denis, to favor a contraband trade with Mexico; that the favorable reception given by the Indians to Don Diego Ramon was owing to St. Denis, who was recognised by them as their great chief; prior to which year, it appears, by the same author, that there was not an establishment of any kind east of the Rio Bravo, and only that of St. John the Baptist on the western bank of it. But the most authentic and conclusive of all proofs of the light in which these acts of the Spaniards were viewed by the French is, that hostilities actually did take place between them respecting those posts, which history has recorded, and your excellency admitted.

Your excellency has noticed, in your statement, some concessions or acknowledgments made to the Spaniards by the Indians of their dependence on them; but these, it is presumed, could convey no title to the sovereignty of the territory against France. The third principle relied on above is conclusive to this effect. Within the known limits of Mexico, there is a vast tract of vacant territory to the north, held and inhabited by the Indians. If any other Power was to treat with, and receive similar acknowledgments of them, would Spain admit that the territory was thereby transferred from her to such Power?

On this view of the subject, in which we have attempted to illustrate more in detail, but have added little to the contents of the memorial which we had the honor to present to your excellency, on the 28th January last, we rest the title of the United States to the Rio Bravo as the western boundary of Louisiana. As every point has been thus fully discussed, we flatter ourselves that we shall now be honored with your excellency's propositions for the arrangement of the whole business. The country on both sides of the Mississippi is yet a wilderness, and it is important to make those arrangements which their mutual interests may require while it is so. As your excellency is possessed of the sentiments of our Government on every point, it is unnecessary to add more than to repeat, that on receiving your excellency's propositions we shall have every disposition to conciliate the views and interests of His Majesty's Government which can be expected from the just and friendly policy of the United States.

We request your excellency to accept, &c.

Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos.

SIR: ARANJUEZ, May 12, 1805.

Animated by the same desire which has governed us since the commencement of the negotiation, and influenced by that which was expressed by your excellency in our interview last evening, we are willing to state the ultimate conditions on which we are authorized to adjust the several points depending between our Governments. With this view, we do ourselves the honor to inform your excellency that, on condition His Catholic Majesty will cede the territory eastward of the Mississippi, and arbitrate the claims of the citizens and subjects of each Power, according to the convention of August 11, 1802, we will make the Colorado the boundary between Louisiana and Spain, by a line to be run in the manner proposed in the project which was presented on the 28th January last, the United States ceding all right to any territory westward of that line; we will establish a district of territory of thirty leagues on each side of that line, or on the American side only, if preferred by Spain to be run from the Gulf of Mexico to the northern boundary of Louisiana, which shall remain neutral and unsettled for ever; we will relinquish the claim to spoliations which were committed by the French within the jurisdiction of Spain, in the course of the last war, the United States undertaking to compensate the parties in a sum to be specified; and we will also relinquish all claim to compensation for the injuries which were received by the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans. Your excellency will, we are persuaded, see in these propositions a most unequivocal proof of the sincere desire of our Government to meet the views of His Catholic Majesty in the points referred to, in a spirit of conciliation and concession, to place the friendly relations of the two Powers, who, as neighbors, have so many and powerful motives to promote that object, on a basis never to be shaken. We have endeavored also to give the strongest proof in our power of our disposition to conciliate the views which have been expressed on two points by His Majesty the Emperor of France, since, in case His Catholic Majesty adopts the propositions, and cedes the whole of the territory eastward of the Mississippi, we are willing to accept the cession of West Florida from him; and, in assuming the payment to our citizens of their claims for French spoliations, we make it, as we presume, in a great measure, without any consideration whatever, as we consider that the concession which we propose to make on the western side of the Mississippi is, in itself, an equivalent for all the territory claimed by Spain on its eastern side. If these propositions are accepted, we have to request that your excellency will be so good as to notify us of it, that a convention, founded on them, may be concluded without delay. If they are rejected, we have then to request that your excellency will consider the United States as in no respect bound by them, and the whole subject as standing on the same ground, in any future negotiation, as if none such had been made. In either event, we have to request that your excellency will be so good as to give us an early and explicit answer to the same.

We request your excellency to accept the assurance of our distinguished consideration and esteem,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

His Excellency Don PEDRO CEVALLOS,
First Secretary of State, &c. &c.

P. S. We do ourselves the honor to enclose your excellency the two notes which we submitted to your view last evening, with our signatures.

Propositions to the Secretary of State.

On condition that Spain will cede, on her part, the territory to the east of the Mississippi, and arbitrate her own spoliations conformably to the convention of August 11, 1802, the United States will cede, on their part, their claim to territory west of a line to be drawn from the mouth of the Colorado to its source, and from thence to the northern limits of Louisiana, in such manner as to avoid the different rivers and their branches which empty into the Mississippi.

They will establish a territory of thirty leagues on both sides of this line, which shall remain unsettled forever, or of thirty leagues on their own side, if Spain desire to extend her settlements to the Colorado.

They will also relinquish their claim for French spoliations, which amounts to one hundred and sixty-four vessels, by undertaking to satisfy the parties themselves in a sum to be specified.

They will relinquish, likewise, their claim to compensation for the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans.

From the 1st of October, 1796, until the ———, there were brought into the ports of His Catholic Majesty, in Europe and Africa, by the French, 168 vessels.

A statement of the facts relative to American vessels taken by French privateers, and brought into Spanish ports, obtained from the most authentic sources.

Of the French spoliations, there have been fifty appeals from the consular judgments in Spain to the Council of Prizes at Paris, of which thirty have been released, nine condemned, and twelve are yet depending. Not one sous has been paid in any case, nor is there a single case of such spoliations on the list of liquidations now at the French treasury, which are to participate of the twenty millions of livres to be paid by the United States to their citizens, under the treaty of 1803, on account of French spoliations.

The American minister never did demand payment of French spoliations made in Spain, knowing them as such: nor did the American agent ever demand it by his order or knowledge. The first intelligence which the American Government had of appeals being permitted from the French consular tribunals in Spain to the Council of Prizes in France, was received from Spain herself. As soon as it was received, the Secretary of State wrote to the American minister in Paris, to know what the fact was, and instructed him, at the same time, to prohibit the agent from acting in such cases, it having been at all times the opinion of the Government that Spain alone was answerable, of whom only has the recompense been demanded.

Taken by the Spaniards, since the 1st of October, 1796, until the ———, 104 vessels and 4 cargoes.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.

GENTLEMEN: ARANJUEZ, May 15, 1805.

I have read, with due attention, your esteemed note of the 12th, and the propositions you have been pleased to make in the name of your Government, reduced to the following: that Spain shall cede the Floridas, on her part, and shall arrange the point of the claims of the individuals of both nations, conformably to the convention of the 11th August, 1802; and that, on their part, the United States would fix the river Colorado as the limit between Louisiana and the Spanish possessions, in the form that the said note expresses; and that they will abandon the claim arising from the damages occasioned by the French on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, during the last war, as also that for indemnification for damages occasioned by the suspension of the deposite at New Orleans.

On viewing these propositions, I cannot refrain from saying to your excellencies that I do not see in them any convenient terms for entering into the exchange or contract proposed; for, although His Majesty has the power to bargain for the Floridas, as owner of them, in the fullest extent, and has also the right, if he pleases, to ratify the convention of August 11, 1802, which is suspended for the reasons your excellencies know, there are wanting equal right and power in the United States to make the cession your excellencies mention. The United States having no right to demand of Spain compensation for damages occasioned by the French privateers, as I have demonstrated in my notes on that point, and to which I again refer, Spain, therefore, could not receive from the United States the renunciation of a right they have not, and which she does not recognise as belonging to them. The same may be said as to the claim for the suspension of the deposite at New Orleans, and as to the claim to fix the limit of Louisiana at the Rio Bravo; from which claim flows the assertion, that the fixing it at the Colorado is to be considered as a cession. It is equally necessary for me to observe to your excellencies, that the Spanish Government has made it appear, and is equally ready to show more and more, by the most irrefragable proof, that the limit which separates Louisiana and the Spanish possessions is a line which, beginning in the Gulf of Mexico, between the rivers Caracut or Carcase and the Armienta or Marmentao, ascends towards the north, between the Adais and Natchitoches, until it cuts the Red river; and as from this point they are doubtful and little known, the limits which ought to be marked on the northern side appear to be proper subjects for reference to the prudent investigation of commissioners of limits, to be named by both parties; who, having the view of the territory, and all the documents and dates which may be necessary, before them, rectifying what ought to be rectified, and furnishing the light necessary to both Governments, on limits which have never yet been fixed or determined with all the exactness necessary, may be thus able to establish the demarcation completely to the satisfaction of both Governments.

In this view of the subject, it cannot be concealed from the penetration of your excellencies, that, as a consequence of the propositions you have made by your note of the 12th, Spain would cede to the United States, not only the territories which indisputably belong to her to the east of the Mississippi, that is the two Floridas, but also others, equally her own, in the interior province of New Spain, without receiving any thing in return but the renunciation of a right which she does not acknowledge in the United States, which is, to reclaim for the damages arising from the suspension of the deposite, and for those occasioned by the French privateers, on the coast and in the ports of Spain, during the last war; when, on the contrary, Spain thinks she has shown that she is in no manner liable for the same.

The justice of the American Government will not permit it to insist on propositions so totally to the disadvantage of Spain; and, however anxious His Majesty may be to please the United States, he cannot, on his part, assent to them, nor can he do less than consider them as little conformable to the rights of his crown.

I renew to your excellencies the demonstrations, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos.

ARANJUEZ, May 18, 1805.

SIR:

We have received your excellency's letter of the 15th, by which we perceive, with regret, that the propositions which we had the honor to make to His Catholic Majesty, on the part of our Government, on the 12th instant, for the adjustment of the several points depending between the United States and Spain, have been absolutely rejected. By this answer, which we presume is given by the order of His Majesty, we consider the negotiation concluded; we have, therefore, only to remark, that we shall hasten to communicate the result to our Government, who will not fail to bestow on it the attention which is due to a concern of such high importance to the United States. The special mission to His Catholic Majesty being thus ended, it becomes the duty of Mr. Monroe to repair immediately to London, where he is the resident minister of the United States; for which purpose, your excellency will be so obliging as to furnish him with the necessary passport. As preparatory to that step, we have to request your excellency will be so good as to obtain for him an early audience of their Majesties, that he may be enabled to take his leave of them; and, at the same time, to renew the assurance of the high consideration entertained for them by our Government.

We beg your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe.

ARANJUEZ, May 20, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

Having given an account to their Majesties of the contents of your esteemed letter of the 18th, in which you request the necessary passport for Mr. Monroe to return, agreeably to his wish, to his residence at London, obtaining before his departure an audience of leave, their Majesties have fixed to-morrow, being Wednesday, at half-past eleven, for the audience which Mr. Monroe wishes, and, without loss of time, I shall have the honor to send the necessary passport for Mr. Monroe.

I have the honor to reiterate the demonstrations of my distinguished consideration, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Mr. Monroe's address on taking leave.

On my arrival here, I had the honor to assure your Majesty of the high consideration of my Government for your Majesty's person and Government. I then hoped to have had the honor to conclude the special mission with which I was charged, in conjunction with the minister plenipotentiary of the United States near your Majesty, to the advantage and satisfaction of both parties; but being disappointed in this respect, all our propositions, which we deemed just, being rejected, and none others ever offered on the part of your Majesty's Government, though often invited, it is my duty to return to my station at London. We have transmitted the result to our Government for its decision. Under these circumstances, I have thought it my duty to take leave of your Majesty in the usual form. In so doing, I avail myself of the occasion to assure your Majesty, an assurance which I give with pleasure, of the high consideration of my Government, and of the pleasure it would have derived from an amicable adjustment, on just and fair principles, of all the questions depending between the two nations, to accomplish which it has made so many friendly advances and exertions.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to Mr. Madison.

ARANJUEZ, May 23, 1805.

SIR:

We are sorry to inform you that the negotiation with which we were charged by the President with the Government of Spain is concluded, after failing in all its objects, notwithstanding our unwearied and laborious exertions, for so great a length of time, to procure to it a different result. We have heretofore availed ourselves of such opportunities as offered to transmit you copies of the papers which had passed in our correspondence with the minister of Spain on the subject, at the dates of our several letters which accompanied them, by which you were apprised of the tone which this Government had assumed in the negotiation. We have now the pleasure to transmit to you, by Captain Dulton, a copy of those, and every subsequent paper which has passed in it. These will give you so clear a view of the transaction, that you will not be at a loss for the policy of Spain in the business, or of the motives which governed us in every stage of it. We endeavored, in obedience to our instructions, to adjust the differences subsisting between the two countries, on such conditions, and to establish their future relations by such arrangements, as were in our judgment safe, honorable, and advantageous to Spain, and we pursued the object in a mode the most conciliating that we could adopt. In respect to the conditions, we were, indeed, willing to make some sacrifice on our own responsibility, in the persuasion that, under existing circumstances, our conduct would be approved. But a very different spirit animated this Government in every respect. We experienced, on its part, neither a spirit of candor nor conciliation in the management of the business, nor of accommodation in the conditions. In this latter point it has disclaimed our rights in every question on which it was possible that a difference of opinion could exist; it has pushed the pretensions of Spain to the most extravagant extent in each; and insisted, finally, in a tone not a little imperious, that those exaggerated pretensions should be the standard by which the subsisting differences and their future relations should be regulated. So far as depended on us, the business might have been ended in a few weeks, but nothing was more remote from the views of this Government than to bring it to an early conclusion. On the contrary, its ingenuity was displayed in an effort to prolong the negotiation to the latest possible epoch. When we asked of the minister either the acceptance or rejection of our propositions, he replied, that he could do neither till His Majesty should be correctly informed of his rights; that a discussion of every point was necessary to give him that information; and that, after he obtained it, he should give us the answer which we desired. Seeing very distinctly, almost from the commencement, that we had nothing to expect from the justice or friendship of this Government, and being of opinion that the delay which was so studiously sought on its part was with no friendly views to us, we resolved, as early as the 12th of February, to push the business to a conclusion as soon as we could consistent with that prudent and respectful course of conduct which might be necessary to procure it a favorable one. With this view, and as we saw that he disapproved of our propositions, we called on him, in a note of that date, for his own, to which we received a similar reply. His Majesty, he said, was not yet informed of his rights in the points in question; he must get that information from discussion; and, after the discussion should be ended, that he would proceed, by negotiation, to the arrangement of the whole business, in such manner as might prove of advantage to both countries. In our interviews, he repeatedly intimated, that, although we might disagree on every point in the discussion, yet that his Government would be willing, after it was gone through, on a view of the whole subject, to make some sacrifice, as he termed it, to obtain an amicable adjustment. It became, therefore, necessary, even at this period, to decide whether it would be best to desire an explicit answer to our propositions, and, in case it was refused, to end the negotiation at that stage of the discussion. We bestowed on this point all the consideration which it merited; and the result of our deliberation was, that it would be best to proceed in the discussion till it was concluded; in a belief, however, that that would soon take place. We did not wish to furnish any pretext to his Government, how little plausible soever it might be, to sanction his declining to settle by treaty all the differences subsisting between the United States and Spain at this time. We thought it might be useful to answer some of his remarks, and to place in a more distinct light some of the questions that were involved in it; and we were not aware that the delay necessarily incident to it would put us in a less favorable situation to obtain a compliance with our just demands; in addition to which, it seemed proper for us to wait and see what the sacrifices were which he proposed to make when the discussion was concluded, and to which we were the more disposed, from a presumption, against the evidence of very strong facts, that this Government must have too just a knowledge of its interest to court a contest with us, especially by refusing its assent to the just and reasonable terms on which we insisted. Under these impressions, we proceeded in the business for some time, till finally there remained only one point, that of the western limits, to be treated of. Here it appeared to us that Mr. Cevallos had resolved to terminate it, having failed for so long a time to answer our last note, after having pressed some points in a manner to excite that expectation. We asked him, by a note of the 30th March, if such was his intention, intimating, if it was, that we should not oppose it. He replied, that it was not, and that he should send us a note, as soon as he could, on the western limits. We waited several days for his note, without receiving one; we then desired an interview, in which we asked when we should receive one? He replied, as soon as possible; that he was engaged in it. Would it be in the course of the week? It would not. In the course of the next? He could not promise it; he could neither fix the day nor the week. How long did he think it would require to conclude the business, that is, for him to be ready to conclude it, since it depended on him, as we could terminate it at once, and had been ready so to do from the commencement? He thought it was possible to finish it in three months from that time, but would not engage for it. It was on this conversation that our note of the 9th of April was written, which obtained from him his reply of the 12th, and in it his essay on the western limits. We had resolved, when our note of the 9th was addressed, to proceed no further in the discussion till we received his propositions, and intimated to him in it that we deemed it incompatible with our duty so to do. But, as we had now entered on the last point of discussion, which brought the business in his own mode so near to a conclusion, as we wished to show the absurdity of his arguments on that point, and to establish, in reference to it, the perfect solidity of our claim to the Rio Bravo; and, also, as we wished to remove some impressions of a personal nature, which he seemed to have taken from our notes of the 30th of March and 9th of April, and in a spirit of perfect conciliation to open the door again to, and invite on terms the most liberal, the amicable adjustment of the business, we resolved to waive all form, and to proceed in the discussion. Accordingly, we answered his note on the western limits, in which we also took a review of the part which we had respectively acted in the negotiation, placed in its true light the conduct of each party, and again invited his propositions. This note bore date on the 20th of April, seven days after that of his, to which it was in reply, and to which we expected, of course, an early answer. We waited patiently for one till the 1st instant without effect; when, it being the day of his weekly rendezvous with the several members of the diplomatic corps, we asked him, in a private interview, when we should hear from him on the subject of our last. He said it would be soon, as he was engaged on it. Would it comprise propositions? To which his reply was understood to be in the affirmative. Another week had elapsed, when a similar occasion furnished another opportunity to make the same inquiry. His reply to it was still equally vague and unsatisfactory. As we had anticipated such a one, we had made up our mind as to the part it became us to act in that event. We had resolved, on a view of the whole subject, to wait no longer for his propositions, but to offer him on our part such terms as we were willing to close the business on, by treaty, if they were accepted, or without, if they were rejected. With this view, we observed to him that we were disposed to make him a new and more advantageous offer, in which we should go further than our instructions permitted, but which we should do to meet as far as we could the views of His Majesty, for the purpose of terminating the business amicably at once. He replied, that such a proposition on our part in the present stage would be premature, as the discussion was not concluded. We had long seen through Mr. Cevallos's views, and given him cause to know that, in following him in the discussion, we had done it not solely because he had invited us so to do, but from superior considerations which justified us in that conduct; not because we were the dupes of his management, but that we really wished to furnish an incontrovertible proof of the sincere desire of our Government to preserve the relations of friendship with Spain, and of the steadiness and magnanimity with which it pursued that object, while the pursuit could be attributed to such generous motives. As this trait in Mr. Cevallos's conduct corresponded with the others, we were not at all surprised by it, nor would we be diverted from the course which we had resolved on. We, therefore, wrote him, on the 12th, a note, in which we made him the propositions abovementioned, in terms of perfect respect, and to which we asked his explicit answer. On the 16th we received one which was perfectly so. This answer being of the character already stated, left no cause to doubt the part which it now remained for us to take. Accordingly, on the 18th, we informed him that his note of the 15th had ended the negotiation, on which it became our duty to report the result to our Government, and for Mr. Monroe to repair immediately to London, where his duties required his presence. As preparatory to this latter measure, we requested an audience of their Majesties, to enable him to take leave of them in the usual form, and a passport to leave the country; both of which were granted in the course of a few days.

As the above details furnish some facts not to be found in the correspondence with the minister of Spain, we have thought it our duty to give them. If any doubts existed on a view of the other documents, by any circumstance which occurred in the course of the negotiation relative to the policy of this Government in it, we are persuaded that these will tend to remove them.

We do presume that the motive of this Government in seeking delay, by the management which it used, was its utter indisposition to accommodate the business with us on just principles. With such a determination, delay might be, on many considerations, desirable to it. Having the support of France on some important points, and knowing that an attempt was making by her to induce our Government to yield explicitly on them, it might wish to protract the business till that end was accomplished. Besides, it might hope to profit by the events of the present war. But, on our part, we did not see that any advantage could be gained by prolonging the negotiation, while we were persuaded that some essential injury might result from it. By prolonging, after so much time had already been consumed in it, we thought that we should have furnished the proof of timid councils; that we expected that our Government would yield to the pressure made on it, and thus tend to confirm this Government and that of France in increasing that pressure. While the negotiation was continued under existing circumstances, it seemed to us as if those Powers would have essentially the control of it. But, by withdrawing from it, we were persuaded that we should show the independence of our Government and country to the parties, and put the affair on its true ground in the eyes of other Powers, from which some advantage might result hereafter.

Of the terms on which this Government would have concluded a treaty with us, you will be able to form a tolerably correct opinion in some important points, by the documents which we send you. You will observe that it never furnished us with any propositions whatever, though often requested; that it refused to ratify the convention of August 11, 1802, but on conditions we were positively forbidden to accept; that it refused any accommodation on account of French spoliations, or the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans; disclaimed our right to West Florida, and asserted theirs on the west of the Mississippi to a line which should commence at the Gulf of Mexico, between the Caracut and Marmentao rivers, and run thence between the Adais and Natchitoches to the Red river, &c.

The propositions which we made were not only in the spirit, and in conformity to our instructions, but such as we thought, in every respect, just and reasonable. Our claim to the Rio Bravo appears to us to be as well founded as that of Spain to any portion of Mexico which is vacant, and we do conceive that the accommodation which we offered on that side of the Mississippi was worth at least that which was asked in return for it on the eastern side. The territory is more extensive, and it is at least as important to Spain to be accommodated on the side next Mexico as to the United States in respect to Florida; and the advantage of the parties is the standard by which the value ought to be estimated. Besides, we were convinced, if we succeeded at all, we were as likely to do it on these propositions as on any we could make at this time, short of the extravagant pretensions above stated. We are convinced, if we do succeed by other terms than those, that it will be owing to the successful course of events, and to the imposing attitude and decision of our Government and country. To have proposed other terms at this time would have produced no effect as to an adjustment, while it would have weakened our claims and injured us on any future occasion.

In proposing to accept a cession of West Florida from Spain, and to relinquish the French spoliations, in the manner expressed in our note, we did it with a view to satisfy the pretensions of France in these respects. We deemed it advisable to take that ground, in the presumption that her Government might possibly avail itself of the opportunity thereby furnished to separate itself from the question, and eventually use its influence with Spain to adjust the business. You will observe that that proposition offered no relinquishment of those claims, but in case the whole project was accepted; in which case the United States were to pay on that account to the creditors a sum to be specified, for which they would have found in other respects a reasonable indemnity.

As we did not wish to compromit our Government more than was unavoidable, it was thought proper that Mr. Monroe should take leave of their Majesties in the usual form. In so doing, he avails himself of the opportunity to observe to His Majesty that the failure of the negotiation was attributable to his Government, and not that of the United States, for reasons which he took the liberty to mention. A copy of his address is enclosed. As nothing was said in my communication respecting the ordinary mission, it remains of course in force. At present it is our opinion that Mr. Pinckney should continue here, or leave some person charged with our affairs, should he find it inconvenient to remain till the orders of our Government are received on the subject. We are, however, strong in the persuasion that all our concerns depending with this Government, as well those of individuals as of the public, will remain suspended by it till our differences are adjusted.

The result of this negotiation forms an interesting crisis in our affairs, which it has been impossible to prevent, and to which the wisdom, firmness, and virtue of our Government will be fully equal. Having justice on its side, and having given the most ample proof of its moderation, there can be no doubt that its decision on the part now to be taken will be such as to sustain the high character of the American nation, vindicate its just rights, and merit the general approbation of our fellow-citizens.

We are, dear sir, with very great respect and esteem, very sincerely your very obedient servants,

CHAS. PINCKNEY.
JAMES MONROE.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED DECEMBER 10, 1805.

DECEMBER 10, 1805.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The enclosed documents relating to my message of the 6th instant, not being ready at that date, I thought it better not to detain the message, but to communicate these papers afterwards, as supplementary to those then sent. They are not of a nature to be deemed confidential.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq. minister at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

AUGUST, 1805.

I have written to you lately very often, informing you of the Spaniards being now in the habit of capturing our vessels as much as during the last war. The following is the list transmitted to me of American vessels taken by the Spaniards, and sent into Algeziras for adjudication, since the date of my last to you:

Brigantine Ann Isabel, of Virginia, Williams, master.
Brigantine Vereries, Pisa.
Brigantine Dido, Shail, master, from Marblehead.
Ship Mary, Robert Stevenson.
Ship Eagle, Nehemech Shaler, last from Liverpool.
Brigantine Jefferson, Simon Buhmond.
Brigantine Polly and Nancy, of Baltimore, John Croan.
Schooner Molengue, John Waterman, of New York.
Schooner Leffen, William Maret, of Virginia.
Brigantine Diana, Silvester Simmons, of New Haven.

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq., minister at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

SEPTEMBER 22, 1805.

My last informed you that I was still under the necessity of remaining here until the 22d October, on account of all the mules being embargoed for the King's service until that day, so that I could not before go to the Sitio to take leave; that I had still been without the pleasure of seeing Mr. Erving or Mr. Bowdoin; and that not being able to wait for them any longer, I should, when I went away, leave Mr. Young charged with our affairs, until they or one of them came; that, during this time, and constantly, I had been busily employed with this court in endeavoring to arrest the numerous depredations of their privateers on our commerce, and their condemnations of our vessels, and that to do this my exertions have not only been unceasing, but more than twenty letters have passed between Mr. Cevallos and myself on the subject. I have now the pleasure to send you the result, by enclosing the copy of a letter which I have just received from Cadiz, and which I have received in such an unquestionable shape as to leave no doubt of its authenticity. By this it appears my exertions have been effectual, and will probably prevent future captures on that ground.

[TRANSLATION.]

From the Secretary of State and of the Marine to the Director General of the Fleet.

ST. ILDEFONSO, September 3, 1805.

SIR:

The minister of the United States, complaining of new injuries and captures of American vessels by Spanish cruisers, has given information of the carrying to Algeziras of eleven vessels of his nation, under pretext, as he says, of their carrying English merchandise. The King, being made acquainted with it, has been pleased to determine, that if there be no other cause for the capture of these vessels than that alleged by the minister, they should be put at liberty again; since, according to the fifteenth article of the treaty with the United States, the American flag secures the freedom of the merchandises, although they may be enemy's property. But if the cause of the detention be any other, His Majesty requires that they be decided in due course, and with as little delay as possible. I communicate it to you by the Royal order, in order that you may communicate it to the Generals of the Departments of Marine, in order that they may make it known to the commandants of marine in every district, and to the owners of privateers, informing them that they will be responsible for the injuries they may occasion.

Extract of a letter from Josiah Blakely, Esq. Consul of the United States at St. Jago, in Cuba, to the Secretary of State, dated

JUNE 7, 1805.

The brig Trio, of New York, from Liverpool for New Orleans, cargo dry goods, has been wholly unloaded, and is now offered for sale. After taking all the dry goods out of the ship Governor Strong, of Alexandria, Clark, master, her captors have returned her to the captain.

Since the last evacuation of Hispaniola, more than one thousand American seamen have been landed in this port, most of them without clothes, and all without any possible means of support but such as they receive from their own Government.

Extract from the same to the same, dated

JULY 1, 1805.

The scene of robbery, destruction, evasion, perjury, cruelty, and insult, to which the Americans captured by French pirates, and brought into this and the adjacent ports, have been subjected, perhaps has not been equalled in a century past.

ST. JAGO DE CUBA, July 1, 1805.

Copy of a letter from Captain John Stinson, Commander of the ship Huntress, to the Secretary of the Navy.

LONDON, August 20, 1805.

SIR:

On my arrival at Liverpool I wrote, for the information of Government, giving a statement of the capture of the ship Huntress, laden with Government stores. On my arrival here Mr. Lyman informing me he had not written, induced me to forward this lest the first should miscarry.

On June the 1st, latitude 36° 20′ north, longitude 74° 50′, I was brought to by a Spanish schooner privateer called La Maria, commanded by Antonio Lobo from Porto Rico. The reason Lobo gave for detaining the ship was her being bound for a British port, and not having a *Spanish passport. After robbing the ship of ten barrels of bread, one barrel of tar, and sundry other articles, took all my crew out excepting the cabin boy; put a prize master and eleven Spaniards on board, and ordered the ship for Porto Rico. On June 9th, in sight of Bermudas, was retaken by two English Guineamen; after taking the Spaniards out, put a prize master and crew on board, and ordered the ship for Liverpool, where she arrived 16th ult. much damaged.

I have the honor to be your very humble servant,

J. STINSON.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Joseph J. Maxwell to his excellency General Castanio Algeziras.

U. S. GUNBOAT, No. 3, HARBOR OF ALGEZIRAS, June 15, 1805.

SIR:

I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that I was this morning brought to by four armed boats under Spanish colors, who, after exercising the utmost insolence, and without assigning the smallest reason, conducted me to this port.

The orders received from my Government were to proceed with all possible despatch to the commander of the American squadron in the Mediterranean. The serious consequences attending this unwarrantable detention must be too obvious to your excellency to require a remark. I shall only observe that, if your Government authorizes indignities of this nature, to my own I must appeal for redress. I am sensible, however, this cannot be the case, and persuade myself that your excellency will readily redress the insult offered the American flag in this instance, and take measures to prevent a repetition.

Under this impression, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. J. MAXWELL.

His Excellency General CASTANIO.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Joseph J. Maxwell, commanding Gunboat No. 3, to Commodore John Rodgers.

U. S. GUNBOAT, No. 3, HARBOR OF SYRACUSE, July 8, 1805.

SIR:

I have to acquaint you that, on the morning of the 15th June last, Gibraltar bearing northeast, distant two leagues, I was brought to by four Spanish gunboats, who, without examining a paper, or assigning any other reason than their suspicion of my being an Englishman, took charge and conducted me into Algeziras.

It is necessary to remark that my guns were at that time in the hold. Immediately on my arrival I stated officially the circumstance to the General of Marines, which I also enclose for your perusal. The boat was instantly discharged with many apologies, and offers of supplies and assistance should I stand in need of them. I was requested to wait a short time the General's answer. I did so till 4 P. M. Apprehensive I might be detained much longer, and knowing the importance of the boats joining you without the smallest delay, I weighed without it, and stood over to the rock, where, for the first time since our separation on the 15th May, I found the John Adams.

I should have waited on the General of Marine personally, but could not procure pratique.

I proceeded immediately to mounting my guns, and sailed from Gibraltar the 18th June.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOS. J. MAXWELL.

COMMODORE RODGERS.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Island of Cuba:

I, Henry Hill, Jun., consul of the United States, for the said island, residing at the city of Havana, do hereby certify, that the documents hereunto annexed, marked with the letters from A to G inclusive, and stamped with my consular seal, are true and faithful copies of the originals lodged and recorded in my office, having been by me therewith carefully collated and compared.

In testimony whereof, I have subscribed my name and affixed the seal of my office at Havana aforesaid the 30th day of August, one thousand eight hundred and five, and in the year of the independence of the United States, the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, JUN.

A.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Island of Cuba:

By this public instrument be it known unto all whom the same doth, shall, or may concern, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me Henry Hill, Jun., consul of the United States of America, for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, personally came and appeared William Cory, of Charleston, South Carolina, master of the brig Ann, and Caleb Cory, mate of said brig, who being by me severally duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose and declare, that being at the port of Cavañas in this island, in the month of May last, where they were loading said vessel with a cargo for the United States, they saw lying there an American schooner called the Betsey of New Bedford, taken by a French privateer called the Eugene, commanded by captain Joseph Dumas, some time previous, and sent into that port, which said schooner had a cargo in, consisting of about seventy-six puncheons of rum, and seven or eight barrels of sugar.

That during their stay there, they frequently saw the people belonging to said privateer taking out the cargo of said captured schooner and carrying it on shore and selling it.

That the said privateersmen to their knowledge took out the whole of the said vessel's cargo, and carried it on shore, where it was sold. That it was so taken out and carried on shore in open day without any appearance of opposition from the officers of the said port of Cavañas; that after the said privateersmen had plundered the whole of the cargo aforesaid, and taken it from the said vessel, and all her valuable rigging and sails, they took the said vessel off the mouth of the said harbor of Cavañas and sunk her.

* She had on board, besides the ordinary marine papers, a special passport from the President of the United States, reciting the nature of her cargo, and its destination for the supply of the Mediterranean squadron of the United States. She had also the passports of the British and French ministers.

And the deponent, William Cory, further saith, that the said privateersmen offered to sell him rum from the said cargo at thirty dollars a puncheon, which this deponent refused to buy, even at that low price, well knowing they had no title to it, and that in them to dispose of it was robbery and piracy.

That he was informed by the guard, which was on board his vessel, that said privateersmen had bribed the principal officer of said port, by giving him four puncheons of rum to consent to the landing and sale of said cargo; and further the deponent saith not.

WILLIAM CORY,
CALEB CORY.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal this eighth day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States, the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

B.

Consulate of the United States of America, Island of Cuba:

By this public instrument be it known unto all whom the same shall, doth, or may concern, that I, Henry Hill, Jun., consul of the United States of America for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, do hereby certify, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me personally came and appeared Jacob R. Valk late master, and George Allcock, late mate of and belonging to the schooner Sea Horse, of Charleston, who, on their solemn oaths, which they then took before me upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did, severally, solemnly depose and declare, that they, the deponents, on the 9th day of June, sailed and departed in and with the said schooner laden with a cargo of flour and German linens from Charleston aforesaid, bound on a voyage to Spanish America; that the said schooner at the commencement thereof was tight, staunch, and strong, and in every respect well fitted, furnished, found, manned, and equipped, for the due performance of the said voyage, with variable winds and weather, and without any particular occurrence until the 13th day of July, when they made the island of Blanca, on the 14th the Fortugas, and on the next day arrived off Laguaira. That they lay off and on Laguaira aforesaid, until the 20th following. In the course of which time he, the deponent, Jacob R. Valk, made application for admittance to entry; and being informed that that port as well as all others on that coast were shut against neutrals, he proceeded agreeable to his orders and instructions for this port of Havana. And the said several deponents did further depose, that in proceeding for the said port nothing material happened, until the 24th following of said month of July, when being off the island of Jamaica they were brought to by His Britannic Majesty's armed schooner Superior, and upon being examined and found to be neutral were politely dismissed. That they prosecuted the said voyage, making the best of their way for this said port, and experienced nothing remarkable until the 4th of August inst., when doubling cape San Antonio, in this island of Cuba, they were brought to by a schooner under French colors, and boarded by an officer and four men, who took possession of said schooner Sea Horse, and sent the deponent Jacob R. Valk, and two of his crew, on board the said privateer, with the said schooner's papers. That the officer on board said schooner Sea Horse hailed the commander of said privateer, and said, that as he knew her to be a good prize he would bring her to anchor, immediately upon which both vessels bore away for Pueeta Fuera, about four leagues from cape San Antonio.

That the commander of said privateer, aided by several Spaniards, who came on board her in canoes from their habitations on that coast, began rummaging the Sea Horse, opening the hatches, and breaking open the packages and cases of dry goods, principally consisting of German linens, whilst the crew of the said privateer were continually passing and repassing from one of the said vessels to the other, and most of them in a state of intoxication.

And the said deponent, Jacob R. Valk, did further depose, that being detained on board said privateer from the 4th to the 6th, he had ample opportunity of observing and examining her, and found her to be an American built vessel, having painted on her stern, Caroline of Charleston, which was very visible, notwithstanding some black paint had been put on it to efface it, but which was not done effectually. That she was mounted with one carriage gun, and one swivel, and supplied with small arms and manned with ten men, and two negro boys, exclusive of the captain, who said his name was Paul, and the privateer the Volante. And the said deponent did further depose, that the said Paul told him that he should be sent in an open boat to Havana, and upon his answering that he was determined to remain with his vessel wherever she went; the said Paul replied that if he again opened his mouth he would set him ashore in the woods, and leave him to perish. And the said several deponents did further depose, that on the same evening they were all embarked in an open boat, under the conduct of a Spanish fisherman, to go to a place about seventeen leagues distant called Mantua, where they received their clothes, which had been previously taken from them.

And the said Jacob R. Valk did further depose, that the said captain of said privateer, after having robbed and plundered him of all his sea charts, his vessel's and his own private papers, and also his perspective glass or telescope, and twenty-one ounces in gold, returned him six of said ounces to defray his expenses to this said port. And the said several deponents did severally further depose that James Richardson and Jacob Shoemaker, both citizens of the United States, and seamen belonging to said schooner Sea Horse, conducted themselves upon the capture aforesaid in a very mutinous manner, and remained with their own voluntary will with the said privateer.

And I, the said consul, do further certify, that the said Jacob R. Valk did, upon his arrival at Havana aforesaid, in due time and form, note and enter with me his protest in all the premises aforesaid, and now requires of me to extend the same and make this public act thereof, reserving to himself the privilege of making any other protest in the premises as occasion may require.

Wherefore, the said Jacob R. Valk doth, and I, the said consul, at his request do, by these presents most publicly and solemnly protest as well against the Governor at Laguaira aforesaid, and all other public officers, whom it may concern, for the refusal of admittance to entry as aforesaid at that port, as against the commander and officers and crew of the said privateer for the capture, and detention, and robbery, and plunder of the said schooner Sea Horse, and her cargo, and against all and every person and persons, whom it shall or may concern, for all damages, costs, charges and expenses, already suffered, or which shall or may be hereafter suffered and sustained in the premises on account thereof, that the same be borne by those to whom of right it shall appertain to be adjusted and recovered in time and place convenient.

Done and protested at Havana aforesaid.

JACOB R. VALK,
GEORGE ALLCOCK.

In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto subscribed their names, and I, the said consul, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal this twenty-first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

C.

Consulate of the United States of America, Island of Cuba:

By this public instrument be it known to all whom the same doth or may concern, that I, Henry Hill, Jun., consul of the United States of America for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, do hereby certify, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me personally came and appeared John L. Cranston, late master of the schooner Caroline, of Charleston, who, being by me duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose and declare that, on the 12th day of April last, he sailed and departed in and with the said schooner from Charleston aforesaid, with passengers, bound for St. Thomas, where he arrived on the 1st day of May following: that he sailed from thence on the 4th, with ballast, bound to Laguaira, and arrived off the said port on the 10th, and continued laying off and on until the 14th; that his sails being very much split, and the vessel otherwise in a bad state, and not being able to obtain permission to enter said port, he determined to bear away for the first port he could make, and on the day following was captured by His Britannic Majesty's ship of war Fortune, Henry Vansittart, commander, who took out him, the deponent, and his crew, and took possession of the said schooner, which he armed as a tender to cruise off Curacoa. That on the 25th the said schooner was delivered up to him, being plundered of the boat, oars, anchors, stores, &c. That being very much in want of repairs he thought it most prudent, as well for the preservation of the said vessel and their own lives, as to procure supplies, which they likewise stood very much in need of, to bear away for Jamaica. And on the 29th of May arrived at Kingston in the said island, where he in due form made his protest.

That he sailed from thence, after having received the necessary repairs and supplies; and having on board twenty puncheons of rum, the property, as he verily believes, of Andrew Ker, of Charleston aforesaid, a citizen of the United States, on the 9th July following, bound for Charleston aforesaid, and on the 15th was boarded by a felucca pirate, commanded by one Paul Cazafranca, who took from him all the vessels, papers, and all his letters, &c., and also possession of said schooner as a prize, with which he proceeded to Puerta Fuera, about four leagues from Cape Antonio, where he came to anchor; that he there unloaded said vessel and supplied the fishermen who were there with some of the rum belonging to the said cargo. That they continued there until the 23d following, when he sent the said schooner with the said deponent and crew to Mantua Pavola, where she arrived on the same day. And he, the deponent, with said crew, remained there until the 9th day of August, instant, without clothes or money, all of which and every thing else, except two or three shirts, they were robbed of by the said captors; that he there procured a boat, and upon the promise of paying one hundred dollars, was brought to this port of Havana, where they arrived on the 14th instant.

That he, the deponent, immediately despatched a memorial to his excellency the Governor, stating the circumstances, and praying for the restoration of said vessel and cargo; to which said memorial he has received no reply, and is of opinion that the same will be taken no notice of.

And on this same day also personally appeared before me, Andrew Ambree, mate, and William Wood and John Judson, seamen, late of, and belonging to, said schooner, who being by me severally duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose, that all and every the matters and facts relating to the voyage aforesaid, and the captures aforesaid, are in every respect true.

And the said deponent, John L. Cranston, did, upon his arrival, in due time and form note and enter with me, the said consul, his protest in the premises, and now requires of me to make this public act thereof, reserving to himself the privilege of further extending the same, or to make any other in the premises, as occasion may require.

Wherefore, the said John L. Cranston doth, and I, the said consul, at his request, do by these presents most publicly and solemnly protest, as well against the seas, gales of wind, and bad weather, the said schooner experienced on the said voyage, as against the commander, officers, and crews of the said ship of war Fortune and felucca pirate, for the captures, plunder, and detention aforesaid, and for all costs, damages, losses, and expenses already, and which shall or may be hereafter, sustained on account thereof; to the end that the same be borne by those to whom of right it shall belong to be adjusted and recovered, in time and place convenient.

Done and protested at Havana aforesaid.

JOHN L. CRANSTON,
ANDREW AMBREE, his × mark.
WILLIAM WOOD, his × mark.
JOHN JUDSON.

In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto subscribed their names, and I, the said consul, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal, this nineteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States, the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

D.

Island of Cuba—Havana:

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known and manifest unto all whom the same doth, shall, or may concern, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me, Henry Hill, Jun. consul of the United States of America for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, personally came and appeared John Date, late mate of the brig Success of New York, whereof Nicholas Brum was master, John Fuller and Josiah Pelt, late seamen, belonging to said brig, James Ferguson and John Smith, late passengers in said brig, who, being severally duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose and say, that they sailed from Kingston, (Jamaica,) on the 6th day of the present month of July in the said brig Success, bound to New York, (where the said brig is owned,) with a cargo on board consisting of fifty puncheons of rum; that nothing material happened them until the 12th day of the same month, when, being in sight of Cape Antonio, (the west end of this island of Cuba,) about four miles distant, they were met with, and the said brig was boarded by a small felucca privateer under Spanish colors, which these deponents understood to be the Buena Union, Captain Ulariago, from this port of Havana, (then under the command of the mate, the said Captain Ulariago as these deponents understood, being in the city,) who, without any examination into the said vessel's papers, captured her, put a prize master and crew on board, and forcibly deprived the said master and these deponents of the possession of the said brig and her cargo, and took the whole crew, including the said master and the said passengers, (except six Frenchmen, who were passengers in said brig,) on board the said privateer. That the said master of the said brig was cruelly flogged, beaten, and otherwise abused on board the said privateer, and was then sent on board of his said brig. That these deponents were also cruelly flogged and beaten on board the said privateer, and at night thrown into the hold and placed in irons, where they lay, without having any sustenance, until the day following, when they were liberated from the irons and suffered to come upon deck.

That the said brig was not then to be seen, and these deponents were told by the privateersmen, that they had sent her to Campeachy. That the said privateer two days afterwards came to anchor in a small bay near said cape, when these deponents were turned ashore, (after being robbed of many articles of their personal apparel,) and the mate of the said brig of his books, charts, and quadrants, without any sustenance or the means of obtaining it; and were left to wander in an inhospitable part of the island, far removed from any town or inhabitants, and to support their lives in the best manner they could.

That being desirous of finding some town or inhabitants, amongst whom they might procure the necessaries of life, they wandered about a day or two, and at length came to a small village, where they were taken up before the commandant, who conceived them to be Englishmen, and forwarded them to this place, (Havana,) as such; whither they arrived on the 30th instant, and were conveyed first to the guard-house, and afterwards to the common prison of the city, where they remained until this day, when they were liberated by order of the Governor, and paid to the jailer seventeen dollars and a half jail fees.

And thereupon the said several deponents did, in behalf of the said master, the owners, freighters, and all others concerned in the said brig and cargo, request of me to make their protest and this public act thereof. Wherefore, the said deponents do, and I, the said consul, at their request, also do by these presents, most publicly and solemnly protest as well against the commander, officers, and crew of the said privateer and the owners thereof, as against all and every other person and persons whom it shall or may concern, for the capture and detention of the said brig and cargo, and the subsequent circumstances, and for all costs, damages, charges, and expenses attending the same, to the end that the same be suffered and borne by those to whom of right it shall appertain, to be adjusted and recovered in time and place convenient.

Done and protested at Havana aforesaid.

JOHN DATE,
JOHN FULLER,
JOSIAH PELT,
JAMES FERGUSON,
JOHN SMITH.

In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto subscribed their names, and the said consul have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal, this thirty-first day of July, A. D. eighteen hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States, the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

E.

Island of Cuba—Havana:

By this public instrument of protest be it made known and manifest unto all whom the same shall, doth, or may concern, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me, Henry Hill, Jun. consul of the United States of America for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, personally came and appeared Henry Palmer, master of the brig Jason of Philadelphia, who, being by me duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose and declare, that on the 7th day of April last, he sailed and departed in and with the said brig, laden with a cargo of salt, earthenware, porter, dry goods, &c. from Liverpool in England, and bound to New Orleans, consigned to different persons there, and to the best of his knowledge and belief, the property of citizens of the United States.

That in the prosecution of the said voyage, nothing material happened until the 20th day of June, when being in sight of Cape Antonio, four or five leagues distant, he discovered two sail, at about two o'clock in the afternoon, which appeared in chase of his said vessel. That one of them came up with his vessel about half past four o'clock, when she hoisted English colors and fired two guns, on which he hove to and waited her coming up with him. That after having come within hail, he was ordered by a person on board said privateer to come on board with his papers, which he did after this deponent was on board the said privateer, the English colors were taken down and Spanish hoisted; and this deponent understood the said privateer to be called the Buena Union, commanded by José Antonio Ulariago; the captain of which immediately after ordered the people of this deponent out of the boat, and sent four men in his said boat on board his said brig, and detained this deponent, with two men who had come with him, on board said privateer.

That after the people had got on board said vessel, some conversation passed between the captain of the privateer and the people he had sent on board the brig; and immediately after they altered the course of his said brig, and stood in towards the island of Cuba; soon after, the other vessel which was in sight came up, which he, the deponent, understood was the French privateer Napoleon, commanded by one Pierre Liquet, which also changed her course, and stood in towards said island, in company with said Spanish privateer and the deponent's brig. That on the same day, at about ten o'clock at night, the three vessels aforesaid came to anchor near Cape Antonio, where the best bower anchor was lost, and a part of the cable belonging to said brig, and where was also lying at anchor a small felucca French privateer. The morning following, the 21st ultimo, the privateersmen proceeded with his said brig to a small bay, where there are a number of small islands, about six leagues from where the said brig had been anchored, and the said privateers accompanied her. In which bay the said brig was brought to anchor, where also the said privateers came to anchor. That amongst these islands there was lying an American schooner called the Mary of Camden, which had been taken some time previous by the small felucca aforesaid, which accompanied the other privateers from Cape Antonio.

That this deponent was suffered, in the evening after coming to anchor, to go on board his said vessel, where he discovered that all his papers, of every description, as well as those relating to the vessel as to the cargo, and his own private papers, were taken; and that the privateersmen had broken into the hold of his vessel, and taken out of a cask, which they had broken open, a number of bottles of porter which belonged to the cargo of said vessel; that two days after their arrival at said bay, to wit, on the 23d, the privateersmen opened the hatches of his said vessel, and took several packages of dry goods upon deck, when they descried a sail in the offing, on which the goods were put below, and the hatches shut, and the said three privateersmen went out in pursuit of said sail, but soon after returned; that, on the day following, the 24th, the privateersmen again opened the hatches of his said vessel, and took out all the dry goods, being about thirty-two packages, also one cask, containing twenty bags of shot, and also a number of casks of porter, which they sent on board the different privateers, and also put on board the French privateer Napoleon all the dry goods and the said cask of shot, and nineteen half-barrels of salt, and likewise robbed and plundered the said vessel of a considerable quantity of her rigging, furniture, and apparel.

And the said deponent doth further depose and say, that they put on board the said schooner Mary twenty casks of porter, some crates of earthenware, and other articles.

That, on the 28th, the said brig was got under way, having a prizemaster on board from the said Spanish privateer, and eight men to her also belonging, together with this deponent and three of his men, the mate having been put on board of the privateer with three others of the crew of the said brig; that he, the deponent, was informed they were coming with said brig to Havana, but after coming to anchor at various places on the coast, at several of which a quantity of porter and salt was taken out of said brig and given to different people on the coast; and on the 9th instant they came to anchor with said brig in the harbor of Cavañas.

That, the day following, this deponent demanded leave to go on shore in order to make his situation known to the commandant, but was refused, and kept prisoner on board his said vessel until Sunday the 15th, when he was taken out with one of his men, and put on board a small open boat, in which also embarked the prizemaster and four men belonging to the said privateer, and was informed by the prizemaster they were coming to this port; that, on the day following, they arrived at this said port, and this deponent was forcibly taken to the guard house, and not permitted to have any communication with any person; and was so kept in prison until the next day, till about ten o'clock, when he was taken to the marine office and questioned relative to his capture, and was there set at liberty; that he, the deponent, frequently demanded his papers of the said privateersmen, which consisted of the papers of the said brig, invoices, and bills of lading of cargo, about two hundred and twenty letters, and various other papers, but was uniformly refused them.

And on this same day, before me also personally appeared Nathaniel Houston, chief mate, late of, and belonging to, the said brig Jason, who, being by me duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did solemnly depose and declare, that all and singular the matters and facts before stated and set forth are in every respect true.

Whereupon, the said Henry Palmer doth, and I, at his request, do most publicly and solemnly protest, as well against the commanders, officers, crews, and owners, of the said Spanish and French privateers, as against all and every other person and persons whom the same shall or may concern, for the unlawful capture and detention of the said brig whilst in the prosecution of a lawful voyage, and the depredations, robbery, and plunder, committed upon the said vessel, her rigging, furniture, and cargo, and for all damages, losses, costs, and expenses which shall or may be sustained in the premises on account thereof. And the said Henry Palmer doth hereby reserve to himself the privilege of making any other, or additional protest, as need and occasion may require.

This done and protested at Havana, as aforesaid.

HENRY PALMER.
NATH. HOUSTON.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal, this 20th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States, the thirtieth.

Consulate of the United States of America—Island of Cuba:

By this public instrument of protest be it known unto all whom the same shall, doth, or may concern, that, on the day of the date hereof, personally appeared before me Jacob Paiddrick, a citizen of the United States, born in the county of Camden, State of North Carolina, late mate of the schooner Mary, of Camden, aforesaid, Stephen

Charles, master: also, John Davis and Jeremiah Graves, both citizens of the United States, and late mariners on board of said schooner; who, being severally duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose and say, that they sailed from Jamaica on board of said schooner, bound for Charleston, S. C.; and that, while lawfully and peaceably pursuing their said voyage on board said vessel, with a cargo, consisting of thirty puncheons of rum and five hogsheads of molasses, the property of citizens of the United States, they, together with said vessel and cargo, on the 22d of May aforesaid, were captured by a felucca privateer, under French colors, one Paul, commander, who took possession of said vessel and cargo, and brought her to an anchor the same day, near Cape Antonio; that the aforesaid Stephen Charles, master of said schooner Mary, was forcibly taken out of his said vessel, and put on board of an American vessel bound to Charleston; that these deponents, after remaining six or seven days on board said schooner, during which time she continued at anchor, were forcibly taken out of said vessel, and put on shore at Cape Antonio, without any sustenance, or means of obtaining it, and told to stay there and die, or go where they pleased; that they found several fishermen near the place aforesaid, who, pitying their distressed situation, hospitably supplied them with provisions during six or seven days; at the expiration of which time, Anselmo Henrique, who had a canoe, and was fishing on the coast, was prevailed upon, at the instance of these deponents, to bring them to this city of Havana, on condition of their giving him their clothing, which they, these deponents, were obliged to do; that the said Anselmo Henrique, having received their clothing, took them on board his canoe, and proceeded with them on their way hither, as far as the port of Cavañas; the commandant of which port would not suffer them to proceed further in said canoe, declaring them to be Englishmen and spies, and placed them in the stocks as prisoners, and kept them there about fourteen hours, when they were liberated and suffered to proceed to this place by land, with the said Anselmo Henrique, where they arrived this day.

And thereupon the said deponents, in behalf of themselves, the said Stephen Charles, and all others concerned in said schooner and cargo, do, by these presents, most publicly and solemnly protest, and require of me to protest. Wherefore, at the request aforesaid, I, the said consul, do protest, as well against the commander, officers, and crew, of the said felucca privateer, (the name of which is at present unknown,) Paul, commander, and all others whom it may concern, for the illegal capture of the said schooner Mary and cargo, and the treatment of the said master, Stephen Charles, and they, the said several deponents, experienced as aforesaid, and the dangers and hardships they encountered in consequence thereof, and for all damages, losses, costs, and charges attending the same.

This done and protested at the said city of Havana.

JACOB PAIDDRICK,
JOHN DAVIS,
JEREMIAH GRAVES.

In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto subscribed their names, and I, the said consul, have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my consular seal, the 14th day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-ninth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

G.

Declaration of John Evans, master of the ship Eliza, of Norfolk, and of Charles Simmons, Jun., and Edward Lowrie, seamen belonging to said ship.

Before me, Henry Hill, Jun., consul of the United States of America for the island of Cuba, resident at Havana, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared John Evans, master of the ship Eliza, of Norfolk, and Charles Simmons, Jun., and Edward Lowrie, seamen belonging to said ship, who, being by me severally duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose and say, and first the said John Evans:

That he sailed from Norfolk in the said ship on or about the 12th day of October last, with a cargo on board, consisting of staves and provisions, bound for Kingston, Jamaica, the said cargo being the sole property of Conway and Fortescue Whittle, merchants of Norfolk, and citizens of the United States; that he arrived in and with said ship on or about the 5th day of November following, when the said cargo was sold for account of the said Messrs. Conway and Fortescue Whittle; that from Kingston he proceeded in and with said ship to Anotta bay, on the north side said island of Jamaica, for the purpose of loading his said ship with a cargo, where he actually purchased and loaded on board said ship, a cargo, consisting of one hundred and seventy-nine puncheons of rum, for the sole account and risk of the aforesaid Messrs. Conway and Fortescue Whittle; that he sailed from thence in and with said ship with said cargo, on or about the 21st day of March following, bound to Norfolk aforesaid, with all the necessary and usual documents on board, to prove the said ship and cargo bona fide American property, belonging to citizens of the United States; that on the 27th day of same month, while peaceably and lawfully navigating his said ship for the port of Norfolk aforesaid, then being in sight of the Isle of Pines, on the south side of this island of Cuba, he was met with, boarded, and unlawfully captured by a privateer under French colors, called the Vigilant, commanded by one Amado Dejan, as he understood, who forcibly and unlawfully deprived this deponent of the possession of his said ship and cargo, and placed a prizemaster and men on board thereof, from the said privateer, and with force and violence took this deponent out of his said ship, together with Onis Danion, first mate, and Richard Thomas, second mate thereof, and six of the seamen of his said ship, and landed them on the west end of said Isle of Pines, with only one day's provisions, and without the means of procuring further sustenance; that this deponent, with his said mates and crew, remained at said port of said island, which is entirely uninhabited, about two weeks, and supported themselves on fish which they caught, there being no other food or sustenance to be procured; at the expiration of which time, that he, with his said mates and crew, took passage in a Spanish vessel which casually touched there, and were transported to the east end of said island of Pines, where there are some inhabitants, from whence this deponent, with his said mates and crew, after remaining four or five days, took passage in a Spanish vessel, and proceeded to Batabano, in this island of Cuba, from whence they proceeded by land to the city of Havana; that, after being some days in this city, this deponent heard his said ship had been taken into Batabano, and soon after saw the prizemaster here who was put on board his said ship, who gave to this deponent the following papers of said ship, declaring, at the same time, that he considered the said ship and cargo American property; that the captain of said privateer had absconded, and left him without support, and that he had no idea of pursuing her as lawful prize, and had abandoned her; that the papers which were delivered to this deponent were the following: 1st, The Mediterranean pass of said ship; 2d, Sea-letter; 3d, Clearance from Norfolk; 4th, Articles of agreement between master and mariners of said ship; 5th, Certified list of crew; 6th, Bill of health, &c.; 7th, Ship's log book. That the said ship had a register and certificates of property of cargo, bills of lading, invoices, &c. at the time of capture, which were taken from him, and which were not delivered up with the other papers, and which this deponent understood, and has reason to believe, were unlawfully and wantonly destroyed; that this deponent, after ascertaining that his said ship was in Batabano aforesaid, and after receiving the said papers, did, on the 7th day of May last, present to his excellency the Marquis of Someruelos, Captain General of said island of Cuba, a memorial, wherein he stated the capture of the said ship, and prayed that she might be restored to the rightful owners, from whom she had been unlawfully captured; that, not having any reply to his memorial, he, shortly after, again memorialized his excellency, praying that he would order his ship to be restored; that not having any reply to this, his second memorial, and understanding that a part of his crew who were suffered to remain on board at the time of capture, were detained as prisoners on board in the said port of Batabano, and were suffering for the want of the necessaries of life, and that the Frenchmen who remained on board, and the Spaniards from shore, were daily plundering from his said ship and cargo, and wishing to know the state thereof, and to grant some relief to his crew, he proceeded to Batabano without a passport, (the Captain General having refused him one,) with intent to go on board his said ship; that on his arrival at Batabano, he was prevented by the commandant there from going on board his said ship, and was ordered by him immediately to return to this city, or that he would send him back prisoner under a guard of soldiers, wherefore this deponent was obliged to return; that, on the 14th day of June, he again memorialized his excellency, presenting, therewith, all the papers of the aforesaid ship, delivered up to him by the prizemaster aforesaid, (except the sea-letter, which was presented with his first memorial,) in consequence of which, on the day following, a decree was given, ordering his said ship and cargo to be restored and delivered him, and a passport granted for him to proceed to Batabano and take possession thereof.

That for this purpose he proceeded to Batabano, and on his arrival there the 24th of June, he presented his passport and order to the commandant there, who sent with him an officer and two soldiers to execute the said order and give him possession of his said ship. That accordingly, on the 25th day of June, he received possession of his said ship, and on examination thereof, and of her cargo, there was a deficiency of the following articles, which had been plundered from her since the capture aforesaid, to wit: two boats, a string cable, three anchors, two new top-sails, a new foresail, four studding sails, two royals, several spars, all her spare running rigging, all her cabin furniture and water casks, besides blocks and many other small articles, and from her cargo ninety-six whole puncheons of rum, there being only eighty-three remaining on board, and many of these wanting from ten to fifty gallons, so that this deponent conceiving that the contents of the said eighty-three puncheons would not more than fill sixty.

That an account was presented to him at Batabano against said ship of upwards of nine hundred dollars, for various articles which had been taken up upon the credit of the said ship by the Frenchman who captured her, which this deponent was obliged to satisfy before he was suffered to depart with his said ship. That on the 12th day of July instant, he departed in and with the said ship, from the bay of Batabano, and arrived at this port of Havana, on the 26th day of July instant, without any material accident happening, and came to anchor at the mouth of the harbor, not being permitted to come on with said ship for the purpose of supplying himself with the necessary stores, cables, &c. to proceed on his voyage to Norfolk, aforesaid, whither he is bound.

And the aforesaid Charles H. Simmons and Edward Lowrie depose and declare, that all and every the matters and things set forth and declared by the said John Evans in the preceding declaration, relating to the capture of the said ship, and to the deficiency therein stated of her cargo, apparel, furniture, &c. are to their knowledge just and true.

That they were detained on board said ship after the capture, and held prisoners on board, frequently wanting for the necessaries of life, until she was given up to the said Captain Evans, as stated in his declaration.

That before the said ship was taken into Batabano, she was brought to anchor by the said privateersmen upon the coast of Cuba, about ten leagues to the west end of said port of Batabano, where they took from her cargo a number of puncheons of rum and put them on board of a schooner.

That the said ship was again brought to anchor before her arrival at Batabano, about one league from the port, where the said privateersmen also took from her cargo a number of puncheons of rum, and put them on board a Spanish sloop, which these deponents understood belonged to the King's pilot at Batabano, who assisted the said privateersmen in the robbery.

That on the said ship's arrival at Batabano, a number of puncheons of rum were there taken out of said ship, and carried on shore by the said privateersmen, assisted by some Spaniards from shore, who during the said ships remaining there, night after night, smuggled on shore from the said ship quantities of rum, which they drew from the puncheons on board into small kegs. That the said Frenchmen and Spaniards daily plundered the rigging and furniture of said ship, and were very abusive and gave much ill treatment to these deponents.

JOHN EVANS,
CHARLES H. SIMMONS, Jun.
EDWARD LOWRIE.

And the said John Evans having applied to me, the said consul, to make this his protest in the premises, I have granted this public certificate thereof, to serve and avail him and all in the premises aforesaid, as occasion may require.

Wherefore, the said John Evans in behalf of himself, the freighters, owners and all others concerned in the said vessel and cargo, doth, and I the said consul at his desire, do by these presents, protest as well against the commander, officers, and crew of the aforementioned privateer as against all and every person and persons concerned therein, for the capture of the said vessel and the robbery and plunder committed upon the said vessel and cargo, for all damages, losses, costs and expenses already sustained, or which shall or may hereafter be sustained, suffered and incurred in the premises on account thereof.

Done and protested in the city of Havana agreeably to mercantile laws on such cases used and approved of.

In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto subscribed their names, and I, the said consul, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my consular seal this 2d day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States the thirtieth.

HENRY HILL, Jun.

St. Juan, (Porto Rico,) September 12, 1805.

Sir:

When depredations on neutral property by Powers at war become the order of the day, when no respect is paid to existing treaties, I conceive it a duty incumbent on every individual to note every such infringement, and to give advice of it to the Executive of that Government to which he belongs.

As I am unaccustomed to a forensic style, I shall simply relate my own case, and whatever has come under my immediate observation during my short stay in this island: I left Norfolk on the 1st of June last in the brig Catharine, bound for the island of Antigua, laden with a cargo of provisions and lumber, where I arrived, and sold said cargo. I left the island of Antigua on the 29th July, with a return cargo, bound back to Norfolk; on the 4th August, in latitude 23° 10′ north, longitude 65° west, was captured by the French brig called General Blanshot, John Baptiste de Brun, commander, and sent into one of the ports at the west end of this island. The privateer plundered me of my stores and ship's provisions and part of the cargo. The vessel was immediately stripped of her sails and rigging and sent ashore; my people taken out, put on board of another vessel, and sent out of the island. Under these circumstances I came to the city and applied to the Governor, requesting his interference; stating to him that my papers were perfectly regular, and that my capture was of course illegal; and, I likewise requested him to order security to be given for the amount of my brig and cargo, as the agent of said privateer was a resident merchant of this city. But all my representation has been to no effect: he has absolutely refused to take cognizance of my business. My papers remain in the hands of Mr. Daubon, the agent of the captors. I may be detained here many months to come, and the vessel and cargo exposed to a total loss. My trial, if any I am to have, must be, by the determination of this Government, either at Martinique or Guadaloupe; thus, under the present circumstances, this island may become the asylum of pirates and robbers. No pretence has been given for my capture; as I came from an English island I might have English property on board. At the time of my capture, my cabin boy was carried on board the privateer, and put in irons, threatened with severe chastisement unless he would declare that specie was deposited in some part of the vessel. This attempt proving fruitless, I now (in all probability) must be the victim of measures dictated by men without principles of honesty or honor. Thus far as relates to myself. I shall now take the liberty of relating to you some other particulars that have come under my observation. At my arrival at the port of my entry on the west end of the island, I found at anchor the brig Susanna, of Portland, Maine, the captain's name I do not recollect; said brig arrived the day before and prize to the same privateer; she was from Portland bound to Jamaica, and was taken on her outward bound passage with a cargo of fish and lumber; said brig was immediately unloaded and ballasted with sand, and without more ceremony, the captain and crew of said vessel, together with the mate and crew of my own vessel, were shipped off with a very scanty supply of provisions, and left to search for the first port they could make. On the 4th instant, arrived the brig Polly, of Tiverton, Rhode Island, captain Trip; and on the 5th instant the schooner Mary Ann, of Boston, captain Anthony, and bound to the island of Barbadoes, loaded with cattle and horses, and provisions on the deck. They are prizes to a Spanish xebeck, from Cadiz, bound to Vera Cruz. The captains live still on board with their crews, and may remain so for many days to come; while the captor and his agent are prosecuting every measure to effect the condemnation of said vessels as lawful prizes. I am, &c.

JOSEPH LEONARD,

Native of New Hampshire and a resident of Virginia.

JAMES MADISON, Esq. Secretary of State of the United States of America.

CONSULAR OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Gibraltar:

[L. S.] On this 13th day of September, 1805, personally appeared in my consular office of the United States of America, John Allen, commander of the sloop Ranger, belonging to the Government of the aforesaid United States, and John Thompson, master's mate on board said sloop Ranger, who, after being sworn on the Holy Evangelists, did declare jointly and severally, each speaking for himself, that they sailed in and with said vessel from Boston, in America, on or about the 21st day of July last, on the service of said Government, in company with the sloop Traveller, commanded by captain Benjamin Prince, with whom they parted company a few days after their leaving Boston, by stress of weather.

That, on the 23d of August last, being in latitude 40° 32′ north, and longitude 30° 33′ west, a schooner came up with them, mounting six guns with sixteen blunderbusses, and about eighteen men, who, although the American colors were flying on board the Ranger, and the vessel hove to, fired three broadsides at her without showing any colors, ordering captain Allen to go on board them, which he did; they then came on board the sloop Ranger, broke open captain Allen's chest and trunk, taking from them twelve white shirts, a suit of uniform, six pair silk and six pair of cotton stockings, twelve handkerchiefs, two blue jackets, three white dimity waistcoats, two new hats, two pair new shoes, and two pair nankeen pantaloons, a spy-glass, sixty-three gallons brandy, butter, cheese, pork, and other articles of ship's stores; likewise, the doctor's box, the mate's, and some of the men's clothes and money; also, a letter from the Governor of Malta, and several other papers.

That the commander and crew of the said schooner privateer behaved in a most insulting and abusive manner, and they seemed by their appearance, language, dress, and manners, to have been Spaniards; wherefore, they make this declaration, and protest, not only for the robbery committed, but also for the insult shown the flag under which they sailed.

JOHN ALLEN,
JOHN THOMPSON.

Sworn and declared the day and year first above written, before me,

JOHN GAVINO,

Consul of the United States of America.

Extract of a letter from Governor William C. C. Claiborne to the Secretary of War, dated

NEW ORLEANS, March 15, 1804.

SIR:

In consequence of a letter I received from Mr. Joseph Chambers, the United States factor at Fort St. Stephens, informing me, that he had a quantity of peltry, &c. ready for exportation, and desiring that I would make arrangements with the Spanish authorities, to secure to articles to and from the factory a passage free from interruption or duties, I addressed to the Governor of West Florida, (who is now in this city,) a letter of which the enclosed No. 1 is a copy, and on this day I received an answer, of which No. 2 is a copy. From these documents, you will discover that the interest of the factory, is in a measure subjected to the caprice of a Spanish officer.

No. 1.

Copy of a letter from Governor Claiborne to Governor Folch, dated

NEW ORLEANS, March 7, 1804.

SIR:

The President of the United States, with a view to preserve a good understanding with the Choctaw Indians, has established a factory or trading house at Fort St. Stephens, on the Tombigbee river. The goods transmitted to this factory, and the peltry, &c. exported therefrom are the property of the United States, and I persuade myself, that, on their passage by the way of Mobile, no duties will be exacted, or interruption offered by the authorities of Spain.

I beg leave to remind your excellency, that, by a treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, they are mutually bound to restrain the Indians within their respective limits from committing hostilities against the adjacent settlements of either Power.

The prosperity, therefore, of the factory at Fort St. Stephens is interesting to both our nations, since the influence which the American Government may acquire in the Choctaw councils will be used not only to secure peace and safety to our own frontiers, but to the dominions of His Catholic Majesty.

Accept assurances of my great respect and high consideration.

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

His Excellency GOVERNOR FOLCH.

No. 2.

Copy of a letter from Governor Folch to Governor Claiborne, dated

MARCH 15, 1804.

SIR:

In order to answer your letter of the 7th instant, with due propriety, and according to the spirit of the Royal orders prevailing on the subject, I consulted the Intendant Mr. John D. Morales, who has given me his opinion in the following terms:

My opinion, sir, respecting the particulars related in Governor Claiborne's letter to you, is, that we cannot deviate from the order given to us by His Catholic Majesty, which I have transcribed to you in my last, of the 8th instant. For the same reason, when His Excellency General Wilkinson requested to allow the pass of two American vessels, one in the spring the other in the fall, which I did not grant, and His Majesty approved my conduct, and caused the treaty to be carried into execution.

These circumstances will convince your excellency, that it is not in my power to comply with your request; however, I will represent the case to the King, and inform you of the result as soon as possible.

Accept assurances of my respect and consideration.

F. FOLCH.

His Excellency GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE.

Extract of a letter from Joseph Chambers, United States factor, to the Secretary of War, dated CHOCTAW TRADING HOUSE, April 11, 1804.

"It may not be improper in me to state, that it will be impossible for to continue the trading house on the river Tombigbee, and to afford to the Indians that friendly accommodation intended by the Government without incurring certain loss, unless we are speedily freed from the heavy exaction of twelve per centum demanded by the Spanish officers at Mobile, on all exports that pass this port, and the same on imports, making together nearly one fourth per cent."

Extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne to the Secretary of War, dated

NEW ORLEANS, April 20, 1804.

"In conformity with my advice, Joseph Chambers, United States factor for the Choctaw nation, has shipped a quantity of peltry for Philadelphia, (via New Orleans.) On the passage of the peltry down the Mobile river, a duty was demanded by the Spanish officers at the town of Mobile, and which Mr. Chambers paid, not, however, without entering a protest against the proceeding, a copy of which I now enclose you.

"Some provisions sent by the contractor from this city to Fort Stoddert were also detained at Mobile, until a duty of twelve per cent. was paid thereon; duties are also exacted on all exports passing down the Mobile, and paid very reluctantly by our citizens.

"The Spaniards are fortifying Pensacola and the town of Mobile; at the former place there is to be stationed five or six hundred men, and at the latter a battalion of artillery, and one company of dragoons are now employed."

Protest of Joseph Chambers, United States factor.

Whereas, by the order of the proper officers of the Government of the United States of America, sixty bales, three hogsheads and one barrel of peltries and furs, the property of said Government, collected at the Governmental trading house, established by authority, for the friendly accommodation of the Choctaw nation of Indians, was directed to be transported from said trading house, in the county of Washington, Mississippi Territory, by descending the Tombigbee or Mobile river, and from thence to the city of Philadelphia, in the Atlantic part of the United States, (via New Orleans.) The said cargo of peltries and furs, being on its passage as aforesaid, at the mouth of said river at the post of Mobile, the officers of His Most Catholic Majesty the King of Spain did at that post demand a duty of twelve per centum upon their estimated value of said cargo, to be paid for the use of His Majesty, and it was then made known and properly certified to the said officers, that the said peltries and furs were the property of the United States, and was then on its passage from one part thereof, to another. Notwithstanding which, the said officers did on the thirteenth day of April, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and four, detain and stop the said cargo at the said post of Mobile, and did then and there refuse to permit it to proceed on its passage, until the said duty of twelve per centum, amounting to one hundred and eighty-two dollars and sixty-eight cents, was paid.

Now the undersigned agent of the United States, having paid the aforesaid sum of one hundred and eighty-two dollars sixty-eight cents; not admitting the right of His Most Catholic Majesty's officers to exact or impose the aforesaid duty in manner and form aforesaid, cannot suffer a proceeding so unaccommodating, and apparently unjust, to pass with tacit acquiescence, and in compliance with his official obligations he enters this his remonstrance and solemn protest.

Because, the exaction of a duty upon the property of a Government passing upon navigable waters, (which are the common highways of nature,) from one part of its territories to another, although this passage might intersect the limits of a different Government, is in violation of a right which ought not to be questioned by nations friendly to each other.

Because, His Most Catholic Majesty has manifested a disposition friendly, liberal, and just, towards the Government of the United States, and the chief magistrates of each nation have mutually cultivated peace, harmony, and good will, between their respective citizens and subjects, it is therefore supposed that this proceeding is without His Majesty's orders or his knowledge, and that it has probably emanated from the same source from which the unauthorized act of shutting the port of New Orleans against the United States' right of deposit in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, proceeded. That the proceedings aforesaid may be duly made known to His Most Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, and to the President of the United States of America, and thereby become the subject of proper investigation, this remonstrance and protest is made and delivered to Colonel Maximilian Maisant, commandant political and military at Mobile.

Done at Mobile, this 13th April, 1804.

Agent to the Choctaw trading house.

Copy of a letter from Joseph Chambers, United States factor, to the Secretary of War, dated CHOCTAW TRADING HOUSE, HOBUKINTOOPA, December 12, 1804.

SIR:

Enclosed herewith is a copy of a letter from Michael Aelava, collector of the customs at the port of Mobile, to me, and my reply thereto: his letter and the vessels with the goods I met at Fort Stoddert, on my way to Mobile. I have earnestly to solicit you will direct me how to proceed in the particular business to which these letters relate, also, to give instructions for my Government generally, in my intercourse with the Spanish officers at Mobile, for your instructions would relieve me from much anxiety, occasioned by my fears, that, by acting from my own discretion, I may commit errors, or do things that might not meet your approbation; increased hindrances and obstacles are given by the Spanish officers at Mobile to this house; although justice demands that I should state that Michael Aelava, collector, has been very civil and respectful in the execution of what he states to be the duties of his office, and the orders of his superior officers.

There will be a considerable quantity of peltry and fur to remit the ensuing spring from this house; if a duty is to be allowed to the Spaniards upon its passage by Mobile, I must be furnished with the means to meet it. I, however, flatter myself that we will in a very short time have the free and unfettered navigation of the Mobile river.

I have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect and attachment, your most obedient humble servant,

JOSEPH CHAMBERS.

GENERAL DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from Michael Aelava to Joseph Chambers, dated

MOBILE, November 20, 1804.

SIR:

From what Mr. Smith gave me to understand, I have expected since Sunday last to have seen you here; the weather now is favorable, and I do not wish to detain the vessel. Mr. Smith has bound himself to me to pay the duties on his goods at the end of the year if Governor Folch does not free them; in full assurance that I have to do with a man of honor, and that you will acquiesce to the above conditions; and if not convenient for you to come down yourself, you can make out an obligation, (in the manner Mr. Smith has done,) for what goods belong to you, and send it to me as soon as possible, for as a public officer I must always have documents to show.

I am, with consideration and esteem, your most obedient servant,

M. AELAVA.

Document, relative to the obstruction of our commerce on the Mobile.

Copy of a letter from Joseph Chambers to Michael Aelava, Collector of the Customs at Mobile, dated

FORT STODDERT, November 27, 1804.

SIR:

I had the honor to receive your letter of the 20th current, yesterday. It should have been known, that I did at Mobile, in April last, protest against the right to exact duties from the United States, for its property passing by water, from one of its ports to another, although, in such passage, it might intersect the territory of another Government; therefore, there was no ground of assurance or even probable expectation, that I would consent to, or acquiesce in the decision of Governor Folch, only on this question. Further, it will be recollected by the commandant, Captain Osorno, Colonel Maxent and Mr. Simpson, that I did at that time refuse to sign a bond for duties, (but the necessity of the case only induced me to pay the duties then demanded,) consequently, a bond could, or ought not to be expected from me in this instance, to authorise the passage of public goods, for the Indian trading house, and the Indian presents, and more especially when we take into view the fifth article of the treaty of San Lorenzo de Real of the 27th October, 1795, between the United States and the King of Spain, and which the stoppage of these goods, might, perhaps, have tended to counteract. Here I quoted the article. Vide treaty, article 5.

The United States have suffered Spanish subjects, for their own private account and interest, to furnish the Indians within their limits with merchandise without tax or hindrance.

The Spanish Government by its officers at Mobile have levied, and demanded oppressive taxes on the property of the United States, which property or merchandise was expressly intended by the American Government for the humane and benevolent purposes of cultivating peace, friendship, and good will, between the Indians within their limits and the white people; and also to promote the civilization and happiness of these Indians.

Under the foregoing circumstances, no bond could, or will be given by me, without express orders from the Government under which I have the honor to act. No great public accommodation (for it is the Government only that is interested) is received by the permission for these goods to pass, after some of them had been detained one month or thereabouts, without any notice being given for what cause, and, knowing, as I presume was known and well understood, that they were the property of the United States, and consequently, they must have been permitted to pass as their property only, without any relation to my individual honor or interest, and upon the Governmental responsibility. I feel confident that the American Government will cause justice to be done towards you as an officer, for the friendly accommodation intended them by the forwardment of their vessels. I shall send a copy of your letter, and of this, to the proper officers of Government, also inform them of the respectful manner in which you have exercised the duties of your office in your concerns with me.

I am, &c.

JOSEPH CHAMBERS.

Governor Claiborne to the Secretary of State.

NEW ORLEANS, August 7, 1805.

SIR:

In my communication of the 29th ultimo, was enclosed a letter to me, from the Marquis of Casa Calvo, (soliciting that the Spanish officers now in this territory may be exempted from the payment of the municipal tax,) together with a copy of my answer thereto.

I now have the honor to transmit you a second letter from the Marquis on the same subject, together with a list of the officers alluded to, and if it be not improper, I should be glad to hear your sentiments as to the propriety of the exemption solicited; my own opinion is, "that the officers generally who possess property within this territory are liable to taxation; nor can exemption be made in favor of the Marquis and the members of his family, until he shall have been recognized by the President as an agent of Spain." You, no doubt, will be surprised to find so many foreign officers in this city; the fact is, sir, they are wedded to Louisiana, and necessity alone will induce them to depart. I have repeatedly, by letter and verbally, informed the Marquis, that the continuance in this territory of "so many Spanish officers, so long beyond the right occasion for it," was not seen with approbation, and urged their departure. The Marquis has as often assured me of his disposition to comply with my wishes, but you will perceive that the inconvenience is not yet remedied.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your humble servant,

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

To the Governor of the Territory of New Orleans.

NEW ORLEANS, August 2, 1805.

SIR:

120 MILES FROM NEW ORLEANS, August 26, 1805.

SIR:

The report of the retrocession to Spain, of the country west of the Mississippi, had also prevailed in New Orleans.

The evening prior to my departure, being on a visit to the Marquis of Casa Calvo, I asked him if he knew upon what authority that report was circulated; he answered in the negative, and added, that he had understood the negotiation was suspended, and that Mr. Monroe had left Madrid; he further said, that the minister of State (Cevallos,) has informed him, the Marquis, that the desire of the Court of Spain was to make "the Mississippi river the boundary, and, in time, it was expected that that object would be attained." The Marquis delivers himself in the French language. From my imperfect knowledge of French, it is probable I may have misunderstood some of his expressions, but I am sure I have given you the substance of what he said. The prospect of a retrocession of the west bank of the Mississippi, now is, and has always been the theme of the Spanish officers who remain in this territory, and many citizens seem to view it as an event likely to happen—an impression which I greatly regret, since it tends to lessen their confidence in the American Government, and to cherish a Spanish party among us. Next, therefore, to a final adjustment of limits with the Spanish Government, I most desire to see every Spanish officer removed from the ceded territory. There certainly must be a power somewhere vested, to cause to be executed the clause in the treaty which directs "the Spanish forces to be withdrawn (within three months) from the ceded territory," and I should indeed be pleased to have it hinted to me, that in my character as commissioner or Governor, I could, on this occasion, take, (if necessary,) compulsory measures.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne to the Secretary of State, dated

NEW ORLEANS, October 24, 1805.

SIR:

I am sorry to inform you of the embarrassments to which the citizens of the United States are subjected who navigate the Mobile river. All American vessels passing by the town of Mobile, are brought to, and a duty of —— per cent. exacted both on imports and exports. These duties are even required on articles passing to and from the garrisons and factories of the United States. I have addressed, on this occasion, a letter to Mr. Morales, by whom, it is said, this proceeding was authorized; but in his answer, which was this morning received, he professes to be unacquainted with the particulars, and declines any interference until he should advise upon the subject with the Governor of West Florida.

I have certain information of the arrival at Pensacola of four hundred troops from Havana, and that a much arger number is daily expected. I also learn from a source entitled to credit, that three hundred men are ordered from Pensacola to Baton Rouge, and that eight hundred Spanish troops have lately been posted on the frontier of the province of Texas. It is a fact known to me that a Spanish agent has contracted with a merchant of this city, for the delivery at the town of Mobile, of four thousand barrels of flour, and that this same agent not being able to effect a contract for the delivery of four thousand pair of shoes at Mobile, has purchased a quantity of leather. The Marquis of Casa Calvo being absent from this city, it is my intention to require of Governor Folch an explanation of the object of these military movements. I flatter myself that hostilities between the United States and Spain may be avoided, and that an honorable adjustment of our differences may ensue. But I am inclined to think that the Spanish agents calculate on a speedy rupture, and are making all the preparations which their means permit, to commence the war in this quarter to advantage. New Orleans would unquestionably be the first object of attack, and with a view to its security, I should be pleased to see Fort St. John repaired, and put in a state of defence; that fort commands the mouth of the Bayou St. John, and, if strengthened, would present a great impediment to the passage of troops from Pensacola and Mobile by the way of the lakes to this city; the works are in ruins, but might readily be repaired and made defensible without any considerable expenditure.

Extract of a letter from Henry Toulmin, Esq. Judge in the Mississippi territory, to the Secretary of State, dated

JULY 6, 1805.

"You are informed, no doubt, that all the vessels to and from this country, even though bound to Fort Stoddert, and clearing out from Fort Stoddert, are obliged to come to at Mobile, and to pay twelve per centum ad valorem on their cargoes, according to the estimate of the Spanish officers.

"Such an exaction as this, you may well conceive, must be ruinous to this country, and is, moreover, the source of perpetual heart-burnings and contention between our citizens and the subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

"There are two vessels, which have lately undertaken, as I am told, to pass without calling at Mobile, from this country, laden with cotton. I cannot but anticipate unpleasant consequences, but will inform you of the result when acquainted with it."

Extract from the same to the same.

AUGUST 8, 1805.

"I mentioned to you in a letter some time since, that I understood that a vessel then lying in the river was about to pass the Mobile without calling. Captain Schuyler, who is just now from Orleans, tells me that she passed Mobile in the night; that the Spaniards were exceedingly irritated, and threatened to imprison the owner of the cargo on his return from Orleans, and to confiscate the vessel, if she ever appeared there again. They also talked of building a gunboat for the purpose of compelling vessels to stop."

Extract from the same to the same.

OCTOBER 11, 1805.

"Duties are still rigorously insisted upon at Mobile, cargoes unladed and inventories taken of them, in order to ascertain the duties to be paid. The schooner Cato, which went down the river without calling, is still detained, and will probably be confiscated, if not her cargo. I could not even get a few articles belonging to the United States from on board of her, which I had requested to apply for when there, in behalf of Mr. Dinsmoor and Mr. Chambers. If they continue their exactions, this country must inevitably be ruined: I mean that the settlements will be abandoned. Many are now preparing to go; some probably for other reasons, but the greater part, I believe, on this account; and most who go will become subjects of the Spanish Government."

The Governor of Mississippi Territory to the Secretary of State.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, TOWN OF WASHINGTON, September 14, 1805.

SIR:

The enclosed affidavits, marked No. 1 to 11 inclusive, will inform you of some outrages committed within this territory by two Spanish parties. The letters, marked No. 1 to 5, and an order to Colonel Ellis, will inform you of the steps which I have thought it advisable to take. The messenger with my letter to Governor Grand Pré has not returned, although he was requested, and undertook to be back by this morning. I have not received any answer to my despatch to you on this subject of the 14th June.

If, sir, I am to risk any thing on this occasion, it shall be in defence of the liberties and the property of the citizens, and in support of the honor and independence of my Government: and I hope the measures taken and advised by me will not be found adverse to the views of the Executive or to the interest of the United States.

I am, with respect, yours,

ROBERT WILLIAMS.

WILKINSON COUNTY, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY:

Personally appeared before me, one of the Justices of the Peace for said county, Arthur Cobb, Jun. and being duly sworn, according to law, on his oath deposeth, that on the night of the 3d of September, 1805, being at the house of Samuel Kemper, or otherwise the tavern of the Kempers, between the hours of eleven and twelve, he wakened from his sleep by the cry of murder and robbers. On leaving his bed, he saw a man in actual contest with Samuel Kemper; on proceeding further, he saw another man, and afterwards one more, and all being armed with instruments of death, such as guns and pistols, he thought proper to retreat to call assistance; that afterwards a pistol was found, which must have belonged to one of those men, and from every appearance he believes it to belong to Ira Cook Kneeland.

Likewise, as sheet No. 1, appeared William Westbery, and deposeth, that at the same time being awakened from his sleep by the breaking open the door—that on rising he saw he thinks five men in the act of beating with a stick Samuel Kemper in the town of Pinckneyville—that he saw them drag him by the hands, heard the men give orders to tie his hands with a rope—that said Samuel Kemper gave the cry of murder, and that was the last he saw or heard of them.

Likewise at the same time appeared before me, James Latta, who deposeth on oath, that at the same hour, being just awakened by some man requesting to see Samuel Kemper, he heard them ask for whiskey, and being asked who he was, said a friend; that they then being in the house, broke open the door of said Kemper's private lodging room; that he, Latta, attempting to rise, was thrown back on the bed by two men, who said they would take his life if he spoke; that there appeared to be five men in number, and all disguised in black paint, that after some short time he got an opportunity of escaping—when he went for assistance, and before his return, they had borne off the said Samuel Kemper, and he saw them no more.

WILKINSON COUNTY, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY:

Personally appeared before me, one of the Justices of the Peace for said county, John Atkinson, Henry Gamheart, Richard Richardson, and John Whitaker, who, being duly sworn according to law, on their oaths depose, that on the night of the 3d September, 1805, being at the house of Nathan Kemper, in the vicinity of Pinckneyville, between the hours of eleven and twelve, they heard some person hail the house, and on being asked two or three times who they were, they steadfastly affirmed it was Captain Abrams. Immediately afterwards they opened the door, which swung on the inside of the house and was fastened by a string on the inside—immediately on this Reuben Kemper appeared to be only at that moment awaked from his sleep, asked who was there? when they immediately seized him, dragged him out of the house, and tied him, after bruising him very much with a club or clubs.

Almost at same time they dragged Nathan Kemper from the bed wherein he lay with his wife, and tied him also, but did not beat him as much as they did Reuben. Said Nathan Kemper, requesting to see his wife, was refused in very rough language; she likewise was refused in her request of seeing her husband. On Nathan Kemper's asking what they had done to deserve such treatment, was answered, God damn! you have ruined our country, which he, Atkinson, believes to be the American territories of Spain. That the said Nathan Kemper's wife received considerable injury from the violence of these men, who all appeared armed with guns, pistols, or clubs. That in the act of confining the above two men, they cocked and uncocked their guns a great many times, and ordered every man in the house to tell his name, and kept a strict guard at both the doors of the house, and would not admit of any one of the family, or any one that did not belong to their party, passing and repassing, as they frequently presented their guns cocked, and said they would blow the first one through who attempted to oppose them. That they then gave a regular military word, forward march, and at the second word of command they proceeded on their way, and bore off both Reuben and Nathan Kemper.

That the next morning they saw a considerable quantity of blood apparently issuing from the wounds of Reuben Kemper.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS, County of Point Coupée: September 5, 1805.

On this day appeared before me, Ebenezer Cooley, a Justice of the Peace for the county of Point Coupée, Nathan Kemper, who, being duly sworn, declared, that, on the night of the third instant, as he believed, between the hours of eleven and twelve, the doors of his house were forced open by a party of armed men, amounting, as well as he could ascertain, to the number of eighteen or twenty; that, as soon as the party had entered, they cried surrender; seized his brother Reuben, and dragged him out at the door; after a struggle, during which they had beat him with a club, and so choked him that he had barely power to say, I surrender. During this time a part of the same party seized the deponent by different parts of the body, and dragged him from his bed, where he lay with his wife and child, out through the door; after which he heard some of the party, who remained in the house, cry out, if the bitch utters another word, put her to death. Whereupon, he heard a blow given at the bed, and though he frequently called to his wife, to know if she was still alive, could get no answer. After the deponent and his brother Reuben had been fast bound, they were conducted along the road leading to Pinckneyville, as far as the plantation of Mr. Abraham Horton, being still within the limits of the Mississippi territory; and thence down the main road leading towards the line of demarcation. At some small distance above the line they were conducted a short way into the woods, where they halted a considerable time, until he heard a detachment of the same party coming along the main road, to which they were again led back from the wood, and discovered their brother, Samuel Kemper, in the custody of the said detachment. From thence they were conveyed across the line of demarcation, and delivered to Captain Solomon Alston, by whose party they were put on board a pirogue, at Tunica landing, under a guard of six armed men, who said their orders were to take them to Baton Rouge, and there deliver them at the fort. From Tunica they departed about day-break, and, as they passed along by the shore of Point Coupée, called out that they were American citizens, and clandestinely taken from their habitations within the Mississippi territory. After which they were rescued by Lieutenant Wilson, commandant of the garrison at Point Coupée. The deponent further says, that, among those who surrounded his house, he recognised the following persons: Minor Butler and his brother-in-law, Ritchie, Abraham Horton, and several of said Horton's negroes, all inhabitants of the Mississippi territory.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS, County of Point Coupée: September 5, 1805.

On this day appeared before me, Ebenezer Cooley, Justice of the Peace for the county of Point Coupée, Samuel Kemper, who, being duly sworn, declared, that, on the night of the 3d instant, about the hour of twelve, as he believed, being at his house in the town of Pinckneyville, in the Mississippi territory, he heard a knocking at the door, and asked who was there? An answer was made, which he did not understand, and the outer door burst open. The door of the bedroom was then forced, and a blow made at the bed with a double-barrelled gun. Deponent was then seized, and dragged out of the bed by a number of men, who drew him into the room which they had first entered, and from thence, after a struggle, into the street. He was then thrown on the ground, and a rope was tied round his neck, by which he was dragged about one hundred and fifty yards. He was then suffered to stand upright, and attempted, by crying out, to give an alarm, upon which he received a stroke of a pistol on the head, by which he was stunned. The rope being removed from his neck to his arm, he was compelled to run for the space of about a quarter of a mile, after which he was forced to get up behind a man on horseback; a negro, who ran on foot, still holding the rope by which his wrist was tied. He was then led along the main road across the line, and delivered to a party of men, who conducted him to the landing of Bayou Tunica. Then he was put on board a pirogue, with his two brothers, Reuben and Nathan Kemper, and conducted down the river towards Baton Rouge. When opposite Point Coupée they gave the alarm, and were received by Lieutenant Wilson, commandant of the garrison of Point Coupée.

AFFIDAVIT, No. 7.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS, County of Point Coupée: September 5, 1805.

On this day appeared before me, Ebenezer Cooley, Justice of the Peace for the county of Point Coupée, Reuben Kemper, who, being duly sworn, declares, that, on the night of the 3d instant, about the hour of twelve, being at the house of Nathan Kemper, within about two miles of Pinckneyville, within the limits of the Mississippi territory, the house was surrounded, and the doors thereof forced open, by a party consisting of at least nineteen persons, whereof some were negroes, and some white men in disguise. That, among the latter, he recognised and personally knew the following persons: Louis Ritchie, Minor Butler, Abraham Horton, James Horton, and two others, whose names he did not recollect, but expected soon to be able to ascertain, all of whom are inhabitants of the Mississippi territory; and Marcus Carr, James Say, Philip Say, and others, residing within the Spanish lines. Of the negroes, whose number amounted to seven, at least three, whose names are William or Bill, Nat, and Moses, and others, whose names he did not recollect, he knew to be the property of the above mentioned Abraham Horton. That the said party, all of whom were well armed, after having forced their way into the house, violently forced him from his bedroom, after a struggle of about fifteen minutes, during which he received several violent blows on the head and face; and, after having torn off his shirt and tied him with cords, forced him over the line into the Spanish territory, where they delivered him up, with his two brothers, Nathan and Samuel Kemper, bound in the same manner, to Solomon Alston, who commanded a large party of armed men. That said Alston received them within ten or fifteen feet of the line, on the Spanish side; that from thence they were conveyed to the Bayou of Tunica landing, bound, as already mentioned, and nearly naked, where they were put on board a pirogue, and there tied all three together, by orders of said Alston. That said pirogue was commanded by William Breher, and manned by Charles Stewart, Adam Bingaman, John Ratliff, George Rowe, and John Morris; that they departed from the Bayou Tunica for Baton Rouge, at day-break, where said William Barker had orders to deliver the prisoners up to Governor Grand Pré. That, as they passed along the shore of Point Coupée, the prisoners found means to declare their situation to Doctor Powles, who immediately gave information thereof to Lieutenant Wilson, commandant of the garrison at Point Coupée. That Lieutenant Wilson immediately manned his boat, boarded the pirogue, and took the prisoners, with those who conducted them, into custody, about the hour of twelve the same day.

Territory of Orleans, County of Point Coupée: September 5, 1805.

On this day appeared before me, Ebenezer Cooley, Justice of the Peace for the county of Point Coupée, Adam Bingaman, who, being duly sworn, declared, that, on the night of the 3d instant, at a very late hour, he was one of a party commanded by a Captain Alston, and stationed within a few yards of the line of demarcation, at the Spanish side, for the purpose, as declared by Captain Alston, of seizing the Kempers, who were expected to come from the American territory. That, at the distance of about fifty yards above the line, he saw a party approach, who were hailed by Captain Alston, to whom they delivered three prisoners. The party, to which deponent belonged, was then ordered by Captain Alston to conduct the prisoners to Bayou Tunica, where the prisoners were put on board a pirogue, and ordered off for Baton Rouge, at about day break on the 4th. That, as they were passing opposite the post at Point Coupée, their pirogue was boarded by Lieutenant Wilson, with a party of his men, who took the prisoners and their conductors into custody.

Affidavit, No. 9.

Territory of Orleans, County of Point Coupée: September 5, 1805.

On this day appeared before me, Ebenezer Cooley, Justice of the Peace for the county of Point Coupée, William Barker, who, being duly sworn, deposed and declared:

That, on the night of the 3d instant, he was one of a party of militia commanded by Captain Alston, which party was stationed for about two hours within a few paces of the line of demarcation on the Spanish side. That they heard a noise which was made a short distance above the line, and soon after saw a party cross the line, who delivered to Captain Alston three prisoners, whose names were Reuben, Nathan, and Samuel Kemper. Captain Alston ordered the prisoners to be immediately conducted to the Bayou Tunica, where they were put into a pirogue, to be conveyed to Baton Rouge; that deponent was commanded by Captain Alston to keep a strict watch on them, and to give them no opportunity of escaping until he should deliver them at the fort of Baton Rouge; that, as deponent was passing opposite the garrison of Point Coupée, his pirogue was taken by a superior force commanded by Lieutenant Wilson, commandant of the garrison at Point Coupée, who took into custody the prisoners and the party by whom they were conducted.

Affidavit, No. 10.

Mississippi Territory, ss.

Be it remembered, that William Flanagan, jun. of Wilkinson county, in said territory, personally appeared before the undersigned, one of the superior judges for said territory, and being of lawful age, upon his oath deposeth and saith, that Lieutenant Glascock and a party of twelve light horse, being a part of Captain Jones's company or squadron of Spanish light horse, on the afternoon of the 21st day of August last, came over the line of demarcation to this deponent's house, which is on the Tiehfau creek, about two miles above the line, and took him and his wife and carried them about five miles below the line, and kept them under guard all night, and next morning dismissed his wife, who was taken home by her brother, who had been sent out after them by her father. That after she was dismissed, they carried this deponent fifteen miles further, and told him he must go to jail or give up his horse. He refused to give up his horse till they cocked their guns and pistols all round him, there being eight of them then present, and said he must pay them their expenses, give up his horse, or go to jail. He replied he had rather lose his horse than go to jail. Whereupon they took his horse, bridle and saddle, and dismissed him, and he returned home on foot. The names of the men who composed said party of eight horse were, John Glascock Lieutenant Benjamin Le Near, also an officer, Abraham Jones, son of the Captain Kennady, William Lee, John Bates, ——— Hale, Obiel Brewer, ——— Conner, and the names of the others he does not recollect; and further says, that most of the party were formerly American refugees, who fled to the Spanish country, and further saith not.

Note.—The within deponent, Thomas Holden, says, that it was reported that William Flanagan, Sen. had killed a certain John Sharp, as within mentioned, and had fled from the Spanish part of the country, and that his wife, after he had fled, also left the country, and brought their stock and goods above the line, and left them in the care of William Flanagan, Jun. who is nephew to William Flanagan, Sen. and son-in-law to said Thomas Holden, and that this was the only pretext the Spanish light horse had for coming above the line and behaving as they did.

AFFIDAVIT, No. 11.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, ss.

Be it remembered that Thomas Holden, Sen. of the county of Wilkinson, in said territory, personally appeared before the undersigned, one of the superior judges of said territory, and being sworn, deposeth and saith, that he lives in said county, on the Tiehfau, about half a mile above the line of demarcation, upon land which he claims by pre-emption, and now cultivates; that on the afternoon of the 21st day of August last, Lieutenant John Glascock, and twelve men of the Spanish light horse, part of Captain Jones's company, or squadron of West Florida, came over the line of demarcation to this deponent's house, and inquired for William Flanagan, Sen. who had lived about seven miles below the line, in the Spanish territory, and, as they said, had killed a certain Joseph Sharp, also a Spanish subject, and said that they were in pursuit of said Flanagan, and inquired of this deponent if he had seen Flanagan, or knew where he was. This deponent replied, that he had not seen him for six months, but heard that Flanagan and his family had gone up to the Bayou Pierre. When said company came up, this deponent was sitting on his fence, about fifty yards from his house, and after what had passed, as before related, an officer among them by the name of Le Near, ordered this deponent to go to his own house, saying that he should put him and his family under guard. To which this deponent replied, that he would not be put under guard by him unless he had authority from the United States or the officers of this territory to do so. Whereupon the officer drew his sword, or dirk, and threatened to run this deponent through in an instant if he did not submit. Then one of the company cocked his pistol, but said nothing. Then Glascock came up with a rifle in his hand, and ordered this deponent to go along instantly, or he would make him. This deponent replied, that he would not go; that they had no business above the line, and ordered them to go below, where they belonged. Le Near replied to this, that his authority was above the line, as well as below. Damn the line, he did not regard it, and other words to that purpose. After this, the party went off, and left this deponent. But before they went off, two of this deponent's sons came up, and he told them what had passed, and ordered them to go to the house and get the guns, and they would kill all the damned Spaniards, for they had no business above the line; and upon saying this the party left him. And he further saith not.

TOWN OF WASHINGTON, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, September 6, 1805.

SIR:

I was informed that a number of armed men, subjects of the King of Spain, on the 3d instant entered this territory, in the neighborhood of Pinckneyville, and there with force and violence seized three persons by the name of Kemper, abused them in an inhuman manner, tied and carried them into your territory, and threatened considerable outrages to others in the same neighborhood. This conduct, sir, does not comport with that good understanding and friendly disposition supposed to exist between our Governments. Neither is such conduct to be tolerated by a Government which is influenced in all its relations with others by a regard to justice and national faith, especially one so ample in resources to do justice to itself, and to command respect from others, as the United States.

This letter, sir, is despatched to you by a special messenger, in order that your excellency may be speedily advised of this unaccountable transaction, and provide against similar outrages and their consequences; as also to afford me some explanation of the one which has given rise to this letter.

SIR:

I conceive it to be my duty to give you a statement respecting the rescue of the Kempers from a party of Spanish subjects. Information was given to me that Kemper and several Americans were taken by force of arms from their residence at Pinckneyville, by a party of Spanish subjects, and were on their way to Baton Rouge.

I immediately manned the boat, and took the Kempers, Reuben, Nathan, and Samuel, together with the guard, prisoners, who I have in confinement, and shall keep them so until I receive orders from the proper authority for their release. I have had taken the depositions of the Kempers, and two of their guards, which I enclose you. My force is weak, and I expect an attack from the other side of the river. I shall, however, give them as hearty reception as the situation of my force will admit of. As Governor Claiborne is, I presume, with you, I hope you will consult with him, and let me know as speedily as possible what is to be done. I have wrote Captain Sparks, at Fort Adams, to send me a reinforcement, as I think the good of the service really requires it.

SIR:

I this moment received your despatch, dated the 5th instant, informing me of your having taken and confined a Spanish party, which had on the night of the 3d instant forcibly taken from this territory the three Kempers, whom the party had in their possession when you took them. Your conduct, sir, on this occasion, merits approbation so far as I am informed of it.

I request that you will, with all possible despatch, have conveyed to this territory the whole of the offending party, to be delivered over to the civil authority; also the Kempers. I request you will deliver them at Fort Adams, where further orders will remain. Captain Sparks has informed me the reinforcement he sent you will act also as a guard for the above purpose.

I enclose for your information the copy of an order which I have this day issued in consequence of these outrages, and others committed on the line eastwardly from Pinckneyville.

The Governor of the Mississippi territory's orders to Colonel Ellis, of the 5th regiment of the militia of said territory.

HEAD QUARTERS, WASHINGTON, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, September 9, 1805.

SIR:

You will, on the receipt of this order, immediately assemble from your regiment the following detachment for duty, viz. two captains, two lieutenants, two ensigns, eight sergeants, eight corporals, two drummers, or bugle-hornmen, and eighty-two privates, to compose two equal companies. They are to be well armed, and supplied with twelve rounds of ammunition per man. Not having the state of your regiment by actual return, it must rest with yourself from which battalion you are to detach them. This detachment is to act as a patrol near and along the line of dermarcation, to prevent or check irregularities of every kind. They are to rendezvous at Pinckneyville, from whence they will be detached to their different posts. As soon as they are assembled, a return of them will be made, naming the commissioned officers, and reporting the strength and the state of arms, &c. &c. and forward to the inspector at this place, when you will receive further orders. In the mean time, the detachments will be active as patroles, examining all equivocal characters passing the line from below, and especially if by night, stopping and securing any armed parties, improperly passing the line as in some late instances: and, in short, affording all proper protection in their power to the citizens of the United States and their property. The better to effect this, one captain and his command will be detached to the eastern part of the line to be guarded, and take post on or near the Tiehfau, from whence the communication must be kept up to meet the patrol detached from post near the west end of the line.

Every occurrence worthy of note can and must be communicated in this way to the senior captain, whose post will be in or near Pinckneyville; and who will report either direct to head quarters, or to the inspector's office. Should any hostile attempt be made, either on the citizens, their property, or the detachment on duty, force must be repelled with force.

Extract of a letter from Robert Williams, Esq. Governor of the Mississippi territory, to the Secretary of State.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, WASHINGTON, October 1, 1805.

By my communication of the 14th ultimo, you were informed of some outrages committed within this territory, near the Spanish line, and of the steps I had taken in relation thereto.

I now have the honor to enclose, for your further information, Governor Grand Pré's letter in answer to mine of the 6th ultimo, and my reply to him, marked and numbered 1 and 2, also the documents marked 1, 2, and 3, which will inform you of the further steps taken in this affair.

The military patrol which I ordered out on the line were organized and disbanded on holding themselves in readiness, and places appointed to rendezvous under a standing order to the officers commanding, to check any disorders that might appear.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that things in that quarter have become very quiet and settled, which I believe would not have been the case but for the measures which were pursued.

Some of our citizens were concerned in this business, and are bound over to court for prosecution.

[Enclosures accompanying the above.]

Governor Grand Pré to Governor Williams.

BATON ROUGE, September 9, 1805.

MY DEAR SIR:

I have received your letter dated the 6th instant, relative to the extraordinary event that happened at Pinckneyville, on the 3d instant, viz. the assault on the three brothers, Kempers, by persons unknown, and disguised, it is said, in black, who conducted them on that part of the territory which it has pleased His Majesty to commit to my charge. The occurrence is singular, and of which I had no information till the night between the 7th and 8th by one of the commanders of the patroles, who, since the inroads committed by that turbulent banditti, headed by the Kempers, have been stationed near the frontiers and within the interior settlement of Feliciana. The first gave me information under date of the 5th, that by night he met with a party of men disguished and armed, who were conducting three others, whom they immediately abandoned, and retired with percipitation the same way which they appeared to have come, without uttering a single word; his first care was to secure the persons of the three men, whom he found to be the Kempers, and immediately had them conducted to Bayou Tunica, there to be embarked under an escort and delivered at my disposal; he added that, on the way, the escort was stopped by actual force, on the river, very near the eastern shore, by Captain Wilson, military commandant at Point Coupée, where it is said the escort is detained, and also the Kempers. The commander of the patrol also declares that it was impossible for him to know any one of the persons who brought and abandoned the said Kempers, owing to the obscurity of the night, their disguise, and their very prompt departure.

This is all the information I have as yet, but have despatched an express to procure a more ample knowledge respecting this strange and mysterious violation.

It is not necessary, I flatter myself, that I should express what pains our Government has taken, and how unceasingly scrupulous it has been to maintain and constantly to preserve with that of the United States that good understanding and harmony, which it ought to be impossible for a few intriguing perfidious adventurers, thirsting after revenge for private animosities, to interrupt. Of this I hope your excellency is fully convinced, and upon this principle you will approve the efficacious measures I am about to take for the extirpation of this disorder, which has risen to its full height on the territory of this Government—disorder, confusion, violations, outrages, plunder, insult to the magistrate; dragging him by a rope round his neck; attempts on the flag of the King my master, and now the violation committed with the Kempers, (authors of all the above mentioned,) on the Government of your excellency.

After this explicit narrative, I hope your excellency will make the necessary dispositions for the return of the inhabitants who were escorting the three prisoners, as they are absolute strangers to all the circumstances of this business. I claim them from your excellency's justice, considering their detention as illegal, as also that of the prisoners they were conducting, these having been taken within this territory, where a most singular event had brought them, and I cannot imagine what could have been the design of the authors of this plot; saving, however, for a subsequent determination respecting the legality of a capture made under such singular circumstances.

I have the honor to be,

CHARLES DE GRAND PRE.

Most Excellent Robert Williams.

Governor Williams to Governor Grand Pré, in answer.

Washington, September 30, 1805.

Sir:

Your letter of the 9th instant, in answer to mine of the 6th, I received some days ago; but the equivocal manner with which you treated the subject of my letter afforded little or no information, and rendered it expedient to delay an answer until I should obtain such information relative thereto as would enable me to treat the subject with that candor which our respective situations require, and the interest and honor of our Governments demand.

Previous to the receipt of your letter, I understood that the three Kempers were retaken by Lieutenant Wilson, near Point Coupée, where they, together with the Spanish guard, were detained. I gave orders for the removal of them and their escort to Fort Adams, within this territory. They have all been delivered over to the civil authority for examination, as to their supposed offences committed within this territory, or that might be cognizable by the civil authority thereof; and I now have the honor to inform you, that the outrages which were the subject of my letter to you of the 6th instant, appear to have been committed by citizens of the United States, in combination with subjects of Spain, residing within the jurisdiction of our respective Governments, all of whom are liable to be punished under the authority and laws of the United States and of this territory. It also appears, that the six persons, subjects of Spain, composing the escort, to wit, William Barker, Charles Stewart, John Morris, John Ratcliff, George Row, and Adam Bingaman, were accessories and confederates with the offending party, and might have been legally treated as such by this Government: but being desirous to keep alive and promote that harmony and good understanding between the Government of the United States and that of His Catholic Majesty, and also, because from the sceptical style of your letter, it is not clear whether the act was authorized, I have caused those six men, composing the escort, to be liberated, and safely conducted to the territory possessed by His Catholic Majesty. The Kempers, of whom your excellency complains as having been the original authors of these outrages, I have caused to be bound to their good behavior, and to keep the peace towards your Government, its subjects, &c.

It is also proper I should inform your excellency, that, in a few days after the date of my letter of the 6th instant to you, I received information, that, some days before, a party of twelve men, armed, commanded by Lieutenant Glascock, part of Captain Jones's company of Spanish light horse, entered this territory in the neighborhood of Tiehfau creek, and there threatened considerable abuse of some of the inhabitants; seized and carried by force, from their house of dwelling, a man by the name of William Flanagan, Jun. and his wife, into the territory possessed by His Catholic Majesty, whom they detained a considerable time, and, on their releasement, took and kept a horse, bridle and saddle, belonging to the said Flanagan, and which I am informed have been since sold under the orders of an officer of your Government. I request your excellency will inquire into this affair, and give me an answer as soon as convenient.

I trust the lenient measures which I have caused to be pursued upon this occasion will be duly appreciated, and attributed to the proper motives; and that your excellency will unite with me in adopting such measures as will prevent similar occurrences in future.

Your excellency demands of me the three Kempers as your prisoners, taken, as you say, "within this jurisdiction, where the most singular event had brought them." Permit me, sir, without criticising on the merits of this demand, (which it is so susceptible of,) to barely suggest, as a reason for my non-compliance, the consequences which would necessarily flow from a compliance with demands made under such circumstances, and founded on transactions of this kind.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT WILLIAMS.

Sir: Washington, September 23, 1805.

Finding you had left this when I returned from Natchez, Mr. Shields follows with my orders to Captain Sparks, commanding at the fort. Enclosed is a copy of my letter to him, indicative of the wish of the Executive of this territory on the occasion, which I trust will be compatible with the civil authority.

I am, &c.

ROBERT WILLIAMS.

Judge Rodney.

Sir: Washington, September 23, 1805.

I have received your letter of the 20th instant, informing me of the arrival of the prisoners from Point Coupée, at Fort Adams.

I request that they may all be delivered over to Judge Rodney, or some justice of the peace, to be examined as to any offences they may have committed within the limits of this territory, or that may be cognizable by the civil authority thereof.

The Spanish subjects, to the number of six, as I am informed, should they be discharged by the civil authority, I request that you will cause them to be escorted by a sufficient guard, to the line dividing this territory from that possessed by His Catholic Majesty, there liberated, and suffered to pass into his jurisdiction.

As to the Kempers, I presume they will be dealt with as the law will authorize; and my hope is, that they may be bound to their good behavior, and to keep the peace, as well towards the citizens of the United States as the subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

Accept my best respects, &c.

ROBERT WILLIAMS.

Captain Richard Sparks, Military Commandant at Fort Adams.

TOWN OF WASHINGTON, September 30, 1805.

DEAR SIR:

On the 25th or 26th of this instant, I made examination into the truth of the outrage committed in this territory, at and near Pinckneyville, on the night of the 3d of this instant, on the persons of Reuben, Nathan, and Samuel Kemper. This outrage appears to have been committed by a combination of persons, some residing above, and some below, the line of demarcation. Among them was a Doctor Bonner, a Henry Flower, son of Doctor Flower, and a Mr. M'Dermot, who were active above the line, and are said to reside below. The party, composed of twelve white men and seven negroes, first assaulted and broke the house of Nathan Kemper, and seized and tied him and his brother Reuben; then a part of them went to the house of Samuel Kemper, broke into his room, and took and tied him; and the two parties met again near the line, and went in company on the high road till they got a few feet below the line, where Captain Alston, with a party of twelve men, lay in wait, and marched out of the bushes and took possession of the Kempers; at the instant, all the other party dispersed and run off. Alston and his party then conducted the Kempers down to Bayou Tunica landing, and put them on board of a boat, and ordered six of his men, to wit, William Barker, Charles Stewart, John Morris, John Ratcliff, George Rowe, and Adam Bingaman, to take them down to Baton Rouge. On their way down, when they got opposite the American garrison at Point Coupée, the boat was taken by Captain Wilson, the Kempers released, and the Spanish subjects made prisoners. It appearing, on examination of the Kempers, that the six persons last mentioned had not acted above the line; they were liberated, as will appear by a document I enclose. None of the Spanish subjects that were active in the outrage above the line were taken into custody; but if they had been in custody, they would have been detained for trial. And, indeed, it was so evident that the party below the line were acting confederate with those above, had they not been the subjects of a Government in amity with us, the six persons discharged might have been legally detained until due satisfaction was made. I was careful, however, to avoid any thing that would in the least tend to violate the amity of the two nations, and therefore thought proper to liberate them, though I think our military officers fully justified in detaining them till legally discharged.

I am, respectfully, &c.

THOMAS RODNEY.

P. S. Justice Baker was also directed to require bail of Reuben, Nathan, and Samuel Kemper, respectively, to keep the peace, especially towards the subjects of the King of Spain, and to do no injury to any one below the line of demarcation.

Extracts of letters from General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War.

NEW ORLEANS, December 27, 1803.

Our troops are not yet in quarters, but continue to occupy the redoubts which surround the town, under their tents, which has occasioned great discontent and produced much sickness; nor have we been able to get possession of a single store house or magazine for the reception of our tools, implements, stores, baggage, and provisions. I am now working on a partition of the barracks, to separate our troops from those of Spain, and hope I shall be able to get our men under cover to-morrow; but I am reduced to the painful necessity, after waiting thus long, to hire stores for the reception of our provisions, hospital stores, ammunition, arms, and other articles, which expense should, in my judgment, be charged to the French republic, and, therefore, a separate account will be kept of it, and all other expenses which may accrue in consequence of the incomplete execution of the treaty.

NEW ORLEANS, March 2, 1804.

It pains me still to be obliged to write you from this place, but the causes which have prevented my departure still exist. The Prefect of France and the Spanish troops are still in town, and the magazines and store houses still in their possession, while we are obliged to pay rent for our own accommodation. My patience is nearly exhausted, and I shall not be detained many days longer, unless something very unexpected should occur to make it my duty.

We have appearances of the Prefect's intention soon to depart, though they are contradicted by other circumstances. As to the Marquis de Casa Calvo, and the Spanish officers generally, they indicate no intention whatever of moving.

Governor Folch sailed three days since for Pensacola, but he was not accompanied by any troops; it is now said they will follow him in a few days. Yet I suspect the Marquis de Casa Calvo will keep a detachment here for his accommodation.

You have, under cover, a list of guards which the Spaniards mounted in the city yesterday, but you must not believe that this singular spectacle is permitted by my consent.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that about three hundred Spanish troops embarked for Pensacola on the 8th instant, but I am informed that twelve or fifteen officers and between sixty and one hundred men will continue in this city.

They have delivered up the barracks, but occupy the hospital and several detached buildings.

The Prefect made his congé to our commissioners on the 12th instant, but is still in town exercising his prefectorial and commissarial functions, yet I look daily for his embarcation.

The arrival of our ordnance stores from Fort Adams commenced a few days since, but we have as yet neither stores nor magazines for their reception, these being still occupied by the French and Spanish Governments.

NATCHITOCHES, October 15, 1804.

The Spaniards are undoubtedly meditating mischief in this quarter; their emissaries have been at work among the Indians and negroes. The night before last, nine of the latter run off for Nacogdoches, who, it has been ascertained have been persuaded so to do by a Spaniard, inhabitant of Nacogdoches, telling them, on their arrival there they would be made free. Upwards of thirty are at this moment known to have been in the plot of elopement; and intelligence of the extent and nature of the plan is momently coming to light. To-day it is discovered that four of the nine have returned, to rouse and stimulate their confederates and others who were not implicated; an Indian boy, who was in one of their cabins, gives the intelligence. He says those who returned were instilling into the others, that, since the plot has been discovered, it should stimulate them to be more determined, &c. &c. The whole district is in the most alarming state, and inevitable ruin to it, and perhaps all Louisiana, must be the consequence, unless prompt measures are taken to stop the infamous proceedings of the infernal Spaniards.

I received a message, the other day, from the Cousadee or Alabama Indians, informing that other Indians, stimulated by the Spaniards, had desired them to move over the line, (they living on this side the Sabine, within the district of Opelousas,) and informed them they wished them to join in a war against the Americans; upon refusing, they threatened to cut them off wherever they should meet with them. Further, that a great council was about to be held, to which all the Indians were invited, and the Spaniards were to have large presents there for them. This intelligence has been corroborated, within a few days, by a white man living near the Sabine, whom the Indians, being friendly towards, desired to quit, as shortly depredations were to commence on the American frontier.

NATCHITOCHES, May 1, 1805

The Choctaw chief at the same time reported to me, that a party of his people had lately returned from a hunting voyage on the bay of St. Bernard, and that they there fell in with two parties of Spanish troops, who had lately arrived there by water, and had their shipping then lying there; that they were building two forts, and had got them considerably advanced; one of them at the mouth of Trinity river, at the Oekekesaws, the other further to the westward, near the Caraukuas; they did not know by what name they called the place, but I take it to be Matogordo: That the Spanish officer at Oekekesaws had commissioned one of his hunters as a chief, and told him the Americans holding this country was all wind; that, if they were wise, they should abandon us, and attach themselves to them, (the Spaniards,) for their old friends would not forsake them: but that they were advancing against the Americans, and should soon build a fort in Opelousas, and another at Attakapa, and one at or near Natchitoches, and proceed on towards New Orleans; and that the officer told him he was in want of spades to go on faster with the works; and that if the Indians would come in amongst the Americans and buy what they could and bring to him, he would give them a horse for each spade they would bring.

This hunter, on his arrival at Bayou Chero, at the Choctaw village, finding the chief absent, sent off a runner to notify him of it, and to be on his guard against the Americans; for all Louisiana would soon belong again to Spain.

Mr. Fulsome, whom I occasionally employ as an interpreter, was present when the chief received this message, and came in with him to me; who likewise said, there was, at the same time, a Spaniard in the Choctaw camp asleep: and that after the runner had delivered his message, he (Fulsome) awakened the Spaniard, and asked him if he knew any thing of a Spanish force having arrived at the Oekekesaws, and he said he had heard so.

An American gentleman, a Captain Fristo, of Tennessee, was with me a few hours ago: he is lately from Nacogdoches, and informs me he understood the same when he was at that place.

FORT CLAIBORNE, (Natchitoches,) May 3, 1805.

Within these two days I have received information that the Spaniards have absolutely established themselves, both at Martagada, and the Orcoquisas. They came by sea, and immediately commenced fortifying. The informer is an Indian chief of the Choctaws, who says that a warrior of his nation, who has been hunting with the Caraukuas, on the bay of St. Bernard, has returned loaded with Spanish presents and caresses; and says that the commanding officer told him that he and his people had better abandon the Americans, and come under the protection of the Spaniards, who would never forsake their old friends; and bid him witness their present proceedings, giving to understand that it was only preparatory to their taking possession of the country again, which would not remain long in the hands of the Americans, as they meant to edge themselves along till they got to Orleans: that the warrior appeared to believe what was told him, and had returned with different ideas respecting the Americans than he possessed before. The informer further says, that the Spanish troops were in want of spades, and told this Indian, and those who were with him, that if they would bring some from this place, or Opelousas, he would give them a horse for every one delivered.

I sent Mr. Fulsome to bring in the chief and the party of Choctaws, who had lately returned from the bay of St. Bernard, and had given an account of the posts of Matogordo and the Oekekesaws being lately taken possession of. Mr. Fulsome found them and brought them in. He can give no certain account of any troops being at Matogordo, but he was at the Oekekesaws, and saw them; they were building a fort: but a small number of soldiers. The chief says, the Spanish officer advised him and all his nation to come to them; that their great father over the water had not forgotten them, and gave them not only his hand but his whole arm. He says the party he saw came there by land: but the evening he left the place, he saw a vessel in the bay, that the officer said was coming to them with a reinforcement. He likewise says, he heard they intended to build forts soon at Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches, but he did not hear the officer say it.

A man by the name of St. Prie arrived here yesterday from the Spanish country. He speaks French: I have just had some conversation with him. He says that there are five hundred families arrived at St. Antonio, settlers, with a considerable reinforcement of troops; and that one hundred soldiers were coming to Nacogdoches; fifty of whom were to be there by the 15th instant.

Great pains are certainly taken by people living here, and strangers passing through the country to and from towards Mexico, to freshen and keep alive the report and belief, that this part of the country is not long to remain in the hands of the United States.

The day before yesterday the Baron Bastrop, an intimate acquaintance of the Marquis de Casa Calvo, passed through this place from Orleans on his way to Mexico; on that way he took great pains to circulate the report, and to tell all the inhabitants he spoke with, that the country would ere long be again under the government of Spain, &c. He speaks French, English, and Spanish. Assurances of that kind, from a character like the Baron, make a strong impression upon the minds of the uninformed inhabitants.

FORT CLAIBORNE, (Natchitoches,) September 3, 1805.

About a month ago Mr. Shabus, of this place, received a letter, dated St. Antonio, from Padre Puellet, telling him that the Commandant General, Mr. Grimare, direct from the court of Spain, was expected in August at the Rio Grand, where a great number of people of the province of Texas was to meet him; that he was accompanied by seven companies coming to St. Antonio, which place he was to make his residence, and that Captain Amangual was to be stationed with his *full company at Nacogdoches. Mr. Shabus received a passport from the Governor of St. Antonio, and a letter from the bishop, requesting him to come on immediately to make preparations for the Commandant General. Said Shabus says that he, (the Commandant General) was high in the confidence of the court of Spain, and sent on account of the limits. Six hundred families coming from Spain to settle Matogordo had put into the Canary islands.

NATCHITOCHES, FORT CLAIBORNE, September 30, 1805.

The new Governor, Antonio Cordero, has arrived at St. Antonio.

Two men have just arrived from Nacogdoches, one of whom says he saw a letter from Mr. Barr to Davenport, written at St. Antonio, saying that he was waiting to set out with the colonel, who was to take the command at Nacogdoches. He was to have two companies with him, one of which was to reinforce the Orcoquisas, and the other to be divided between Nacogdoches and Adeis.

The white men employed by the Indian agent are now with me, and relate the following:

At about six days' march nearly southwest from here, they came in sight of a sort of stockade, as well as they could judge from the distance they saw it. They were discovered by the garrison, and a number of horsemen (to the amount at least of fifty) immediately sallied from out or near the picket work in line, and gave them chase. As they approached they formed a half circle, in order to enclose them. They, the Americans, escaped to the woods, which were within a league; the Spaniards continued the pursuit about fifteen miles. They imagined the fort or picket work to be about one hundred and twenty miles from this place, and is situated in open ground in the bottom of a prairie, at the confluence of the Trinity and Snow rivers, about twenty miles from the sea. They were further informed that the place where the fort is was called Orcoquisas.

NACOGDOCHES, October 3, 1805.

I have chosen this method of informing you of the receipt of a letter from Mr. Barr, but a few minutes since, which mentions, that he will be here the day after to-morrow, accompanied by the new commandant, who had under his charge two companies of one hundred and ten each. The one is to be stationed at the Trinity until further orders, the other is for this place, with orders to make it a place of defence.

* "A full company consists of a captain, lieutenant, commandant, and one hundred and fifteen."

OPELOUSAS, October 13, 1805.

Yesterday Judge Collins waited on me and informed me that the minds of the citizens of this district were considerably agitated on a report being in circulation that a number of Spanish troops have taken post on the Kelqueshoes, some distance on this side the Sabine. Report says the number does not fall short of eight hundred. I have no idea the force is as strong as reported; but that there are some Spanish troops in that quarter I have not the smallest doubt.

Some time before Captain Stille left Atakapa, he had certain information that a regular patrol was kept up on the Sabine, and were relieved weekly from the post of Nacogdoches. Since then I have been informed (how truly I cannot say) that two of the inhabitants of this country are prisoners at that post.

NEW ORLEANS, October 30, 1805.

Six hundred troops have arrived at Pensacola from the Havana; and it is reported that the garrisons of Mobile and Baton Rouge are to receive considerable reinforcements. A Governor General for the province of Texas has arrived at St. Antonio; he is a brigadier general, and said to possess military talents.

A fort is erected on Trinity river, and about two hundred men (the greater part cavalry) are there stationed.

CAMPTI, IN THE DISTRICT OF NATCHITOCHES, September 14, 1805.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the magistrates for the county of Natchitoches, Mary Pulogia Grappe Fontineau, aged 46, who, being duly cautioned and sworn, deposeth and saith, that she believes she was born at the ancient Caddo village, where was an establishment of French inhabitants and some soldiers; and that she perfectly recollects descending the river with her father. She was then about six years of age; and that her mother remained behind, to collect some debts, and came down about six weeks after; and that she had always understood her family had lived there for a considerable number of years; and that there were a number of French families who had lived there for many years.

NATCHITOCHES, September 15, 1805.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Natchitoches, Julien Besson, an inhabitant of Campti, in said county, aged 57, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that he well recollects being carried from Natchitoches, by his father, to the ancient Caddo village, commonly called, by the course of the river, about one hundred and seventy leagues above Natchitoches, on Red river; and that, at that time, there were there living several French families and some soldiers: the number of soldiers he does not remember, but only that it was a sergeant's command, (which sergeant was then his father;) and that his father, by order of the then French Governor General of Louisiana, built a small fort at said place, erected a flag-staff, on which the French flag occasionally used to be hoisted: the name of the fort was called St. Louis de Carloretto; and that, from the appearance of the place, and every thing he heard and understood about it, the establishment had been made for a considerable number of years before he went there, which is more than fifty years ago; and that he lived there fourteen or fifteen years, during all which time there was continued a detachment of French soldiers there, with a number of French families, who continued to cultivate corn, tobacco, and garden vegetables; and that he recollects two small pieces of cannon being there, and one of them bursting by firing; and he believes the other slipped into the river, by an excavation of its bank, as it lay near the edge of the bank; and that he recollects there being some-mill stones there, but has no remembrance of seeing them in use. And, at the same time he lived at the above mentioned place, some French families were settled at the Yattasse point, so called, being a part of what is now called the Bayou Pierre settlement; and that the same place has continued to be occupied by French families ever since, and which is now under the jurisdiction of the Spanish Government, in the province of Texas; and that said Yattasse point used to be a place of great deposite by Indian traders, before Louisiana was ceded to Spain: and further, that he has knowledge that some French hunters, while Louisiana belonged to France, planted several crops of corn more than fifty leagues above the ancient Caddo village, on Red river, at or near the mouth of Boggy river, (or the Vassures, as it is called;) and that the settlement at the old Caddo village was abandoned about thirty-eight years ago; and he believes the cause of their removal was, having large families of children growing up; and, after the cession of Louisiana to Spain, the settlement did not appear to augment, and the families were desirous their children should have the benefit of a better society: but that the country is exceedingly pleasant and fertile, and capable of becoming a rich and populous settlement. And further the deponent saith not.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace in said county, Louis Lamalaty, Esquire, of Campti, in said county, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that he is now sixty-six years of age; and that he was born at the place now called Natchitoches. Although he was never at the place where the ancient Caddo village was, he was in the constant habit of seeing the French inhabitants, and the soldiers who were then living and stationed there, and has no more doubt of the fact than though he had seen it; he saw Mr. Grappe and his family when they returned from there: and further, that he has knowledge of the ancient French establishment at Yattasse point, in the vicinity of Bayou Pierre; and that these French families lived there before Louisiana was ceded to Spain; and that Mr. Verge lived there for a number of years; and that said place was usually a place of deposite for the Indian traders, &c. And further, that he has knowledge of Mr. Bourne, formerly commandant at Natchitoches, having had a trading house established on the southwest side of the Sabine river, and distant from the river about six leagues, and from Natchitoches about fifty leagues, and about northwest from it; which establishment was antecedent to the Spanish Government taking place in Louisiana; and that the same place was occupied by sundry persons afterwards, as well before as after the change of Governments; and that he has been informed that the mill-stones that were at the old French establishment at the Caddos, had been brought down; and that, according to the best of his recollection, it is now about thirty-eight years since the said settlement was abandoned. And further the deponent saith not.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace for said county, Mary Senes Brevell, widow of Antoine Grillette, deceased, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, after she married Mr. Grillette, she went with him to the ancient Caddo village, where she remained about eighteen months. At that time, there were a few French inhabitants who settled and lived there, and a French commandant, who was Mr. Grappe, and, as near as she recollects, four soldiers; that the French inhabitants cultivated every thing that was common for the French in other parts of Louisiana; and that she does not recollect the exact number of years that have elapsed since she was there, but believes it was, at least, ten years before the Government of Spain took place in Louisiana; and that she always understood, by her parents, she was there when a child, but she was too young to have remembrance of it. Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Natchitoches, John Baptiste Grappe, an inhabitant of Campti, in said county, and likewise one of the Justices of the Peace for the same, aged 42 years, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, thirty-five or thirty-six years ago, he went with his father from Natchitoches to the ancient Caddo village, where he remained about four months. At that time, there were no families or soldiers there, but the houses of the French families who had lived there but a few years before, together with the fort, flag-staff, and the barracks or house occupied by the soldiers, were all standing entire; and that his father told him which of the fields and houses his family had occupied for a number of years; and, likewise, he remembers to have seen in the fort the ambusier and platform where the cannon were placed; and that he recollects his father used to call the distance from Natchitoches to said place by water about the same as from Natchitoches to New Orleans, viz. about one hundred and seventy leagues; and further, that he well recollects some French families, particularly a Mr. Verge and Mr. de Coto, living at the Yattasse point, so called, and that he always understood they had lived there for many years before Louisiana was ceded to Spain; and that the same place has always continued to be occupied by some French inhabitants, and is situated on the western division of Red river, about twenty-five leagues above Natchitoches, and is now part of what is called the Bayou Pierre settlement, under the jurisdiction of the Spanish Government, in the province of Texas; and that he has been several times at a place called the Dout, on the east bank of the Sabine river, at a prairie, and towards the head of said river, where there was the appearance of some works having been erected by the French as a trading establishment, and where his father and many Indians had told him the French flag had been hoisted, and the arms of the King of France buried. NATCHITOCHES, September 22, 1805.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Natchitoches, François Grappe, of Campti, in said county, aged 57, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, he was born near the ancient Caddo village, on Red river, which, by the course of the river, he believes to be upwards of five hundred miles above Natchitoches, where his parents then lived, and had lived, he believes, a number of years before he was born, and where they continued to live until he was sixteen or seventeen years of age. As long ago as he can remember, he recollects a Mr. François Harvey, a French gentleman, living there, and who, he understood, was the first white man that settled there; and that his father settled there about two years after. But he always understood there had been a company of French traders settled, for a number of years, about forty miles higher up the river, and that Mr. Harvey was one of them; but they were broken up before he was born; it was always called the Company: And that, during the whole time he lived at the ancient Caddo village, there were three settled families, besides a number of single persons, and a detachment of soldiers; and that the number of soldiers assigned by the French Government for that post was always fifteen, but he never knew the number complete; and that his father was commandant of the place for many years, and was succeeded by a Mr. Closo, who continued to be commandant until it was abandoned, after the cession of Louisiana to Spain; and that his father, by order of the then Governor of Louisiana, built a small fort there, in which were two small pieces of cannon, and in which was a flag-staff, on which the French flag was occasionally hoisted; he believes that the whole time that that place was occupied by the French as a military post and a settlement of families was about thirty years; and that the inhabitants pursued the same agriculture that was then common in other parts of the French settlements of Louisiana, viz. corn, tobacco, indigo, cotton, and garden vegetables, with some wheat, which grew well; but, having no way of manufacturing flour, there was but little wheat raised, though there was a pair of excellent European mill-stones and mill-irons there, but were not in use in his time; the stones he himself brought down in the year 1778, and they were carried to Opelousas; he understood they had been carried to the Caddo country by the Company, as it was called: And that he has knowledge of a French trading establishment being at a place called the Dout, on the Sabine river, near where the Nandaco Indians now live; and that it was an ancient establishment, and a place of great trade and resort at the time his father's family lived at the Caddos; and that he has several times been at the place; the French flag used to be hoisted there, and there are the remains of the buildings and works now to be seen; and that the Dout is about one hundred and fifty miles northwest from Natchitoches: And that there was, at the same time, a similar trading establishment and a number of settled French families at the Yattasse point, on the southwest division of Red river, about twenty-five leagues above Natchitoches, in what is now called the Bayou Pierre settlement, which is now under the jurisdiction of Spain, and which place is now, and ever has continued to be, occupied by French inhabitants, and some of whom have ancient French grants or titles for their lands; and that Mr. Verge, who lived there for a number of years before Louisiana was ceded to Spain, had the exclusive Indian trade granted him, by the French Governor General of Louisiana, of Troiscannes or Tauacanos, the Reychies, Yattasses, and several other tribes that then lived on the river Sabine, and southward and westward of it, in what is now called the province of Texas.

NATCHITOCHES, October 2, 1805.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Natchitoches, Gaspard Bodin, Lewis Bodin, and Andrew Chamar, all of Natchitoches aforesaid, who, being duly sworn, deposed and said, that, on the 8th day of September last, they, the deponents, were all travelling in company from Natchitoches to Opelousas, on the usual road; and that, when within fourteen or fifteen miles of Opelousas church, they were met by five armed Spanish soldiers on horseback; who drew their arms upon them, and ordered them to stop. One of the deponents, (Madam Bodin,) who speaks Spanish well, asked the one who appeared to be the commander of the party, what business he had to order them to stop, that they were all of them Americans, and that was American ground. The commander of the Spanish party replied, that he had a right to command there, and would do as he pleased, and that he must have such a horse for the use of the King, (pointing to Mr. Chamar's best horse) which he immediately took possession of, and took away with them, proceeding on the Nacogdoche road, and the deponent Chamer has never seen or heard of his horse since.

NATCHITOCHES, October 3, 1805.

Personally appeared before me, John Sibley, a Justice of the Peace for the county of Natchitoches, Francis Roban, of said Natchitoches, aged 21 years, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, about the 10th of September last, himself, being in the employ of Messrs. Oliver and Case, of Natchitoches, was, with Joseph Lucas, conducting from the Caddo nation to Natchitoches eighteen horses, packed with about eleven hundred deer skins; and in the Bayou Pierre settlement they stopped for the night, at the plantation of a Mr. Poisot. Next morning, the deponent had occasion to go to the house of Mr. de Soto, about half a league distant, who is a syndic, and at whose house the detachment of Spanish soldiers on guard is stationed; soon after his arrival at de Soto's house, a corporal of the guard called him, the deponent, into a small apartment, in de Soto's house, under the pretence of speaking to him; as soon as he entered the room, the corporal told him he was a prisoner, and placed a sentinel at the door; then told him they wanted to take Oliver and Case, or either of them, and that, if they did not find Oliver and Case, that he, the deponent, should pay for it. They kept him then confined in the room, from about eight in the morning till one afternoon; they then removed the deponent on his own horse, with one armed soldier before him and another behind, and ordered him to show Oliver and Case. He conducted them in this manner about eight miles, where he understood Mr. Case had been to Mr. Doley's. Arriving there, and not finding him, the deponent was left at Mr. Doley's under a guard, and the corporal went to some houses near by in the neighborhood, to search for him, but could not find him; after which, they sat off in the same order in which they came, to return back to de Soto's. On their way they discovered a fresh trail of horses crossing the road, and leading from Mr. Poisot's plantation towards the plantation of Mr. Robleau, which they concluded to be the trail of Lucas, with the packs, &c. The deponent then attempted to escape from them, but was overtaken, and tied with his hands behind him, with a coarse hair rope; they then put him on his horse, one of the Spaniards leading his horse by a rope and another following behind, and holding the other end of the hair rope, with which the deponent's hands were tied. It was, at this time, towards eight o'clock in the evening; the moon shone bright, they followed the trail leading towards Robleau's plantation, about two and a half miles, and found all the packhorses grazing. The Spaniards went immediately to gathering them up, and took possession of them all, drove them into a pen belonging to the plantation, and placed a guard over them; after which they untied the deponent, and drove him into the pen with the horses, where they kept him under guard amongst the horses the remainder of the night. After the horses and the deponent were thus penned up together, the corporal armed himself with a pair of pistols, and, with a rope under his coat, sat off for Lucas's camp, the light of which was in sight, saying he would go and tie Lucas. He was gone about a quarter of an hour, when he came running back much out of breath, and exclaimed: "Blast the Indian, he wanted to shoot me with his arrow." Soon after, the Indian came up; the corporal took his gun and presented it at the Indian, who replied, "You had best be easy, for I am not a child; you may thank me that you are here now." The corporal then spoke to the Indian, told him he was sorry for what he had done, it was in a passion, shook hands with him, &c. The Indian, who was a Yattasse, then told the deponent to tell the corporal that he, the Spaniard, had wanted to take Lucas, but, if he had have taken him, he should not have tied him or taken him off. The Indian afterwards related to him, the deponent, how the corporal came to the fire, where Lucas and himself were encamped; Lucas saw him coming and rose up; the corporal called to him and told him he wanted to speak to him; Lucas saw him armed and saw the rope he had, and retreated a few steps from the fire; the corporal told him to stop, or he would shoot him; Lucas told him, he would not stop, and ran off. The Indian, at the same moment, drew his bow to shoot the corporal, who likewise ran and hid himself in the cornfield. The deponent further saith, that, while he was imprisoned in the horse-pen with the horses, the Indian came into the pen to him, and remained with him the remainder of the night. Some time in the night he proposed to the deponent, to assist him, and they would tie the two Spaniards, and take off the horses, but if he was afraid to attempt that, he, the Indian, would kill them both, if the deponent would consent to it. The deponent further saith, that, the next morning, the Spaniards sat off with him and all the horses for de Soto's house; and as they were going by Mr. Poisot's house, on their way he requested leave to go in to get a drink of water, and made his escape out of a back door, hid himself in a cotton field, from thence into a thicket, where he remained hid till night, leaving his horse, saddle, and bridle at Mr. Poisot's gate, which the Spaniards took possession of. In the evening, he came into Mr. Poisot's house, Mr. Poisot gave him some victuals, and advised him to make the best of his way to Natchitoches, for the Spaniards were determined to catch him, and had given him positive instructions to take him if he could, and bind him, and bring him to the guard; and, that all the horses they had started off for Nacogdoche. The deponent sat off immediately, and travelled all night, avoiding as much as he could the main road, understanding that there were Spaniards posted on the road to waylay him. About an hour before daylight he arrived at Mr. Doley's, and found the Spaniards had arrived there, with all the horses, before him, and a sentinel guarding them; his own horse among the rest. And further the deponent saith not.

[The following report was made to the House of Representatives by the committee to whom the foregoing papers were referred.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 3, 1806.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom were referred the message and communication from the President of the United States, of the 6th December last, together with the documents accompanying the same, made a report thereupon, as followeth:

The committee have beheld, with just indignation, the hostile spirit manifested by the Court of Madrid towards the Government of the United States, in withholding the ratification of its convention with us, although signed by its own minister, under the eye of his sovereign, unless with alterations of its terms, affecting claims of the United States, which, by the express conditions of the instrument itself, were reserved for future discussion; in piratical depredations upon our fair commerce; in obstructing the navigation of the Mobile; in refusing to come to any fair and amicable adjustment of the boundaries of Louisiana; and in a daring violation, by persons acting under the authority of Spain, and, no doubt, apprized of her sentiments and views, of our undisputed limits, which she had solemnly recognized by treaty.

To a Government having interests distinct from those of its people, and disregarding its welfare, here is ample cause for a formal declaration of war, on the part of the United states, and such, did they obey the impulse of their feelings alone, is the course which the committee would not hesitate to recommend; but to a Government identified with its citizens, too far removed from the powerful nations of the earth for its safety to be endangered by their hostility, peace must always be desirable, so long as it is compatible with the honour and interest of the community.

Whilst the United States continue burdened with a debt which annually absorbs two-thirds of their revenue, and duties upon imports constitute the only source from which that revenue can be raised, without resorting to systems of taxation not more ruinous and oppressive than they are uncertain and precarious, the best interests of the Union cry aloud for peace. When that debt shall have been discharged, and the resources of the nation thereby liberated, then may we rationally expect to raise, even in time of war, the supplies which our frugal institutions require, without recurring to the hateful and destructive expedient of loans; then, and not till then, may we bid defiance to the world. The present moment is peculiarly auspicious for this great and desirable work. Now, if ever, the national debt is to be paid by such financial arrangements as will accelerate its extinction, by reaping the rich harvest of neutrality, and thus providing for that diminution of revenue which experience teaches us to expect on the general pacification of Europe. And the committee indulge a hope, that in the changed aspect of affairs in that quarter, Spain will find motives for a just fulfilment of her stipulations with us, and an amicable settlement of limits upon terms not more beneficial to the United States than advantageous to herself; securing to her an ample barrier on the side of Mexico, and to us the countries watered by the Mississippi, and to the eastward of it. But whilst the committee perceive, in the general uproar of Europe, a state of things peculiarly favorable to the peaceable pursuit of our best interests, they are neither insensible to the indignity which has been offered on the part of Spain, nor unwilling to repel similar outrage. On the subject of self-defence, when the territory of the United States is insulted, there can be but one opinion, whatever differences may exist on the question whether that protection, which a vessel finds in our harbors, shall be extended to her by the nation, in the Indian or Chinese seas?

TRIPOLI.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 11, 1805; JANUARY 13, AND FEBRUARY 4, 1806; AND NOVEMBER 11, 1807.

DECEMBER 11, 1805.

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before the Senate the several treaties which have been entered into on the part of the United States, since their last session.

1. A treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of Tripoli, in Barbary, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 13, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the request of the Senate of December 30, I now lay before them the correspondence of the naval commanders Barron and Rodgers, and of Mr. Eaton, late consul at Tunis, respecting the progress of the war with Tripoli, antecedent to the treaty with the Bey and regency of Tripoli, and respecting the negotiations for the same; and the commission and instructions of Mr. Eaton, with such other correspondence, in possession of the offices, as, I suppose, may be useful to the Senate in their deliberations upon the said treaty.

The instructions which were given to Mr. Lear, the consul-general at Algiers, respecting the negotiations for the said treaty, accompanied the treaty and the message concerning the same, and are now with them in possession of the Senate.

So much of these papers has been extracted and communicated to the House of Representatives, as relates to the principles of the co-operation between the United States and Hamet Caramalli, which is the subject of a joint message to both Houses of Congress, bearing equal date with the present; and, as those now communicated to the Senate comprehend the whole of that matter, I request that they may be considered as comprising the documents stated in that message as accompanying it. Being mostly originals or sole copies, a return of them is requested at the convenience of the Senate.

We have no letter from Mr. Lear respecting Tripoline affairs of later date than that of July 5, which was transmitted to the Senate with the treaty, nor, consequently, any later information of what steps have been taken to carry into effect the stipulation for the delivery of the wife and children of the brother of the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 13, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress the application of Hamet Caramalli, elder brother of the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli, soliciting from the United States attention to his services and sufferings in the late war against that State; and, in order to possess them of the ground on which that application stands, the facts shall be stated according to the views and information of the Executive.

During the war with Tripoli, it was suggested that Hamet Caramalli, elder brother of the reigning Bashaw, and driven by him from his throne, meditated the recovery of his inheritance, and that a concert in action with us was desirable to him. We considered that concerted operations by those who have a common enemy were entirely justifiable, and might produce effects favorable to both, without binding either to guaranty the objects of the other. But the distance of the scene, the difficulties of communication, and the uncertainty of our information inducing the less confidence in the measure, it was committed to our agents as one which might be resorted to, if it promised to promote our success.

Mr. Eaton, however, our late consul, on his return from the Mediterranean, possessing personal knowledge of the scene, and having confidence in the effect of a joint operation, we authorized Commodore Barron, then proceeding with his squadron, to enter into an understanding with Hamet, if he should deem it useful; and, as it was represented that he would need some aid of arms and ammunition, and even of money, he was authorized to furnish them to a moderate extent, according to the prospect of utility to be expected from it. In order to avail him of the advantages of Mr. Eaton's knowledge of circumstances, an occasional employment was provided for the latter as an agent for the navy in that sea. Our expectation was that an intercourse should be kept up between the ex-Bashaw and the Commodore; that, while the former moved on by land, our squadron should proceed with equal pace, so as to arrive at their destination together, and to attack the common enemy by land and sea at the same time. The instructions of June 6 to Commodore Barron show that a co-operation only was intended, and by no means an union of our object with the fortune of the ex-Bashaw; and the commodore's letters, of March 22 and May 19, prove that he had the most correct idea of our intentions. His verbal instructions, indeed, to Mr. Eaton and Captain Hull, if the expressions are accurately committed to writing by those gentlemen, do not limit the extent of his co-operation as rigorously as he probably intended, but it is certain, from the ex-Bashaw's letter of January 3, written when he was proceeding to join Mr. Eaton, and in which he says, "your operations should be carried on by sea, mine by land," that he left the position in which he was, with a proper idea of the nature of the co-operation. If Mr. Eaton's subsequent convention should appear to bring forward other objects, his letter of April 29 and May 1 views this convention but as provisional, the second article, as he expressly states, guarding it against any ill effect, and his letter of June 30 confirms this construction. In the event it was found, that, after placing the ex-Bashaw in possession of Derne, one of the most important cities and provinces of the country, where he had resided himself as Governor, he was totally unable to command any resources, or to bear any part in co-operation with us. This hope was then at an end, and we certainly had never contemplated, nor were we prepared to land an army of our own, or to raise, pay, or subsist an army of Arabs, to march from Derne to Tripoli, and to carry on a land war at such a distance from our resources. Our means and our authority were merely naval; and, that such were the expectations of Hamet, his letter of June 29 is an unequivocal acknowledgment. Whilst, therefore, an impression from the capture of Derne might still operate at Tripoli, and an attack on that place from our squadron was daily expected, Colonel Lear thought it the best moment to listen to overtures of peace, then made by the Bashaw; he did so; and, while urging provisions for the United States, he paid attention also to the interests of Hamet, but was able to effect nothing more than to engage the restitution of his family; and even the persevering in this demand suspended for some time the conclusion of the treaty.

In operations at such a distance, it becomes necessary to leave much to the discretion of the agents employed; but events may still turn up beyond the limits of that discretion. Unable in such a case to consult his Government, a zealous citizen will act as he believes that would direct him, were it apprised of the circumstances, and will take on himself the responsibility. In all these cases, the purity and patriotism of the motives should shield the agent from blame, and even secure a sanction, where the error is not too injurious. Should it be thought by any that the verbal instructions, said to have been given by Commodore Barron to Mr. Eaton, amount to a stipulation that the United States should place Hamet Caramalli on the throne of Tripoli, a stipulation so entirely unauthorized, so far beyond our views, and so onerous, could not be sanctioned by our Government; or should Hamet Caramalli, contrary to the evidence of his letters of January 3, and June 29, be thought to have left the position, which he now seems to regret, under a mistaken expectation that we were, at all events, to place him on his throne, on an appeal to the liberality of the nation something equivalent to the replacing him in his former situation might be worthy its consideration. A nation, by establishing a character of liberality and magnanimity, gains, in the friendship and respect of others, more than the worth of mere money. This appeal is now made by Hamet Caramalli to the United States. The ground he has taken being different, not only from our views, but from those expressed by himself on former occasions, Mr. Eaton was desired to state whether any verbal communications passed from him to Hamet, which had varied what we saw in writing. His answer of December 5 is herewith transmitted, and has rendered it still more necessary that, in presenting to the Legislature the application of Hamet, I should present them, at the same time, an exact statement of the views and proceedings of the Executive through this whole business, that they may clearly understand the ground on which we are placed. It is accompanied by all the papers which bear any relation to the principles of the co-operation, and which can inform their judgment in deciding on the application of Hamet Caramalli.

TH: JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 4, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

I now transmit the letters desired by the resolution of the Senate of January 20, so far as they exist in the offices, to wit:

Extract of a letter from the Department of State to Mr. Eaton of May 20, 1801.

The letter from Mr. Cathcart to Mr. Eaton, dated Leghorn, June 15, 1801, is not in the offices, but the substance of it is supposed to be recited in those of Mr. Cathcart to the Secretary of State, of August 15, 1802, and July 2, 1801, extracts of both of which are transmitted.

The letter of Mr. Eaton of September 5, 1801, supposed to be that intended by the Senate, as it answers their description: there is no letter of his of September 15.

Extract of a letter from William Eaton to the Secretary of State, December 13, 1801.

Extract from Captain Murray's letter of August 18, 1802.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Cathcart to the Secretary of State of August 25, 1802.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Morris to the Secretary of the Navy, March 30, 1803.

The letter from the Swedish admiral to Hamet Bashaw, designated in the resolution of the Senate, is not in the possession of the Executive.

The extracts abovementioned give the whole matter contained in the respective letters relating to Hamet Caramalli. The parts omitted are on subjects entirely foreign to what concerns him.

TH: JEFFERSON.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

NOVEMBER 11, 1807.

To the Senate of the United States:

Some time had elapsed, after the receipt of the late treaty between the United States and Tripoli, before the circumstance drew particular attention, that, although by the third article the wife and children of the ex-Bashaw were to be restored to him, this did not appear either to have been done or demanded. Still it was constantly expected that explanations on the subject would be received. None, however, having arrived when Mr. Davis went as consul to Tripoli, he was instructed to demand the execution of the article. He did so; but was answered by the exhibition of a declaration, signed by our negotiator the day after the signature of the treaty, allowing four years for the restoration of the family. This declaration, and the letter of Mr. Davis stating what had passed on the occasion, are now communicated to the Senate. On the receipt of this letter, I caused the correspondence of Mr. Lear to be diligently re-examined, in order to ascertain whether there might have been a communication of this paper made, and overlooked or forgotten. None such, however, is found. There appears only, in a journalized account of the transaction by Mr. Lear, under date of June 3, a passage intimating that he should be disposed to give time, rather than suffer the business to be broken off, and our countrymen left in slavery: and again, that on the return of the person who passed between himself and the Bashaw, and information that the Bashaw would require time for the delivery of the family, he consented, and went ashore to consummate the treaty. This was done by the next day; and being forwarded to us as ultimately signed, and found to contain no allowance of time, nor any intimation that there was any stipulation but what was in the public treaty, it was supposed that the Bashaw had, in fine, abandoned the proposition; and the instructions, before mentioned, were consequently given to Mr. Davis. An extract of so much of Mr. Lear's communication as relates to this circumstance is now transmitted to the Senate;* the whole of the papers having been laid before them on a former occasion. How it has happened that the declaration of June 5 has never before come to our knowledge, cannot with certainty be said; but, whether there has been a miscarriage of it, or a failure of the ordinary attention and correctness of that officer in making his communications, I have thought it due to the Senate, as well as to myself, to explain to them the circumstances which have withheld from their knowledge, as they did from my own, a modification, which, had it been placed in the public treaty, would have been relieved from objections which candor and good faith cannot but feel in its present form.

As the restoration of the family has probably been effected, a just regard to the character of the United States will require that I make to the Bashaw a candid statement of facts; and that the sacrifices of his right to the peace and friendship of the two countries, by yielding finally to the demand of Mr. Davis, be met by proper acknowledgments and reparation on our part.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of Tripoli, in Barbary.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be, from the conclusion of the treaty, a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a sincere friendship between the President and citizens of the United States of America, on the one part, and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of the regency of Tripoli, in Barbary, on the other, made by the free consent of both parties, and on the terms of the most favored nation. And if either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor or privilege in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party, freely where it is freely granted to such other nation; but where the grant is conditional, it shall be at the option of the contracting parties to accept, alter, or reject such conditions, in such manner as shall be most conducive to their respective interests.

ART. 2. The Bashaw of Tripoli shall deliver up to the American squadron, now off Tripoli, all the Americans in his possession; and all the subjects of the Bashaw of Tripoli, now in the power of the United States of America, shall be delivered up to him; and as the number of Americans in possession of the Bashaw of Tripoli amounts to three hundred persons, more or less, and the number of Tripoline subjects in the power of Americans is about one hundred, more or less, the Bashaw of Tripoli shall receive from the United States of America the sum of sixty thousand dollars, as a payment for the difference between the prisoners herein mentioned.

ART. 3. All the forces of the United States which have been, or may be in hostility against the Bashaw of Tripoli, in the province of Derne, or elsewhere within the dominions of the said Bashaw, shall be withdrawn therefrom, and no supplies shall be given by, or in behalf of, the said United States, during the continuance of this peace, to any of the subjects of the said Bashaw, who may be in hostility against him, in any part of his dominions: And the Americans will use all means in their power, to persuade the brother of the said Bashaw, who has co-operated with them at Derne, &c. to withdraw from the territory of the said Bashaw of Tripoli; but they will not use any force or improper means to effect that object; and in case he should withdraw himself as aforesaid, the Bashaw engages to deliver up to him his wife and children, now in his power.

ART. 4. If any goods belonging to any nation, with which either of the parties are at war, should be loaded on board vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free and unmolested, and no attempt shall be made to take or detain them.

ART. 5. If any citizens, subjects, or their effects, belonging to either party, shall be found on board a prize vessel, taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be liberated immediately, and their effects so captured shall be restored to their lawful owners, or their agents.

ART. 6. Proper passports shall immediately be given to the vessels of both the contracting parties, on condition that the vessels of war, belonging to the regency of Tripoli, in meeting with merchant vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States of America, shall not be permitted to visit them with more than two persons besides the rowers: these two only shall be permitted to go on board said vessel, without first obtaining leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passport, and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage; and should any of the said subjects of Tripoli insult or molest the commander, or any other person on board a vessel so visited, or plunder any of the property contained in her; on complaint being made by the consul of the United States of America, resident at Tripoli, and on his producing sufficient proof to substantiate the fact, the commander or rais of said Tripoline ship or vessel of war, as well as the offenders, shall be punished in the most exemplary manner.

All vessels of war belonging to the United States of America, on meeting with a cruiser belonging to the regency of Tripoli, and having seen her passport and certificate from the consul of the United States of America residing in the regency, shall permit her to proceed on her cruise unmolested, and without detention. No passport shall be granted by either party to any vessel, but such as are absolutely the property of citizens or subjects of said contracting parties, on any pretence whatever.

ART. 7. A citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties, having bought a prize vessel condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificate of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for two years, which, considering the distance between the two countries, is no more than a reasonable time for her to procure other passports.

ART. 8. Vessels of either party, putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, they shall be furnished at the market price; and if any such vessel should so put in from a disaster at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo without paying any duties; but in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

ART. 9. Should a vessel of either party be cast on the shore of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her and her crew. No pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposition of the owners, and the crew protected and succored until they can be sent to their country.

ART. 10. If a vessel of either party shall be attacked by an enemy within gunshot of the forts of the other, she shall be defended as much as possible. If she be in port, she shall not be seized or attacked when it is in the power of the other party to protect her; and, when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be allowed to pursue her from the same port, within twenty-four hours after her departure.

ART. 11. The commerce between the United States of America and the regency of Tripoli, the protections to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen; the reciprocal right of establishing consuls in each country, and the privileges, immunities, and jurisdictions to be enjoyed by such consuls, are declared to be on the same footing with those of the most favored nations respectively.

ART. 12. The consul of the United States of America shall not be answerable for debts contracted by citizens of his own nation, unless he previously gives a written obligation so to do.

ART. 13. On a vessel of war belonging to the United States of America, anchoring before the city of Tripoli, the consul is to inform the Bashaw of her arrival; and she shall be saluted with twenty-one guns, which she is to return in the same quantity or number.

ART. 14. As the Government of the United States of America has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of musselmen, and as the said States never have entered into any voluntary war or act of hostility against any mahometan nation, except in the defence of their just rights to freely navigate the high seas, it is declared by the contracting parties, that no pretext, arising from religious opinions, shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two nations; and the consuls and agents of both nations, respectively, shall have liberty to exercise his religion in his own house; all slaves of the same religion shall not be impeded in going to said consul's house at hours of prayer. The consuls shall have liberty and personal security given them to travel within the territories of each other, both by land and sea, and shall not be prevented from going on board any vessel that they may think proper to visit; they shall have, likewise, the liberty to appoint their own drogoman and brokers.

ART. 15. In case of any dispute arising from the violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared on any pretext whatever; but, if the consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen, shall not be able to settle the same, the Government of that country shall state their grievances in writing, and transmit it to the Government of the other; and the period of twelve calendar months shall be allowed for answers to be returned; during which time, no act of hostility shall be permitted by either party; and in case the grievances are not redressed, and war should be the event, the consuls, and citizens or subjects of both parties, reciprocally, shall be permitted to embark with their effects unmolested, on board of whatever vessel or vessels they shall think proper.

ART. 16. If, in the fluctuation of human events, a war should break out between the two nations, the prisoners captured by either party shall not be made slaves, but shall be exchanged rank for rank; and, if there should be a deficiency on either side, it shall be made up by the payment of five hundred Spanish dollars for each captain, three hundred dollars for each mate and supercargo, and one hundred Spanish dollars for each seaman so wanting; and, it is agreed, that prisoners shall be exchanged in twelve months from the time of their capture; and that this exchange may be effected by any private individual, legally authorized by either of the parties.

ART. 17. If any of the Barbary States or other Powers at war with the United States of America, shall capture any American vessel, and send her into any of the ports of the regency of Tripoli, they shall not be permitted to sell her, but shall be obliged to depart the port on procuring the requisite supplies of provisions; and no duties shall be exacted on the sale of prizes captured by vessels sailing under the flag of the United States of America, when brought into any port in the regency of Tripoli.

ART. 18. If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection shall have any dispute with each other, the consul shall decide between the parties; and whenever the consul shall require any aid or assistance from the Government of Tripoli, to enforce his decisions, it shall immediately be granted to him. And, if any dispute shall arise between any citizen of the United States and the citizens or subjects of any other nation, having a consul or agent in Tripoli, such dispute shall be settled by the consuls or agents of the respective nations.

ART. 19. If a citizen of the United States should kill or wound a Tripoline, or, on the contrary, if a Tripoline shall kill or wound a citizen of the United States, the law of the country shall take place, and equal justice shall be rendered, the consul assisting at the trial; and, if any delinquent shall make his escape, the consul shall not be answerable for him in any manner whatever.

ART. 20. Should any citizen of the United States of America die, within the limits of the regency of Tripoli, the Bashaw and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased; but it shall be under the immediate direction of the consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no consul, the effects shall be deposited in the hands of some person, worthy of trust, until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when they shall render an account of the property. Neither shall the Bashaw nor his subjects give hinderance in the execution of any will that may appear.

Whereas, the undersigned Tobias Lear, Consul General of the United States of America for the regency of Algiers, being duly appointed commissioner, by letters patent under the signature of the President and seal of the United States of America, bearing date at the city of Washington, the 18th day of November, 1803, for negotiating and concluding a treaty of peace between the United States of America and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of the regency of Tripoli, in Barbary.

Now know ye, that I, Tobias Lear, commissioner as aforesaid, do conclude the foregoing treaty, and every article and clause therein contained; reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States.

Done at Tripoli, in Barbary, the 4th day of June, in the year 1805, corresponding with the 6th day of the 1st month of Rabbia, 1220.

TOBIAS LEAR. [L. S.]

Having appeared in our presence, Colonel Tobias Lear, Consul General of the United States of America in the regency of Algiers, and commissioner for negotiating and concluding a treaty of peace and friendship between us and the United States of America, bringing with him the present treaty of peace with the within articles: they were by us minutely examined, and we do hereby accept, confirm, and ratify them, ordering all our subjects to fulfil entirely their contents, without any violation and under no pretext.

In witness whereof, we, with the heads of our regency, subscribe it.

Given at Tripoli, in Barbary, the 6th day of the 1st month of Rabbia, 1220, corresponding with the 4th day of June, 1805.

We hereby acknowledge to have received from the hands of Colonel Tobias Lear, the full sum of sixty thousand dollars, mentioned as ransom for two hundred Americans in the treaty of peace, concluded between us and the United States of America, on the 6th day of the 1st month of Rabbia, 1220; and of all demands against the said United States.

Done this 21st day of the 1st month of Rabbia, 1220.

JOSEPH CARAMANLY, Bashaw. [L. S.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to William Eaton, Esquire, dated

WASHINGTON, May 20, 1801.

Your letter of the 2d and 18th September, 6th October, 1st, 9th, 10th, 15th, 16th, 13th, 25th, 19th, and 26th November, and 8th December, have been received since the date of Mr. Lincoln's letter by the Grand Turk, which sailed from New York in March last, with the third cargo of Regalia for Tunis. The proofs which have been given by the Bashaw of Tripoli of hostile designs against the United States have, as you will learn from Commodore Dale, determined the President to send into the Mediterranean a squadron of three frigates and a sloop of war, under the command of that officer. Should war have been declared, or hostilities commenced, this force will be immediately employed in the defence and protection of our commerce against the piracies of that regency. It is hoped that the contagion will not have spread either to Tunis or Algiers; but should one or both of them have followed the perfidious example, their corsairs will be equally repelled and punished.

The policy of exhibiting a naval force on the coast of Barbary has long been urged by yourself and the other consuls. The present moment is peculiarly favorable for the experiment, not only as it is a provision against an immediate danger, but as we are now at peace and amity with all the rest of the world, and as the force employed would, if at home, be at nearly the same expense, with less advantage to our mariners. The President has, therefore, every reason to expect the utmost exertions of your prudence and address, in giving the measure an impression most advantageous to the character and interests of the United States. In effecting this object, the means must be left, in a great degree, to your knowledge of the local and other circumstances which cannot be understood at this distance. You will, of course, take due pains to satisfy the Bey that the United States are desirous of maintaining peace with all nations who are willing to live in peace; that they have given abundant evidence of their disposition to cultivate the friendship of the Barbary regencies, and of himself in particular, and that, if the flag of the United States should be engaged in a war with either of them, it will be a war of defence and necessity, not of choice or provocation. You will also give every friendly explanation and assurance, on this occasion, which may be requisite for the consuls and agents of other Powers residing at Tunis.

You are authorized to inform the Bey of Tunis that a vessel is now preparing to take in the cargo, which will complete the Regalia due to him, and that no time will be lost in getting her on her voyage. The jewels, to the amount of forty thousand dollars, have, as you know, been ordered to be prepared in London. On the 28th December last Mr. King wrote: "I have concluded to take immediate measures to provide the jewels, enumerated in the list furnished by Mr. Eaton. Some of the articles can be soon prepared and sent; others, including the arms and almost all the jewelry, will require a long time to be prepared." If they are essential to the preservation of peace, and the benefits of the treaty with the Bey, they must be yielded to him.

It will be agreeable, both to the humanity of the President and the policy of your situation, to render kind offices to the British, and all others within your consulate; but you cannot be permitted to accept an appointment from any other Government than the United States.

The ship purchased by you, being foreign built, is excluded, by a construction of our laws, from having a Mediterranean pass.

The President has taken into consideration your request of leave of absence, and thinks it might be too injurious to the affairs of the United States, especially during the present critical state of the Mediterranean.

I conclude with enjoining on you the most cordial and respectful communications with Commodore Dale, and the ready assistance of him with all such useful information, and other good offices, as it may be in your power to render, and with offering you my sincere wishes for your success in all your measures for advancing the welfare of our country.

Extract of a letter from James L. Cathcart, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated LEGHORN, July 2, 1801.

Should we break with the whole of the Barbary States at once, we must have considerably greater force in the Mediterranean. I propose chastising them, one at a time, and pursuing such measures at the Ottoman court as will effectually prevent any coalition taking place injurious to our interest. I not only contemplate the obtaining a permanent and honorable peace, but likewise the dethroning the present Bashaw, and effecting a revolution in favor of his brother Hamet, who is at Tunis, and thereby insure the United States the gratitude of him and his successors: for so long as Joseph the Bashaw lives, our commerce will not be secure. For even allowing that we conclude a peace upon our own terms, the first time our frigates are off their guard, or employed upon other service, his cruisers will capture Americans, in retaliation, for having imposed upon him terms which he may consider humiliating, not reverting to the cause; and that the concessions, which we will certainly force him to make, are merely inflicted as a just punishment for his temerity and breach of faith, and to oblige him to observe his engagements inviolably sacred in future.

I have requested Mr. Eaton to endeavor to ascertain how far said Hamet would be willing to engage in an expedition of that nature, and even should we not succeed in dethroning Joseph, nevertheless his presence on board of Commodore Truxton would strike his brother and adherents with such a panic as could not fail to promote our interests.

Extract of a letter from William Eaton, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated ROAD OF TUNIS, September 5, 1801.

The enclosures, which I have the honor herewith to forward, will inform Government, as accurately as I have the means, of our actual position and future prospects in regard to Tripoli, one circumstance only omitted, which is a project in concert between the rightful Bashaw of Tripoli, now in exile in Tunis, and myself, to attack the usurper by land while our operations are going on by sea. These two men are brothers; the younger is on the throne, having expelled the elder about eight or nine years ago. The subjects, in general, of the reigning Bashaw, are very discontented, and ripe for revolt: they want nothing but confidence in the prospect of success; this confidence may be inspired by assurances of our determination to chastise this Bashaw for his outrage against the United States. The Bey of Tunis, though prudence will keep him behind the curtain, I have strong reasons to believe will cheerfully prompt the same. He is in favor of the elder brother. The idea of dethroning our enemy, and placing a rightful sovereign in his seat, makes a deeper impression on account of the lasting peace it will produce with that regency, and the lesson of caution it will teach the other Barbary States. These are objects which, to me, seem so clearly within our power that they ought to command exertions. Having begun to coerce Tripoli, it would operate an injury of perpetual duration to relax in these measures.

Extract of a letter from William Eaton to the Secretary of State.

SIR: TUNIS, December 13, 1801.

On the 28th October arrived the Danish Commodore Koefoed, and a Consul Holch, five days from Leghorn. The evening of the 2d ultimo they passed at the American house. As the commodore had lately been at Tripoli on a negotiation, it was very natural to inquire of him what seemed to be the general sentiment of the Tripolines respecting the American war. He said it was very unpopular, and that the subjects of the Bashaw, chiefly on this account, were ripe for a revolt; they waited for nothing but succor. They clamor against the madness and oppression of their chief, say he makes war on his friends to the destruction of their little commerce, takes all the plunder to himself, and, in the issue, reduces them to starvation and the loss of friends, without allowing them the wretched consolation to mourn for those friends when slain. They almost unanimously desire the restoration of their rightful sovereign, who is a mild man, of peaceable dispositions; and if he were offered them, with the appearance of determination, they would rise en masse to receive him. The commodore gave it as his opinion that the most effectual way of reducing Tripoli would be to land troops south of the town, on a commanding untenanted position, and raising a cross fire with the bomb-ketches stationed on the north of it; gunboats or floating batteries to be stationed at the same time within the mole, to keep up a direct fire on the town and rear of the castle. He thinks three thousand men an ample force to effect the object contemplated by land; but two heavy pieces of ordnance for battering, and some light artillery to repel the assault of cavalry, would be requisite. Thus it appears that the opinions of the Danish and American commodores correspond very exactly on the subject of necessary operations for reducing Tripoli.

On the position proper for landing stands a considerable forest of date-trees, the fruit of which forms a great article of subsistence to the Moors of the vicinity; apprehension of the destruction of which would bring these people to almost any terms. Their peaceable behavior may be made a condition of its preservation; at the same time, it may serve for cover against cavalry, in case of being hard pushed.

On the morning of the 3d November I received a message from Sidi Mahomet Bashaw, the exile from Tripoli, informing me that his brother, the usurper, had addressed the Dey of Algiers, and begged his mediation to bring about a reconciliation with the American Government, and expressed great solicitude to know whether, in my opinion, the Americans would admit such an intervention. I did not hesitate to give it as my opinion, that my Government, having once been deceived by that Dey, would now seek to establish their peace on a surer base. He then desired to be advised whether he might place any reliance on the operations of the Americans in his behalf. I recommended to him patience and silence; at the same time, gave him leave to entertain the hope (may it not be illusive!) that the next summer's operations would favor his views.

Extract of a letter from A. Murray, Esq. on board the frigate Constellation, at Malta, to William Eaton, Esq. dated

AUGUST 18, 1802.

I have this day had a communication with the legal Bashaw of Tripoli, and offered to take him to Derne, and to aid him in any measures he chose to pursue; but he thinks it will be more to our advantage, as well as his, to go there in an English brig that he hath chartered, and to try what force he can raise there, in as private a manner as possible; after which, in conjunction with the Swedish force, we can further co-operate with him by private signals agreed upon. I am pleased with his candor, and am persuaded, if he get reinstated in his dominions, he will be friendly to us.

Extract of a letter from James L. Cathcart, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated LEGHORN, August 25, 1802.

During my residence at Tripoli, I had the honor to transmit to the Department of State the history of the reign of Ali Pacha, father of the reigning sovereign of Tripoli, including the different revolutions in that state, an account of the murder of Mohammed Bey, and the dethroning of the rightful sovereign of Tripoli, Hamet Pacha, who, at that period, was under the protection of the Bey of Tunis, but is now at Malta; and, in a supplement, I forwarded some account of the accession to the throne and reign of the present usurper, Jouseph Pacha Caramanli.

From the day of my arrival I conceived it my duty to be particular in forwarding details of the most prominent transactions of that Government, for the information of the President, and spared no pains or expense to procure the best intelligence obtainable. Whether eventually I succeeded or not, I must leave to your candor to determine, which may be ascertained by comparing my communications with the transactions which have since transpired. As the abovementioned papers, as well as my own observation, convinced me that the inhabitants of Tripoli held the present Pacha in the greatest degree of horror imaginable, and of their great desire that Hamet, who was then at Tunis, should again assume the reins of Government, I was left no reason to doubt that, should he ever be able to appear before Tripoli with any considerable force to espouse his cause, the chief inhabitants of that regency would declare in his favor. Indeed, so sensible is Jouseph that his conduct neither merits nor will ever receive their support when any force is opposed to him, that, whenever he goes out of the city, he carries all his treasure and jewels with him, in chests mounted on mules, which are confided to the care of his favorite slaves, who have orders to keep as close to him as possible: nor is he ever accompanied by less than from three to five hundred of his partisans, who are composed of negroes and men of desperate fortune, who would espouse his cause no longer than until his treasure was exhausted, and would then file into the ranks of the best paymaster. For this reason he carries his cash with him, as likewise to enable him to raise a party among the Arabs, should ever his brother's party assume courage sufficient to shut the gates of the city against him, as he did against Hamet, when he treacherously usurped the pachalic.

In my details of the relative situation of Tripoli with other nations, you will observe the many causes the Grand Seignior has had to complain of the arrogance of Jouseph Pacha, and no doubt will join with me in opinion that the war in which he was engaged was the only reason which prevented him from chastising him as he deserved; and that he only waits for a proper opportunity I believe is evident. No act could be more just than the reinstating Hamet Pacha on the throne of his forefathers; and no act could ensure the Grand Seignior a revenge so prompt and efficacious, and attended with so little expense both of blood and treasure; nor so effectually ensure the gratitude and future obedience of Hamet and his family, as well as set a precedent to the other states of Barbary, whose incorrigible insolence has become insupportable at the Sublime Porte, and render an example not only expedient, but absolutely necessary.

Jouseph Pacha, perfectly acquainted with these circumstances, spared no pains to entice his brother Hamet to come to Tripoli, under the specious pretext of giving him the government of the provinces of Derne and Bengasi, but without effect. Hamet would not listen to his proposal, and demanded of his brother to give him up his wife and children, whom he holds as hostages, and to settle a small annuity on him, sufficient to maintain his family, promising that he would then live and die at Tunis.

In the above train were affairs at Tripoli when I left it: and under those impressions, I was induced, in my letter to Mr. Eaton of the 15th of June, 1801, to make the following observations: "I conceive it peculiarly fortunate that Tripoli has broken with us first, as we have it in our power, with a small force, to reduce them to our own terms, and, consequently, to influence the other regencies in our favor, as they would find, by demonstration, that we brook not insults with impunity. Nay, sir, if the Pacha of Tripoli's brother Hamet, who is at Tunis, was a man of understanding and enterprise, I would stake my soul that, with the assistance of four of our frigates, I would effect a revolution in his favor, and place him on the throne of Tripoli, in spite of every obstacle; and thereby ensure the United States the gratitude of him and his successors, besides concluding an advantageous peace." But I must sincerely declare, that, actuated as I was by no other motive than an honest zeal for what I supposed, and continue to suppose, to be the best interest of my country, I at that period thought it a moral impossibility that it would take fifteen months to draw out the energies of an injured nation, or that motives of humanity would so far preponderate in our councils, as to induce us to postpone our vengeance until the barbarity of those miscreants to our unfortunate fellow-citizens would give a latitude, and prescribe the rules of a rigorous retaliation.

In a letter of the 29th of June, I forwarded to Mr. Eaton the outlines of my despatch (No. 8,) dated at Leghorn, July 2d, 1801, wherein I requested him to ascertain how far said Hamet would be willing to engage in an expedition of that nature; to which I received no answer for many months. For particulars, I refer you to the despatch; and you will please to observe the paragraph which commences, "I propose chastising them one at a time, and pursuing such measures at the Ottoman court as will effectually prevent any coalition taking place injurious to our interests."

The measures in contemplation were, to embark the said Hamet on board our commodore's ship, to proceed with him to Constantinople, to present him to the Grand Vizier, and let him then make use of his own arguments to procure the caftan, or robe of honor; and while he was negotiating for force, which the Grand Seignior undoubtedly means to send against Tripoli, we would have profited by the opportunity to have concluded a commercial treaty with the Sublime Porte, and to have made such arrangements, both there and with Hamet Pacha, as could not fail to inspire those nations with sentiments favorable to our dignity and interests. By procuring the Grand Seignior's sanction to this expedition, it would effectually prevent any coalition taking place unfavorable to our interests; and that the Grand Seignior still intends to revenge the insults he has received, you will be informed by Mr. Nissen's communications, dated Tripoli, April 22d, 1802, forwarded in my despatch (No. 7) of this year.

No material alteration took place until March last, when the usurper, Jouseph Pacha, having succeeded in persuading the Bey of Tunis to deny his protection to his brother Hamet, he was obliged, from mere necessity, to accede to Jouseph's proposal, and actually accepted the offer of the Government of Derne, and embarked on board a Russian ship bound to Malta, (but supposed to have been bound to Derne,) where he arrived the 11th of April.

This change of position by Hamet Pacha induced Mr. Eaton to take the measures which he no doubt has detailed to Government in the amplest manner, and which, had not this event taken place so suddenly, he would not have done until he received the President's instructions; and, so far as those measures have been made known to me, I must do Mr. Eaton the justice to say that they seem to have been judicious, dictated by imperious necessity, and an honest zeal for the success of an enterprise which promised such vast advantages to our country.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Morris to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

ON BOARD THE CHESAPEAKE, GIBRALTAR BAY, March 30, 1803.

I have been solicited by agents, or pretended agents, to co-operate with the brother to dethrone the Bey. Their demands have been from fifty thousand to one hundred thousand dollars, ten thousand stand of arms, powder, and some light field-pieces. This I absolutely refused, but consented to bring the ships before Tripoli in June, and to furnish twenty barrels of powder, on condition that I could be satisfied they had authority to admit the United States an equivalent for their aid in the event of success. Their answers were, that we would be permitted to make a favorable treaty. I was by no means satisfied with merely the pledge of these agents; their word was not a sufficient guarantee: and, in the event of our rendering them assistance, I shall take care to have the advantages clearly defined, and as binding as the nature of the case will allow.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Cathcart, dated

AUGUST 22, 1802.

According to information given by Mr. Eaton, he has prevailed on the brother of the Bashaw of Tripoli to repair to Malta, with a view to be with our squadron before Tripoli, and to be made use of against the Bashaw. At this distance, it is difficult to judge accurately of the project, or to give particular instructions for the management of it. Although it does not accord with the general sentiments or views of the United States to intermeddle with the domestic controversies of other countries, it cannot be unfair, in the prosecution of a just war, or the accomplishment of a reasonable peace, to take advantage of the hostile co-operation of others. As far, therefore, as the views of the brother may contribute to our success, the aid of them may be used for the purpose. Should this aid be found inapplicable, or his own personal object unattainable, it will be due to the honor of the United States, and to the expectations he will have naturally formed, to treat his disappointment with much tenderness; and to restore him, as nearly as may be, to the situation from which he was drawn, or to make some other convenient arrangement that may be more eligible to him. In case of a treaty of peace with the ruling Bashaw of Tripoli, perhaps it may be possible to make some stipulation, formal or informal, in favor of the brother, which may be a desirable alleviation of his misfortune.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to James L. Cathcart, Esquire, who was first appointed to negotiate a peace with Tripoli, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 9, 1803.

My last to you was of August 22, 1802. It was then hoped that you would have been successfully engaged in making peace with Tripoli; for which the crisis was peculiarly favorable. The course of circumstances having deprived us of the advantages of this crisis, to which the tenor of your original instructions was adapted, the President has thought proper to review them with an eye to the change in the state of things under which, if peace be still unmade, the negotiations for it must now be carried on; and, considering that the Bashaw is no longer under the domestic distresses which at one time humbled his pretensions, that all the other nations at war with him have yielded to the customary terms of peace; and that the new terms which the concurrent policy of all civilized nations ought to force on those barbarians, would now be pursued by the United States, at very great expense, not only without the co-operation of a single other Power, but in opposition to the example of all, and at a period in different respects critical to their affairs, it is thought best that you should not be tied down to a refusal of presents, whether to be included in the peace, or to be made, from time to time, during its continuance; especially, as in the latter case, the title to the presents will be a motive to its continuance. You are accordingly authorized by the President to admit that the Bashaw shall receive, in the first instance, including the consular presents, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and at the rate afterwards of eight or ten thousand dollars a year. If these sums can be reduced, you will, of course, avail yourself of the opportunity. But no enlargement of them towards the example of other nations will be admissible; especially if, at the date of the negotiation, none of our citizens should be in captivity. The presents, whatever the amount or the purpose of them, (except the consular present, which, as usual, may consist of jewellery, cloth, &c.) and also the periodical payments, must be made in money, and not in stores. The periodical payments are to be biennial, rather than annual. And the arrangement of the presents is to form no part of the public treaty, if a private promise and understanding can be substituted.

Extract of a letter from the same to Tobias Lear, Esquire, who was afterwards charged with the same negotiation, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 6, 1804.

Commodore Barron has orders to provide, at a suitable time, for your joining him in order to the negotiating of a peace with Tripoli. This we hope may now be effected under the operations and auspices of the force in the hands of that officer, without any price or pecuniary compensation whatever. Should adverse events or circumstances, of which you can best judge, and which are not foreseen here, render the campaign abortive, and a pecuniary sacrifice preferable to a protraction of the war, you are authorized to agree, in the last instance, and in that only, to the terms of peace specified in my letter to Mr. Cathcart of the 9th April, 1803, with such modifications as may be convenient. Of the twenty thousand dollars permitted to be given as the first purchase and consular present, five thousand are to be retained until a consul for Tripoli, to be commissioned by the President, shall arrive. Should you be able to reduce the terms, as may be expected, you will retain a proportionate sum for this object. On peace being made, you have authority to place at Tripoli a temporary agent to attend to our affairs. For the ransom of the prisoners, if a ransom be unavoidable, you may stipulate a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars for each prisoner, including officers, but deducting from the number in the hands of the Bashaw those promised to Captain Dale, to be released in return for the release of some of the Bashaw's subjects who had been captured by him, and also as many as may be considered an equivalent for the captures of Captain Preble.

A desirable shape to give the ransom money would be an annuity payable in four or five instalments. This rate of ransom must not be yielded, however, without such a change in our affairs, by accident to the squadron, or by other Powers joining against us in the war, as is very unlikely to happen: and you will bear in mind, that the sum of five hundred dollars per man, connected with terms which were otherwise favorable, was the voluntary offer of the Bashaw to Captain Preble in the month of January, prior to the reverse which he has since experienced, and to his knowledge of the force now sent against him.

Of the co-operation of the elder brother of the Bashaw of Tripoli, we are still willing to avail ourselves, if the Commodore should judge that it may be useful; and to engage which, as well as to render it the more effectual, he has discretionary authority to grant him pecuniary or other subsidies, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars; but the less reliance is placed upon his aid, as the force under the orders of the Commodore is deemed sufficient for any exercise of coercion which the obstinacy of the Bashaw may demand. The power of negotiation is confided to you in the first instance, but, in case of accident, it is to devolve on the acting commodore of the squadron.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 20, 1805.

Upon reviewing the instructions transmitted to you dated 6th June last, nothing in the state and prospect of things which dictated them appears to be changed by subsequent events; unless, indeed, the possibility of any considerable sacrifices being necessary, should be considered as diminished by the spirited attacks made on the enemy by Commodore Preble, and the comparison which will naturally be made of their effect, with what may be expected from a repetition of them when the season opens, with equal animation on a much larger scale. Besides the force we have in the Mediterranean, the President has directed the following reinforcements, which will appear at the rendezvous, at or not long after your receipt of this communication, viz:

The frigate John Adams, with 32 guns, (all on board, but not mounted,) 600 men, will sail early in May.

Gunboats Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

No. 2 will have one long 32 pound cannon; No. 3, two long 24 do.; No. 4, two 32 do.; No. 5, two 32 do.; No. 6, two 32 do.; No. 7, two 32 do.; No. 8, two 32 do.; No. 9, two 32 do.; No. 10, two 32 do.

Each gunboat will have about 20 men on board, and will sail by the 1st of May.

Two bomb vessels, to be fitted out at Boston, with 13 inch mortars, and will probably sail about the 1st of June.

The Ceres, a provision ship, has lately sailed from Baltimore, with provisions and military stores for the squadron. The Ann, another provision ship, is now on the eve of sailing from Baltimore. She also has provisions and military stores on board for the squadron. A vessel from Washington will sail in all May, with spars, beef, bread, powder, &c. for the squadron.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to William Eaton, Esquire.

MAY 30, 1804.

SIR:

Herewith you will receive an appointment as navy agent for the several Barbary regencies.

You will receive instructions from, and obey the orders of, Commodore Barron; and will render to our squadron in the Mediterranean every assistance in your power.

As a compensation for your services, you will be allowed at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum, and the rations of a lieutenant in the navy of the United States.

I am respectfully, &c.

R. SMITH.

To all who shall see these presents—greeting:

Know ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in the zeal, fidelity, and abilities of William Eaton, I do hereby appoint him agent of the Navy Department of the United States of America, for the several Barbary regencies.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of the Navy Department of the United States of America, at the city of Washington, this 26th day of May, 1804.

R. SMITH, Secretary of the Navy.

Registered—CH. W. GOLDSBOROUGH, Chief clerk of the Navy Department.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Samuel Barron.

JUNE 6, 1804.

With respect to the ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, we have no objection to your availing yourself of his co-operation with you against Tripoli, if you shall, upon a full view of the subject, after your arrival upon the station, consider his co-operation expedient. The subject is committed entirely to your discretion. In such an event you will, it is believed, find Mr. Eaton extremely useful to you.

Col. Tobias Lear, our Consul General at Algiers, is invested by the President with full power and authority to negotiate a treaty of peace with the Bashaw of Tripoli, and also to adjust such terms of conciliation as may be found necessary with any of the other Barbary Powers. He is, therefore, to be conveyed by you to any of these regencies, as he may request of you, and you will cordially co-operate with him in all such measures as may be deemed the best calculated to effectuate a termination of the war with Tripoli, and to ensure a continuance of the friendship and respect of the other Barbary Powers.

Commodore Barron to Captain Hull.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1804.

SIR:

The state and condition of the Argus, under your command, requiring that she should go into port for the purpose of refitting, &c. I request you to proceed with all practicable expedition to Malta, or Syracuse, and there refit your vessel, which being completed, you will take on board two months' provisions and water, and proceed for the port of Alexandria, and if at that port or Smyrna you find any American vessels, you will give them convoy as far as Malta, and immediately after join the squadron off this place.

You will take under your care the ship St. Michael, intercepted by the squadron, in the attempt to enter the blockaded port of Tripoli. You will find Commodore Preble at Malta or Syracuse, with two other ships, captured in making the same attempt. You will receive his orders with respect to the disposition of the St. Michael, cause all her papers to be delivered to him, and furnish him with all the information you may be able to gain from her crew, &c. on your passage. You will inform the commanders of vessels you may find at Syracuse that I shall be off Tripoli."

Verbal orders of Commodore Barron to Captain Hull of the United States brig Argus, in presence of the undersigned, on board the President.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1804.

SIR:

The written orders I here hand you, to proceed to the port of Alexandria or Smyrna, for convoying to Malta any vessels you may find there, are intended to disguise the real object of your expedition, which is to proceed with Mr. Eaton to Alexandria, in search of Hamet Bashaw, the rival brother, and legitimate sovereign of the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli; and to convey him and his suite to Derne, or such other place on the coast as may be determined the most proper for co-operating, with the naval force under my command, against the common enemy; or, if more agreeable to him, to bring him to me before Tripoli.

Should Hamet Bashaw not be found at Alexandria, you have the discretion to proceed to any other place for him, where the safety of your ship can be, in your opinion, relied upon.

The Bashaw may be assured of the support of my squadron at Bengazi or Derne, where you are at liberty to put in, if required, and if it can be done without too great risk. And you may assure him also, that I will take the most effectual measures with the forces under my command, for co-operating with him against the usurper, his brother, and for re-establishing him in the regency of Tripoli. Arrangements to this effect are confided to the discretion with which Mr. Eaton is vested by the Government.

Attest: ISAAC HULL.
WILLIAM EATON.

Extract:—Mr. Eaton to Captain Hull.

GRAND CAIRO, January 8, 1805.—3 P. M.

Scarcely had my letter of this morning gone off by your courier express, when a letter from Hamet Bashaw came to hand, of which the following is a copy, by translation:

"Thanks be to him to whom gratitude is due. To our friend, and the very good friend of our highness, the American agent, Mr. Eaton.

"We have received your letter, and after having understood the contents, we gave thanks to God for having preserved your health. Know that I am ever the same as you knew me at Tunis; my friendship is constant and uniform: but you have been tardy. We must, however, make this delay subserve a good purpose.

"From the date of the present, I shall leave this for Behera, and shall there take quarters at the house of the Arab chief Abdelgiver el be Kourchi, where I propose to you to meet me. I have written to my subjects, and to my minister Mahmoud Kogea, and also the governor of police, Muhammed, son of Abdulrahmen, that they may treat with you; and whatever you conclude with them will be ratified by me. Your operations should be carried on by sea, and mine by land. And may God assist us to re-establish peace and harmony. The 28th Namadan, 1219.

"HAMET BASHAW, son of Ali Bashaw Caramalli."

The date of the Bashaw's letter corresponds with the 3d inst. The place of meeting about eight hours' march from Alexandria, so that he will probably arrive thither before we can with you.

Captain Bainbridge to George Davis, Esq. at Tunis.

TRIPOLI, January 27, 1805.

SIR:

I have been anxiously expecting to hear from you, and to receive some information on the determination of our Government. Not one word on that subject have I yet heard. I am anxiously expecting letters from Commodore Barron. I believe the Bashaw is very desirous of peace, and has great apprehensions of the intended attack; and was a negotiation to be attempted, I think it very probable that it would succeed, for the apprehension of the attack might have as great an effect as the attack itself; and should the attack prove unsuccessful, he will no doubt continue in demanding a considerable sum. As I am quite ignorant of the force that will be brought against this place, I cannot give any opinion of the probable effect it may have. We offer our most fervent prayers that the greatest success may attend it. I cannot say what the Bashaw's demand will be, but I believe he would take at this moment much less than what he demanded of Commodore Preble last August. Our funds are all exhausted, and bills on Tunis are at a great exchange against the drawer. Pray, have you heard of Eaton? In your next, which I anxiously expect soon, I shall receive a great deal of news, I hope. I assure you, was it not for our friend, Mr. Nissen, we should suffer considerably for necessaries in our close confinement; but he is a friend in need, of course, a friend indeed.

P. S. By the Danish consul. The Bashaw is now very attentive upon your transactions with his brother in Alexandria. A camp is going against Derne. Give me leave to tell you that I have found your plan with the Bashaw's brother very vast, and that you sacrifice your prisoners' lives here in case of success.

Extract:—William Eaton, Esq. to the Secretary of the Navy.

ALEXANDRIA, February 13, 1805.

The letters which have passed between Captain Hull and myself, copies of which are herewith annexed to a duplicate of that I had the honor to address you on the 13th December, convey a detail of our transactions since that date. The apprehensions then entertained of impediments on the part of the Mameluke Beys were just. The Bashaw separated himself from them with his suite, immediately on receiving my first letter from Cairo, and repaired to Fiaum, neutral province: but the evening of his departure thirty Arab chiefs were put in chains by the Mameluke Bey Osman Bey Berdici, to prevent their following him with their tribes. Of four copies of the viceroy's letter of amnesty, which I despatched by different conveyances, not one reached him. Three mattees, in disguise of Arabs, charged with one of them, entered the Mameluke camp, were arrested, the packet taken from them, and they sentenced to death. They intoxicated the sentinel, who was an European renegado, and escaped to Fiaum, by whom the Bashaw obtained the first information of that act of grace, and it was not till he joined me at Demanhour that he first saw the letter. This has delayed our measures and given us embarrassments. My three enterprising mattees are with me, but we have no returns from any of the other three couriers.

The Bashaw had already determined to take the desert of Liby to Derne, giving for his reason, which I think a sound one, that, by taking shipping and separating himself from the Arabs, they would lose all patience if not confidence also, and abandon his cause. He has consequently moved round the lake and will to-morrow take his station at Arabs Ton, thirty miles westward of the old port of Alexandria, where I am to join him with a detachment from the city, next Sunday, and proceed with him to Bomba, at the head of five hundred men, and there take post. Meantime Captain Hull repairs to the rendezvous for suitable reinforcements and supplies to secure an establishment at Derne and Bengazi. Those provinces in our possession will cut off from the enemy and turn into our own channel a source of provisions, and will open a free intercourse with the interior of the country. I have requested of the commodore, for this purpose, a hundred stand of arms with cartridges, and two brass field-pieces with trains and ammunition, and also a detachment of one hundred marines, if necessary, to lead a coup de main.

I calculate the whole expenditure of cash in this expedition, including expenses in Egypt, will amount to twenty thousand dollars. Further disbursements and supplies will be necessary to carry this plan into final effect. But to indemnify the United States, I have entered into a convention with Hamet Bashaw to pledge the tribute of Sweden, Denmark, and the Batavian republic; which convention I shall reduce to writing and forward by Captain Hull, if time permit; otherwise by the earliest occasion.

Day before yesterday, an envoy arrived in a ketch from Jussuf, Bashaw of Tripoli, to the Governor and admiral of this place, for the express purpose of prevailing on them to stop Hamet Bashaw from going out of the country. Intelligence of our having left Syracuse for this place, with a view of taking him away, was conveyed to the enemy by a resident at Malta, known by the name of Soluquet H. Conte Gallini. I do not know his real name. The agent made great promises, in the name of his master, to those Turkish commanders: but perceiving they seemed not to have full faith in his assurances he resorted to the sensibility of their compassion; said, "if Hamet Bashaw was permitted to return, Jussuf must fly the kingdom or lose his head. The subjects of Tripoli were getting weary of the war with these new infidels; they could not learn from their movements their intentions, and were attacked unaware: the Bashaw believed he could resist them upon his batteries; but if they made a descent with his brother, his people would all leave him." This statement comes from the private secretary of the Governor, who is secured in our interest, who heard the cause of Jussuf Bashaw argued before the Governor and admiral. I do not learn what effect it has taken, but if the client has not the means of touching a more sensible nerve than a Turk's pity, his case is forlorn. At any rate we are secure against his influence by the secure position we have taken. Except, therefore, some unforeseen accident thwart us, my next will be dated at Bengazi. The Arabs and Moors are universally with us, and, if we had the means of subsistence, we might march twenty or thirty thousand from the borders of Egypt, who from time to time have taken refuge here since the usurpation of Jussuf Bashaw.

Extract:—Mr. Eaton to Commodore Barron.

ALEXANDRIA, February 14, 1805.

I calculated to leave this on Sunday, and in two days after to proceed on our march with Hamet Bashaw to Bomba, by the desert, where it is hoped we shall meet reinforcements, and supplies sufficient to secure positions at Derne and Bengazi. This, we are of opinion, will require two additional small vessels and a bomb ketch. A gunboat also would be useful, if the navigation at this season should not be thought too hazardous. Two brass field-pieces, four pounders, with their trains and ammunition, and one hundred stand of arms, with carriages, will be requisite. And, to place the success of the expedition beyond the caprice of incident, one hundred marines, with bayonets, should be at hand to lead a coup de main, in case of necessity. By the time we shall have arrived at Bomba, I shall have disbursed about ten thousand dollars, which we have taken up on credit of Messrs. Briggs and Brothers, four thousand dollars of which sum Captain Hull has drawn bills on Malta and London: the balance we have promised shall be sent up in one of the small vessels. Ten thousand dollars more at least will be necessary to accomplish our views on Derne and Bengazi. The Bashaw assures me he will be able immediately to refund these sums when established in those provinces. And to indemnify the United States for all expenses, arising out of a co-operation with him, he pledges the tribute of Denmark, Sweden, and the Batavian republic, in case of recovering his throne, which may be calculated upon as a certain event, if measures to that effect are supported by suitable energy and address. He engages also to release to you, without ransom, Captain Bainbridge, his officers, and all American prisoners who may be in captivity at Tripoli; to stipulate with the United States a permanent peace, without tribute, and on the footing of the most favored nation. He engages that, in case of future war, captives shall be treated as prisoners, and not as slaves, and subject to reciprocal exchange. He will surrender the enemy and his family and chief admiral into our hands, in case he does not escape by flight, to be held as hostages. And he agrees to deliver up to you, if required, all vessels of war, which shall have been employed against the United States by Jussuf Bashaw.

In consideration of the friendly offices of His Majesty the King of the two Sicilies towards the squadron of the United States, Hamet Bashaw invites His Majesty to renew with him their ancient friendship, and proffers to him a peace on the same footing as that to be stipulated in his convention with the United States. If time and circumstances admit, we shall reduce this convention to writing, and forward copies by Captain Hull; otherwise it will be done at Bomba. At the invitation of the Bashaw and divan, and in conformity to the sentiments expressed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, I have taken on myself the command in chief of the Bashaw's army, and the direction of all operations by land, and I cannot but flatter myself we may realize success of our expectations on this coalition, and that you will have the glory of carrying the usurper a prisoner in your squadron to the United States, and of relieving our fellow citizens from the chains of slavery without the degrading condition of a ransom.

Captain William Bainbridge to Commodore Samuel Barron.

DEAR SIR: BARBARY, TRIPOLI, March 16, 1805.

I am acquainted that Sidi Muhammed Dghies, Minister of Foreign Affairs to his excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli, has written to you on a certain subject. The minister has been much indisposed for several months past with an inflammation in his eyes, and Dr. Ridgely, our surgeon, has done every thing for him in his power, without its having the desired effect. For the many obligations which myself and officers are under to the minister, I wish it may be agreeable to you to render him some aid through one of the surgeons of your squadron. Permit me to observe, that whatever Sidi Muhammed Dghies, or my worthy friend Nicholas C. Nissen, Esq. his Danish Majesty's consul in this place, writes to you on the subject, will, in my opinion, merit your attention; for from my knowledge of the friendly disposition of the minister, I have reason to believe that his assertions are founded on candor. It is unnecessary for me to say more, as you no doubt will fully comprehend me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR: This day Sidi Muhammed Dghies sent for me, and informed me in confidence that he had written to you recommending a person to come here to negotiate, and he requested me to write a letter nearly in the obscure manner that I have done, that, in case of discovery, it would not be intelligible, or would be foreign to the subject. I really believe that the minister is sincerely desirous for peace; for, exclusive of his pacific disposition, it is greatly his interest to have it; and was a person to come here and remain a few days, I have no doubt but that peace would be effected on the terms that Commodore Preble offered. At all events, it would have the happy effect of making the Bashaw's subjects clamorous, as they would then see that America had the disposition to make peace, and that the Bashaw was the cause of their not having it. The houses here are of stone and mud, and badly furnished; of course the damage in bombarding will not be as great as if it was otherwise. Permit me, my dear Barron, to make one observation, that is, to reduce the Bashaw to moderate terms I suppose is the object of our Government; and your expectation to release us from captivity without paying is, in my opinion, impossible without land forces, and I hope that our country will not think that it is the subject of peace they pay for, but for the liberty of their unfortunate citizens, fell captives in its service; and it may be assured that whatever is paid, no Tripolitan, from what they have experienced from the Americans, will consider one farthing of it as purchasing the friendship of Tripoli. In my letters of yesterday, I gave you some information about Mr. Beaussier. I candidly believe that any person might come here with the greatest safety, and you may be assured that an American will answer much better than any Frenchman or any other countryman. The minister has great influence with the Bashaw, and is doing all that he can to bring him to peace on moderate terms. I know that you will do me the justice to believe that all my representations are for the good of our cause.

Yours truly.

The Danish Consul to Commodore Barron.

TRIPOLI, March 18, 1805.

SIR:

The Bashaw's Minister Sidi Mahomet Dghies, personally desirous of a re-establishment of peace with the United States of America, and wishing to contribute whatever may be in his power to the conclusion of it, has requested me, sir, in his name to address you this letter.

Sidi Mahomet Dghies is convinced that you are informed of his endeavors in 1801 to prevent the declaration of war; he alone opposed the general opinion of the divan in this respect. The letters of Mr. Cathcart, late Consul for the United States, at Tripoli, to his Government, at that time will bear testimony of this fact.

The war having nevertheless been declared, nothing has since been omitted by Sidi Mahomet Dghies that could contribute to the conclusion of peace.

Sidi M. Dghies has personally too much interest in the undisturbed tranquillity and security of the trade of Tripoli, not to avail himself of every means that could be conducive to what has been his interest and constant desire. In this moment, he wishes to prevent further hostilities; the state of his health, his family, and his private concerns, are so many reasons for him to endeavor to persuade both parties to come to an agreement; he is certain that these are likewise your wishes, sir, and the intention of your Government. The situation, besides, of your unfortunate countrymen here, which Sidi M. Dghies has endeavored to alleviate as much as it has been in his power, is nevertheless such that they and their relations in America cannot but look upon it as an act of humanity to accelerate the conclusion of a peace that again can restore them to their country. Sidi M. Dghies is desirous of a peace, and he wishes that a negotiation should be renewed before the commencement of any direct hostilities against this place. His health, and particularly the state of his eyes, will oblige him to retire with his family in a short time to the country, and will not permit him again to return to town at any future overture, or negotiation of peace, and he is afraid that, being absent, he shall not be able so easily to suscitate in the mind of the Bashaw equal peaceful sentiments with his own. A negotiation entirely by letters is tedious and difficult; to negotiate by a person sent on shore from a ship of war, (and who returns again on board after a short stay, and maybe after a momentary interview with the Bashaw,) has many difficulties; and proves often more detrimental to a negotiation than productive of a peace. Sidi M. Dghies don't think it necessary to enlarge upon the difficulties that attend this way of negotiating and their cause; you cannot, sir, but be aware of them yourself; he proposes, therefore, as the most effectual manner of conducting a negotiation of peace, to send to Tripoli a person properly authorized and furnished with instructions. Whoever shall be sent can be assured of the most perfect inviolability. Should his and Sidi M. Dghies' earnest endeavors to re-establish peace prove successful, the business is thereby naturally brought to a happy conclusion; should it, however, unfortunately prove otherwise, the negotiator will have liberty to return free from molestation of any kind, and in what manner he may judge convenient.

You will please, sir, yourself to fix upon the securities you may require for the faithful observance of these conditions, in case you shall think proper to agree to these proposals, and whenever you in answer to this letter may request the admission of a negotiator.

After having, in this manner candidly and confidentially stated to you, sir, his mind, Sidi M. Dghies hopes to have precluded every suspicion of his peaceful intentions, and convinced you that every facility will be shown for a mutual satisfactory conclusion of peace; he don't believe it necessary to observe, that a sincere and lasting peace is at any time preferable even to a successful war; that war has many chances, and that often unforeseen accidents occasion losses, however prudent the measures were taken to assure success.

That Sidi Mahomet Dghies has requested me to write you, sir, in his name, this letter, and that the contents have been faithfully translated, I have no doubt but that you will readily give credit, but give me likewise leave to assure you, sir, that I, in case I did not myself believe the sentiments contained in this letter sincere, would have excused myself from putting them to paper, and in this persuasion I shall consider it as a very favorable circumstance for me, if I have been found any way instrumental to the means of bringing about a peace between the United States of America and the Bashaw of Tripoli, and of procuring the liberty of your unfortunate countrymen here; having the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

N. C. NISSEN,
His Danish Majesty's Consul for Tripoli in Barbary.

Captain Bainbridge to Commodore Barron.

BARBARY, TRIPOLI, March 22, 1805.

DEAR SIR:

I wrote you on the 16th instant respecting a certain subject; since then I have seen the letter alluded to in mine of that date, and I believe the sentiments contained in it merits the credit of veracity, and if experimented, I trust will be found satisfactory to you. If Commodore Preble did receive a letter last summer from a certain person here, he no doubt gave it to you, from which you can form some opinion of the present subject. I have not had the pleasure to hear from you since October last; am in daily expectation of it. The crew here are in great want of clothing.

Believe me to be, sir, with sincere esteem, &c.

Captain Bainbridge to Commodore Barron.

DEAR BARRON: MARCH 22.

In one of my letters of this month I have mentioned that I had heard that Sidi Muhammed Dghies, Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Bashaw, had requested Mr. Beaussier the French consul in this place, to inform Commodore Preble, that if a person would come here and remain a few days on shore, that peace would be effected for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This day the said minister in confidence told me that he did thus request Mr. Beaussier, but does not know if Commodore Preble received the information. I have not the least doubt, that was a person to come here to negotiate before an attack is made, that peace would be effected for one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and if the attack should not prove very successful, it is very probable that such a sum would not release us from captivity, at least for some time. Apprehension is often worse than realization. I sincerely hope that a person will come, because I think it the most favorable moment, and I candidly believe that any person might come with the greatest safety. It will be best, in my opinion, to ask for the guaranty of the Danish or French consul, and in that case I think it probable that they would give the Danish, which I should much prefer, as I know him to be a man of unquestionable intregrity; the other I have not the highest opinion of. The Danish consul has already gone very great lengths to serve us, and you may be assured that he can be trusted as a man of the strictest honor. His compliance with the minister's request to write to you is purely actuated by the desire to serve us.

Your sincere friend, &c.

Convention between the United States of America and His Highness Hamet Caramanly, Bashaw of Tripoli.

GOD IS INFINITE.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and perpetual peace and free intercourse between the Government of the United States of America and His Highness Hamet Caramanly Bashaw, the legitimate sovereign of the kingdom of Tripoli, and between the citizens of the one and the subjects of the other.

ART. 2. The Government of the United States shall use their utmost exertions, so far as comports with their own honor and interest, their subsisting treaties, and the acknowledged laws of nations, to re-establish the said Hamet Bashaw in the possession of his sovereignty of Tripoli, against the pretensions of Joseph Bashaw, who obtained said sovereignty by treason, and who now holds it by usurpation, and who is engaged in actual war against the United States.

ART. 3. The United States shall, as circumstances may require, in addition to the operations they are carrying on by sea, furnish the said Hamet Bashaw, on loan, supplies of cash, ammunition, and provisions, and if necessity require, debarkations of troops; also to aid and give effect to the operations of the said Hamet Bashaw, by land, against the common enemy.

ART. 4. In consideration of which friendly offices, once rendered effectual, His Highness Hamet Caramanly Bashaw engages, on his part, to release to the commander-in-chief of the forces of the United States, in the Mediterranean, without ransom, all American prisoners who are, or may hereafter be, in the hands of the usurper, said Joseph Bashaw.

ART. 5. In order to indemnify the United States against all expense they have or shall incur, in carrying into execution their engagements, expressed in the second and third articles of this convention, the said Hamet Bashaw transfers and consigns to the United States the tribute stipulated by the last treaties of His Majesty the King of Denmark, His Majesty the King of Sweden, and the Batavian republic, as the condition of peace with the regency of Tripoli, until such time as said expense shall be reimbursed.

ART. 6. In order to carry into full effect the stipulation expressed in the preceding article, said Hamet Bashaw pledges his faith and honor faithfully to observe and fulfil the treaties now subsisting between the regency of Tripoli and their Majesties the Kings of Denmark and Sweden, and with the Batavian republic.

ART. 7. In consideration of the friendly disposition of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies towards the American squadron, His Highness Hamet Bashaw invites His said Sicilian Majesty to renew their ancient friendship, and proffers him a peace on the footing of that to be definitively concluded with the United States of America, in the fullest extent of its privileges, according to the tenor of this convention.

ART. 8. The better to give effect to the operations to be carried on by land in the prosecution of the plan, and the attainment of the object pointed out by this convention, William Eaton, a citizen of the United States, now in Egypt, shall be recognised as general and commander-in-chief of the land forces which are or may be called into service against the common enemy; and His said Highness Hamet Bashaw engages that his own subjects shall respect and obey him as such.

ART. 9. His Highness, said Hamet Bashaw, grants full amnesty and perpetual oblivion towards the conduct of all such of his subjects as may have been seduced by the usurper to abandon his cause, and who are disposed to return to their proper allegiance.

ART. 10. In case of future war between the contracting parties, captives on each side shall be treated as prisoners of war, and not as slaves, and shall be entitled to reciprocal and equal exchange, man for man, and grade for grade; and in no case shall a ransom be demanded for prisoners of war, nor a tribute required, as the condition of peace, neither on the one part nor on the other. All prisoners on both sides shall be given up at the conclusion of peace.

ART. 11. The American consular flag in Tripoli shall for ever be a sacred asylum to all persons who shall desire to take refuge under it, except for the crimes of treason and murder.

ART. 12. In case of the faithful observance and fulfilment on the part of His Highness, said Hamet Bashaw, of the agreements and obligations herein stipulated, the said commander-in-chief of the American forces in the Mediterranean engages to leave said Hamet Bashaw in the peaceable possession of the city and regency of Tripoli, without dismantling its batteries.

ART. 13. Any article suitable to be introduced in a definitive treaty of peace between the contracting parties, which may not be comprised in this convention, shall be reciprocally on the footing of the treaties subsisting with the most favored nations.

ART. 14. This convention shall be submitted to the President of the United States for his ratification. In the mean time there shall be no suspense in its operations.

Done at Alexandria, in Egypt, February 23, 1805, and signed by said Hamet Bashaw, for himself and successors, and by William Eaton, on the part of the United States.

Additional article, secret.

His Highness Hamet Bashaw will use his utmost exertions to cause to surrender to the commander-in-chief of the American forces in the Mediterranean the usurper Joseph Bashaw, together with his family, and chief admiral called Maurad Rais, alias Peter Lisle, to be held by the Government of the United States as hostages, and as a guaranty of the faithful observance of the stipulations entered into by convention of the 23d February, 1805, with the United States, provided they do not escape by flight.

[TRANSLATION.]

Hamet, Ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, to Commodore Samuel Barron.

DEAR AND ESTEEMED:

I have to inform your excellency of my perfect health, and to express my sincere wishes for yours. I beg you to be assured of the high regard and consideration which I entertain for your excellency, and I hope that by the assistance of the Divine Being I shall shortly be at Tripoli, my city, to drive from thence my perfidious enemies.

I make known to you the arrival of Mr. William Eaton, my general di campo, and that we have agreed upon a plan of co-operations, which I have no doubt will lead to that success which we both desire. Said Mr. Eaton begged me to come to Syracuse, in order to confer with your excellency, and to form a personal acquaintance with you. I must inform you, my worthy and esteemed friend, that time does not allow me to cross the sea, and that I am too much occupied with my camp, consisting of infantry and cavalry, and would not leave them for the acquisition of the world. With the present, I send you my secretary of state, named Mahumed, as my proper representative, to treat in my stead, whom I beg you will receive, and I trust your ideas will be similar with regard to the object we have in view.

My dear friend, you must know that I am already on my march, with my camp, and I earnestly solicit you to send me as speedily as possible the following succors, of which I stand greatly in need, viz: powder, field artillery, muskets, money, and a few soldiers. These once arrived, we are agreed with Mr. Eaton on the plan explained in his letter; and further, as provisions of all kinds are very scarce in Barbary, I beg you will send some likewise. I hope that, in the course of about fifty days, we shall form a sytem of co-operation at Misurat. My dear friend, consider me in all things as your son, and that my kingdom shall be always as your own.

I salute you with cordial regard, and remain, &c.

[Seal of Hamet Bashaw.]

The Commander-in-chief of the squadron of the United States of America in the Mediterranean to the Illustrious Hamet Bashaw, &c.

EXCELLENCY: MALTA, March 22, 1805.

By the hands of your secretary Mahumed who arrived in safety at this place on board the brig Argus, I received your excellency's letter, which has been interpreted to me. I thank you, with sincerity, for your expressions of kindness and regard towards me, and am happy that your excellency remains in good health. With great satisfaction I have received from Mr. Eaton the intelligence of your junction with him, and of the measures you had adopted to commence your march towards Bomba. No sooner did I receive this intelligence, than I made every exertion to collect the succors required in your letter; and I now send you my faithful and worthy Captain Hull, with the Argus brig and a sloop under her convoy, loaded with provisions and stores. I have not been able to procure the field artillery you ask, at this place, but I despatched a frigate to Sicily, where I hope to obtain it. As soon as it arrives, no time will be lost in sending it on the coast. I hope Captain Hull will find your excellency and your army in safety and health, and that your measures so far may have been propitious to our cause.

I have written very fully to Mr. Eaton, to whom, and to Captain Hull, I refer your excellency for further information, and with my most ardent wishes for your individual prosperity, as well as the success of the enterprise in which you are engaged,

I have the honor to remain, &c.

SAMUEL BARRON.

Commodore Barron to William Eaton, Esq.

MALTA, March 22, 1805.

SIR:

By Captain Hull, who arrived in this harbor with the United States' brig Argus under his command, on the 10th instant, I received your favors addressed to me, together with communications for the Secretary of the Navy, and copies of the correspondence betwixt yourself and Captain Hull, relative to your proceedings from your arrival in Egypt until his departure from thence; also, by the hands of Mahumed, secretary, a letter from his excellency Hamet Bashaw, announcing his junction with you; all which I have perused with an attention and deliberation which the important and interesting nature of their contents demands. I cannot but applaud the energy and perseverance that has characterized your progress through a series of perplexing and discouraging difficulties, to the attainment of the object of your research, an attainment which I am disposed to consider as a fair presage of future success.

On receipt of these communications, by Captain Hull, I did not lose a moment in making the necessary arrangements for sending you succors, and I now despatch the Argus brig, with the Hornet sloop under her convoy, carrying a variety of stores and provisions, according to the accompanying list. Captain Hull will shape his course for Bomba direct, where he calculates on finding you, with the Bashaw and his army, and where he supposes you will make a stand. I have directed him to deliver these stores to you, to be applied as your discretion may direct. He has also under his charge a sum in specie, amounting to seven thousand dollars, which is likewise to be placed at your disposal. By the time these vessels establish a communication with you, you will have been enabled to form a correct opinion as to the prospect of ultimate success, and thence to estimate the advantages likely to result to our affairs from this co-operation, and by this opinion you must be guided in the application of the succors. Should you have encountered unexpected difficulties and obstacles, which places the chances of success upon more than precarious ground, your own prudence will suggest the propriety of not committing these supplies, and the money, uncontrolledly to the power of the Bashaw: indeed, in the point of view in which I regard the measures already pursued, as well as the subject of co-operation generally, I conceive we ought to tread with the utmost caution. It is far from my wish, sir, to damp your ardor, or that of your companions in arms, by laying too great a stress upon the cold maxims of prudence, whereby the tide of success is often lost; something, I am aware, should always be left to fortune in enterprises of this nature; but I must own there are certain things expressed in your despatches, which, when brought to the test of my instructions from home, give birth to feelings of doubt and uneasiness: these I deem it incumbent on me to point out to you with candor and explicitness, in order that we may be fully understood. You must be sensible, that, in giving their sanction to a co-operation with the exiled Bashaw, Government did not contemplate the measure as leading, necessarily and absolutely, to a reinstatement of that prince in his rights on the regency of Tripoli. They appear to have viewed the co-operation in question as a means which, if there existed energy and enterprise in the exile, and attachment to his person on the part of his former subjects, might be employed to the common furtherance and advantage of his claims and our cause, but without meaning to fetter themselves by any specific and definite attainment as an end, which the tenor of my instructions, and the limited sum appropriated for that special purpose, clearly demonstrate. I fear, by the convention you were about to enter into with Hamet, and by the complexion of other measures, that a wider range may have been taken than is consistent with the powers vested in me for that particular object. These apprehensions may, perhaps, prove groundless on further representations from you; but, under my present impressions, I feel it my duty to state explicitly, that I must withhold my sanction to any convention or agreement committing the United States, or tending to impress upon Hamet Bashaw a conviction that we have bound ourselves to place him upon the throne. The consequences involved in such an engagement cannot but strike you forcibly, and a general view of our situation, in relation to the reigning Bashaw and our unfortunate countrymen in Tripoli, will be sufficient to mark its inexpediency. I shall consider it my duty, as it is certainly my inclination, to afford you every aid compatible with the authority vested in me, and commensurate with the means which have been placed at my disposal, and you may rely on the most active and vigorous support from the squadron, as soon as the season and our arrangements will permit us to appear in force before the enemy's walls; but I wish you to understand that no guarantee or engagement to the exiled prince, whose cause, I must repeat, we are only favoring as an instrument to our advantage, and not as an end in itself, must be held to stand in the way of our acquiescence to any honorable and advantageous terms of accommodation which the reigning Bashaw may be induced to propose: such terms being once offered and accepted by the representative of Government appointed to treat of peace, our support to the ex-Bashaw must necessarily cease.

You will not, however, conceive that these considerations, important and necessary as they are, ought to induce us at once to abandon the benefits which the measures you have adopted seem to promise. I conceive a perseverance in these by no means incompatible with a total freedom from any trammels with respect to a definite object; which freedom I deem it all important to preserve, especially when I view the peculiar situation in which Captain Bainbridge and his fellow sufferers may be placed by this co-operation. If, by your energy and exertions, added to the supplies now sent forward, you succeed in getting possession of Derne and Bengazi, we may calculate, that, having received this impulse from our strength, the Bashaw will himself possess sufficient energy, courage, and talents, and, if accounts are correct, sufficient interest among the people, to move on with firm steps, and to conduct his friends and followers to the gates of Tripoli. Every support will, of course, be given to him by a systematic union of operations with the squadron, so as to enable him to get in the rear of the town; but should he be found deficient in those qualities, or that it appears we have been deceived in regard to the disposition of the inhabitants, he must be held as an unfit subject for further support or co-operation. I beg leave to mention to you, that, as we are short of officers, the services of all will be wanted on board the respective ships, as soon as we enter upon offensive measures. Should you conceive, however, that any serious disadvantage may result from withdrawing those with you, I have no objection to their remaining as volunteers; but it is impossible for me to comply with your requisition for one hundred marines to be sent to the coast. Such a step, in the present posture of affairs, far exceeds my powers; and, besides, as we are rather short of hands, I could not feel myself justifiable in detaching so considerable a force from the squadron. I have not been unmindful of your requisition for field artillery, which, I think with you, is essential, but here it was impossible to procure it; I therefore despatched, some days since, the Congress frigate to Messina, where I hope to obtain four field-pieces complete for service, and as soon as they arrive they will be sent to the coast, with the necessary ammunition. As I am still too unwell to write you with my own hand, I must refer you to Captain Hull, in whose judgment and discretion I have the fullest confidence, for information on several collateral points, and for my sentiments on others. In this letter I have endeavored to explain, as clearly as possible, what are my ideas with respect to the wishes and intentions of our Government, and what I feel to be the extent of my authority, relative to the co-operation with Hamet Bashaw. I reiterate my fixed resolution to afford you every support and assistance which are consistent with the powers and resources vested in me; adding, at the same time, my dissent from any guarantee, covenant, or engagement, by which the United States may stand committed, to place the exiled prince on the throne, or any condition which militates against the most perfect and uncontrolled power of choice and action, in concluding a pacification with Jussuf Bashaw, should he offer terms honorable and advantageous to our country.

I should be wanting in justice to you, sir, as well as to the officers who have shared thus far your toils and dangers, were I not to express my full reliance upon your courage, energy, and perseverance, as well as my ardent desire that your most sanguine expectations may be realized. The observations which I here convey to you are far from being intended to cool your zeal or discourage your expectations; but they are what I conceive it necessary to make, and drawn from me by the purest feeling of duty; and, as such, permit me to recommend them to your calm and candid consideration, and I request that you will make them the subject of conversation with Captain Hull, who is fully possessed of my sentiments.

Commodore Barron to Captain Hull.

MALTA, March 23, 1805.

SIR:

By the accompanying communications to Mr. Eaton and to His Excellency Hamet Bashaw, which are left open for your perusal, and the personal knowledge you possess of my sentiments and wishes, you will be enabled to form a correct, and to yourself satisfactory idea of the service on which you are destined, with the United States brig Argus, and sloop Hornet, (Lieutenant Evans,) under your command. Its execution must necessarily depend so much on a variety of events and circumstances which may happen, and it is probable have happened to Mr. Eaton and his coadjutors, and which we are totally unable to foresee or to estimate, that I feel the impracticability as well as the unsuitableness of tying you down with precise and positive instructions. Hence, you will perceive, sir, that your own judgment and discretion, in which allow me to assure you I entertain the highest confidence, will frequently be your sole directors. Agreeably to what we have agreed upon, you are directed to shape your course for Bomba or its vicinity, and endeavor to establish an immediate communication with the Bashaw's army. If they have succeeded in penetrating beyond Bomba, you will there obtain correct information of their movements, which, in all probability, will be towards Derne and Bengazi, whither you will of course follow with your vessels, unless you find contrary instructions from Mr. Eaton. Having opened an intercourse with that gentleman, you will ascertain correctly from him the posture of affairs and the prospect of success, and you will, if he require it, land and deliver to him the stores and cash under your charge, taking the necessary receipts and vouchers. As you will perceive, by my letter to Mr. Eaton, I have left the application of these succors, and consequently the responsibility wholly to him, which I conceive proper, as well on account of his having the chief direction of the land operations, as that by the time you arrive on the coast he will have it in his power to form a just estimate of the chances of success, and thence, how far it is safe and expedient to pursue the object. Should it be determined to persevere, you are authorized to afford him every support and assistance consistent with your means and situation. You will confer together, and obtain the most minute and circumstantial information as to his future plan, and his ideas and wishes with regard to naval co-operations. On the subject of your return, it is impossible for me to furnish you with precise orders, as it will depend altogether on the situation in which you may find matters on the coast, and the nature of the arrangements to be made with Mr. Eaton. You will be aware of my anxiety to hear from you. You will, therefore, despatch the sloop to this place or Syracuse, or return with the brig, as circumstances may direct.

In case of any unfortunate event having happened to Mr. Eaton and his companions, and you can obtain no satisfactory intelligence of them, it is left to you to act as you may think most advisable.

I remain, with sentiments of regard, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

SAMUEL BARRON, Commander-in-chief, &c.

Capt. ISAAC HULL, United States brig Argus.

From Commodore Barron to the Secretary of the Navy.

MALTA, April 6, 1805.

SIR:

Having, in my respects of yesterday, given a full account of the present disposal of the squadron under my command, and whatever had occurred of notice since my preceding despatches, I have now the honor to lay before you a sketch of Mr. Eaton's transactions in Egypt, and the measures which have been, in consequence thereof, adopted. The accompanying communications from that gentleman to the Navy Department, joined with copies of those addressed to me, and the collateral correspondence betwixt Captain Hull and him, to all which I beg leave to refer you minutely, will afford you a wide view of the subject, whilst it precludes the necessity of lengthy comments from me. You will there perceive the many and unforeseen difficulties which Mr. Eaton met with in finding the ex-Bashaw, who had joined the fortunes of the Mamelukes. You will be apprized of the situation in which matters stood at the departure of the Argus from Alexandria on the 19th of February, and the plan which he had chalked out to pursue the intended co-operation with Hamet. On receipt of these advices I made immediate arrangements to send such part of the succors, requested by the Bashaw and Mr. Eaton, as could be procured here, and as I considered myself authorized by my instructions to afford; and Captain Hull sailed again on the 26th ultimo, in the Argus, with the Hornet sloop, (the same which I mentioned having purchased,) under convoy, carrying a supply of money, provisions, &c. He directed his course for Bomba, (a place about sixty miles to the eastward of Derne) where, as you will collect from the papers enclosed, he confidently expected to open a communication with the Bashaw and his followers. Such, sir, is the present situation of the business.

I am well aware that you will feel an anxiety to know my opinion with regard to the probable success of this co-operation; but, until I have further intelligence and more data to go by, it were improper even to hazard a conjecture. In perusing the letters from Mr. Eaton, and weighing the nature and consequences of certain measures in his contemplation, I must own that I have felt some uneasiness, arising out of a fear that he has taken a wider scope in his engagements to the Bashaw than is compatible with the ideas and intentions of Government, or with the authority vested in me, as relates to the subject of co-operation. I have stated this apprehension in a communication to Mr. Eaton, in which I have also explained, in precise terms, my own ideas, and how far I conceived he might proceed without committing himself or the country. A copy of my letter will be found annexed. I feel confident that the sentiments there expressed, and the principles laid down, with respect to the plan in question, will meet your approbation.

From the concurring information, principally from persons well acquainted with the Bashaw, which I have recently received of his character and conduct, I confess that my hopes from a co-operation with him are less sanguine than they were. Perhaps, however, I may shortly have reason to raise my expectations to their former standard; but till something occurs to justify the belief that he possesses more courage, energy, and talent, than those who appear to know him well give him credit for, it would be reprehensible to flatter myself or the Government with prospects, which the result may disappoint. I am equally at a loss to calculate the effects of this co-operation upon the mind of the reigning Bashaw; a short time will throw light upon this interesting point. In the mean while I cannot conceal from you my candid opinion that, from the obstinacy hitherto evinced by Jussuf Bashaw, and the pertinacity of his character, not unmixed with bravery and other qualities belonging to a soldier, added to the natural advantages of his situation, the contest promises to be more arduous than was at first anticipated. Our co-operation with Hamet may, and in all probability will, induce him either to offer us terms at once; or, finding his dominions menaced and his life endangered, to put every thing to the hazard of war. In the latter case we may naturally conclude that his resistance will not only be obstinate, but desperate. I look with anxiety for the return of the vessel, which sailed a few days since for Tripoli, with supplies for the prisoners; she will, undoubtedly, bring important intelligence.

The ex-Bashaw's Secretary of State, whom you will find mentioned in Mr. Eaton's correspondence, returned in the Argus to join his master. He appeared to be a sensible, discreet old man; he brought me a letter from the Bashaw, a translation of which, with a copy of my answer, is attached to the accompanying papers.

Commodore Barron to William Eaton, Esq.

MALTA, April 15, 1805.

SIR:

I had the honor of addressing you very fully on the 22d ult. by Captain Hull; since when I have received no advices from the Barbary coast. It was not till the 12th instant that the Congress arrived here from Messina, with the field artillery, which Captain Decatur experienced considerable delay and difficulty in procuring. It was my intention to have sent that frigate to the coast; but, on making particular inquiry of a pilot well acquainted in that quarter, I find that the impracticability of approaching the shore with heavy vessels renders the communication extremely uncertain and difficult. I have, therefore, thought it prudent to waive my original intention, and to despatch the Nautilus schooner, whose light draught of water will enable her to approach the coast with greater safety and advantage. Captain Dent shapes his course for Bomba, where I calculate he will find you with the Bashaw and army, and where I hope he will have little difficulty in establishing an intercourse. He has on board his schooner two brass field-pieces, with trains, powder, shot, &c. complete, which he is directed to deliver to your possession. I hope they will reach you safe, and have no doubt but they will be found extremely serviceable in the progress of your operations. Nothing material has occurred since Captain Hull's departure. The harbor of Tripoli remains closely blockaded. The President frigate sailed this day to reinforce the vessels already on that station. Captain Dent is instructed, after delivering the artillery and stores, to return immediately to this port with despatches from you. You will readily imagine my anxiety to hear of your proceedings and prospects.

I am respectfully, &c.

S. BARRON.

Extract of a letter from William Eaton to Commodore Barron.

DERNE, April 29, 1806.

The information I have the honor to forward of this date, stating, in abstract, occurrences since my last, will not disappoint the expectations my calculations there may have formed. Certain periods of your letter of the 22d ult. require a distinct and separate answer. This I shall do with candor.

It was understood when Government came to a determination to try the effect of a co-operation with Hamet Bashaw against the enemy, that provision would be made adequate to the experiment; six field-pieces, a thousand stand of arms, with suitable ammunition, and eighty thousand dollars, were asked for by Hamet Bashaw, while yet in possession of this province, and gaining ground against the usurper. The Secretary of the Navy informed me that the arms, ammunition, and fifty thousand dollars, would be furnished, and they were to have been put on board at Hampton Roads, while the squadron were getting ready for sea. Information arrived of the Bashaw having been driven from his post, and retired to Egypt. In consequence of which it is to be presumed the supplies getting in readiness were withheld, as the success of the experiment then appeared very doubtful. The twenty thousand dollars, deposited with the Consul General at Algiers, to be applied to this service, cannot be supposed adequate to the purpose of bringing the Bashaw from his exile in Egypt, placing him in a situation to act against a rival, possessed of all the resources of his kingdom, and carrying his plan of operations into effect, whatever may have been the dispositions of the people towards him. The twenty thousand dollars, therefore, could have been meant only to assist the research of the Bashaw, and the revival of his affairs, in case our plan should be thought feasible. Hence, I think it is not presuming too far to conclude that the unlimited discretion vested in the Commander-in-chief, in regard to all the exigencies of the war, and particularly as it relates to the object in view, extends to every matter necessary to its accomplishment. The instructions to the Secretary of the Navy certainly cannot mean to tie him down to any limited applications.

The advantages calculated to result from the success of this measure have heretofore been stated, and thus far the experiment has not disappointed these calculations. We are in possession of the most valuable province of Tripoli; the high estimation the enemy places on this department of the kingdom is evidenced by the extraordinary efforts he has used to defend it, and by the menaces to which he has resorted to deter us from the operations here; his camp was only fourteen hours' march from the place, when we seized it by assault. I am this evening informed they are retrograding, and only regret we have not the means of pursuing them. The expenses already incurred in this expedition will amount to nearly thirty thousand dollars; for thirteen thousand of which we are indebted to Messrs. Briggs and Brothers of Alexandria; eleven thousand have been received through the hands of Captain Hull, including his advance and drafts in Egypt. I have disbursed nearly two thousand, and for the residue shall be indebted to individuals. This expense will not appear extravagant when it is considered that it covers all our expenditures in Egypt, where many sacrifices were necessary, to pass the barriers of Turkish jealousy and avidity, in getting the Bashaw through that country; of furnishing horses, tents, arms, and ammunition, preparatory to our entering the desert; of provisioning a thousand two hundred souls, and about two hundred horses, in that barren desert, upwards of forty days, a distance of nearly five hundred miles, and of caravans for transporting these provisions the whole distance from Alexandria, and also the unavoidable expenditures in presents to chiefs, and payments to troops, in order to gain the one and avail ourselves of the services of the other.

The situation in which it is known Hamet Bashaw was found in Upper Egypt, must of itself suggest the idea that he must be destitute of all means of moving a military expedition, except the attachment of his subjects. The possession of this province does not materially alter that situation. The general failure of the harvest, which the whole coast of Barbary experienced last season, together with the extraordinary tributes which Jussuf Bashaw has exacted to support the war, has rendered not only this, but every other part of Tripoli poor and oppressed, wholly destitute of contributing any thing very considerable to either of the rival brothers. This is a circumstance favorable to our measures, if we will go to the expense of profiting of it. No chief, whatever may be the attachment of his followers, can long support military operations without the means of subsisting and paying his troops. The observation is peculiarly applicable to the temper and circumstances of the Arabs of this country, who, in fact, form its real strength; who are poor, yet avaricious, and who, being accustomed to despotism, are generally indifferent about the name or person of their despot, provided he imposes no new burdens. Stronger proof of this cannot be brought than the difficulty Jussuf Bashaw's camp has found in recruiting in its progress from Tripoli. It left there long since with about two hundred men.

I have this morning intercepted six letters from that camp, dated only four days since, signed by the commander-in-chief, the Governor of Bengazi, and aid-de camp, addressed to the Governor of Derne, and to several chiefs or shieks, encouraging them to hope and perseverance, and stating that their delay has only been accasioned by expectations of receiving reinforcements from the Arab tribes. They have increased their number only three hundred, though they have passed through that part of the country nearest, and most nearly attached, to the enemy. Hamet Bashaw brought two thousand Arabs into the field on the 27th. This serves to show the weight of money with these people, and as a pretty good criterion of the balance of influence between the two Bashaws. With the aids contemplated by Government to have been furnished Hamet Bashaw when in the position he now holds, I have no doubt but he may proceed to the walls of Tripoli. But while I offer this opinion, I cannot conceal my apprehensions, grounded on experience, that when arrived there he could effect little, without more military talents and firmness than exists either in himself or the hordes of Arabs who attach themselves to him. They are exactly what Volney describes of the camps of the Egyptian Beys, rather a rabble than an army; and in our affair they have held safe positions to catch fugitives, until the doors of the enemy were opened for plunder, when they became at once brave and impetuous. If, therefore, the co-operation is to be pursued with him, and its direction is to be confided to me, it must be on conviction that detachments of regulars may be occasionally debarked from the squadron, or procured elsewhere, to aid and give effect to such operations as require energy. With the supplies asked for, provisions for our Christians, and with the firm front of one regular regiment, I believe it would not be presuming too far to engage, in conjunction with the squadron, to force the enemy to take refuge in a sanctuary. But I confess, sir, there is one discouraging circumstance resulting from the declared views in affording auxiliaries to Hamet Bashaw. These aids are to be withdrawn at any period when the enemy shall propose terms of peace, which may be accepted by the agent of Government on the spot. If Hamet Bashaw is to be used solely as an instrument to the attainment of an object exclusively to the advantage of the United States, without any consideration to his future existence, or well being, I cannot persuade myself that any bond of patriotism dictates to me the duty of having a chief agency, nor indeed any, in so extraordinary a sacrifice. Certainly the enemy will propose terms of peace with us the moment he entertains serious apprehensions from his brother. This may happen at any stage of the war most likely to rid him of so dangerous a rival, and not only Hamet Bashaw, but every one acting with him, must inevitably fall victims to our economy. If we proceed no further, it would seem incumbent on the honor of our Government, in the event of peace, at least to place Hamet Bashaw in a situation as eligible as that from which he has been drawn, out of the power of an incensed and vindictive enemy. Probably Jussuf Bashaw would agree to establish him in the Government of this province and Bengazi, and to restore to him his family. He may perhaps be made satisfied with such an accommodation, and the United States experience from it many of the advantages calculated to result from carrying the original plan into execution, and consistently with both our honor and interest. At all events, I am deeply impressed with the opinion, that the post we have secured here should not be abandoned, nor terms of peace precipitately embraced; indeed it were to be wished that the effect of the success of a co-operation might be tried. It would very probably be a death-blow to the Barbary system. Any accommodation savoring of relaxness would as probably be death to the navy, and a wound to the national honor. If it is determined either to proceed or hold a position here, further supplies of cash and provisions must immediately be sent to the coast.

From reasons which will suggest themselves from preceding observations, it would not be good policy in Hamet Bashaw to levy contributions during the contest with his brother, lest he should alienate his friends. On the contrary, he ought to be enabled to move with a liberal hand. Cash will do much with the inhabitants of this country: even those whom it will not engage to fight will by it be engaged not to fight; with it we can pass generally. But if here and there we find a walled town or a garrison impervious to its influence, cannon balls and bayonets come in as irresistible agents. The convention I have entered into with Hamet Bashaw may be useful in case he succeeds in getting repossession of his Government, otherwise it can do no mischief, even if ratified, as will appear by the precaution in the second article.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Samuel Barron to Tobias Lear, Esq.

MALTA, May 18, 1805.

The recent despatches from Mr. Eaton have been communicated to you. From their tenor, and the knowledge I have within a short time obtained of certain features in the character of Sidi Hamet Bashaw, I must candidly own that I have no longer the same expectations which I once entertained of the success of the co-operation with him. His want of energy and military talents, his total deprivation of means and resources, the great expense already incurred, and the large sum which would be required, according to Mr. Eaton's statement, for pursuing the object, a sum far exceeding both the resources placed at my disposal, and the powers vested in me by my instructions, compel me to relinquish the plan. Indeed, on mature reflection, I am of opinion that if the ex-Bashaw, having received this impulse from our strength, and being put into possession of Derne, the province where his interest is supposed to be the strongest, has not in himself sufficient energy, address, and courage, and cannot command sufficient means to move on with firm steps towards the usurper's residence, whilst we second his operations by sea, he must be considered no longer a fit subject for our support or co-operation. I am preparing to send provisions to the coast for the subsistence of the crews of the Argus brig and Nautilus schooner, which remain there at Mr. Eaton's request, and by the sloop Hornet, which conveys them, I shall send such instructions to that gentleman, and the officers with him, as further reflection and the nature of your determination on this letter may dictate. Whatever may be the final result of this co-operation, I cannot reject the belief, that it has had a powerful effect upon the reigning Bashaw; and it may be fairly presumed that the gallant conduct of our friends in the affair at Derne, and the capture of that place, will have their influence, and dispose him to moderate his pretensions, and to think seriously of peace. The complaining condition of some of the ships of our squadron is not among the least important considerations of the present moment; three of the frigates are in such a state as, in my opinion, and in that of the commanders, renders them unfit to encounter the severity of another winter's blockade without undergoing considerable repairs.

These facts and considerations, for the due appreciation of which you, sir, are fitted by your talents, and the length and particular line of your experience, seem to point out the present as auspicious beyond any former occasion, and indeed as the very moment for attempting a negotiation; especially when we combine with these reflections the certainty that our force, respectable as it is, is yet greatly exaggerated at Tripoli, and consider the effect which such a view of the enemy, added to the movements of his brother, must have on the mind of Jussuf Bashaw. Strongly persuaded that your conclusions upon these points have anticipated my own, I am induced to state to you my earnest wish that you may deem it expedient to meet the overture lately made through the Spanish consul, by his excellency, so far as to found on it the commencement of a negotiation. I cannot entirely suppress another motive, which I confess weighs painfully on my mind. I trust I feel as becomes an American, and that I know what an American ought to suffer, when the interest and honor of his country call on his fortitude. Were I deficient in these respects, or misled by unreflecting compassion, I am well assured that Captain Bainbridge and his unfortunate comrades would be first in deprecating this deficiency. But I know the value of such a man as Captain Bainbridge and his officers, and I am persuaded that I speak the language of our country, when I declare that, as they lost their liberty in her defence and her service, no reasonable and honorable occasion should be neglected which affords a prospect of releasing them from the bondage of a bigoted and unfeeling tyrant.

In communicating these sentiments, you, sir, will do me the justice to believe that I discard every idea of any real point of national honor or advantage being sacrificed to the attainment of their emancipation, weighing that honor and advantage by the practice of powerful nations; but I must contend that the liberty, and perhaps the lives, of so many valuable and estimable Americans ought not to be sacrificed to points of honor taken in the abstract. Should the event justify my hopes and expectations of your coincidence with me on this interesting subject, and you determine on going to Tripoli, Captain Barron, commanding the Essex frigate, who is under sailing orders for the blockade, will be instructed to wait your arrangements, and convey you thither.

I beg leave to add my assurances, that, in case you determine on this step, sanguine as my expectations will be of the issue, I shall not relax in the smallest degree from hostile preparations, well aware that the best assistant which an able negotiation can have is an energetic display of force and means at the very moment, as if peace were despaired of.

Tobias Lear to Commodore Samuel Barron.

I had the honor last evening to receive your letter of yesterday, on the subject of opening a negotiation with the Bashaw of Tripoli. Most sincerely do I lament the long and severe illness you have suffered, and under the effects of which you still labor; and I am fully persuaded that no consideration would lead you to relinquish the command vested in you by the Government of our country, but a thorough conviction that your retaining it, when unable to perform the duties inseparable from the station, would be injurious to the cause in which we are engaged; and I am also persuaded that when such conviction arises, all personal considerations will yield to your patriotism. I have maturely considered the several points mentioned in your letter, relative to a negotiation with the Bashaw of Tripoli; and, upon a view of my instructions from the Government of the United States on that subject, I conceive it my duty to endeavor to open and bring to a happy issue a negotiation for peace, consistent with the tenor of these instructions, whenever the commander of our naval force in this sea shall judge that the occasion is proper and favorable. As it is presumed that the Bashaw will be impressed by the aspect or operations of that force, and as this is in your opinion a proper occasion, I shall hold myself in readiness to proceed in a few days on that business, with Captain Barron, in the United States' frigate Essex, which you are so good as to say will wait my arrangements.

I presume, as Captain Rodgers, who is your second in command, and who will, of course, take the command of the squadron, if your health, as you apprehend, should compel you to relinquish it, is now off Tripoli, and may be possessed of some information relative to our affairs with that regency, which has not reached you, that he will be fully advised of the motives which have induced this measure, and instructed to give it all the facility which his judgment may suggest.

Although I cannot, sir, agree with you in opinion, that any impression favorable to us has been made on the mind of the Bashaw, from our co-operation with his brother, thus far, excepting what may arise from the undaunted bravery and perseverance of the force of our countrymen at Derne, which will be to him a further proof of what we can do alone against him; yet I am of opinion, that, as he has discovered a disposition to open a negotiation, we should embrace it, to see if such terms can be made as are admissible on our part, and to release our unfortunate countrymen out of his power, whose fate ought not to depend on small punctilios.

Commodore Barron to Captain Hull, of the Argus.

MALTA, May 19, 1805.

Your several communications were received by the Hornet, which did not arrive here until the 16th, having met with head winds and heavy gales.

Your various information is under my particular attention. The state of my health, and my anxiety to despatch the sloop without loss of time, does not allow me to enter into lengthy observations. Nor is it, indeed, necessary. The letter I have written to Mr. Eaton, by this conveyance, and which he will communicate to you, will, no doubt, determine him and the officers to leave the coast, as a measure rendered necessary by existing circumstances, and especially by the intention of the Consul General to open a negotiation with Jussuf, reigning Bashaw of Tripoli. You will, therefore, as soon as the requisite arrangements are made, return with the vessels under your command to Syracuse, to which place it is contemplated to transfer head-quarters in the course of a few days. Lieutenant Evans is instructed to deliver the stores, which have been laden in the sloop, to you, to be distributed according to your discretion. You will understand those stores are intended for the use of the crews of the United States' vessels, and the christians under the command of Mr. Eaton.

Nothing material has occurred in our affairs since your departure. Mr. Evans will be able to inform you of every thing worthy of notice. I have, likewise, sent with Mr. Evans two thousand dollars (Spanish) in specie, which will serve to extinguish any individual engagements that you or Mr. Eaton may have contracted at Derne.

I look anxiously for further intelligence from Derne.

Commodore Barron to William Eaton, Esquire.

MALTA, May 19, 1805.

SIR:

By the Hornet sloop, which arrived in this harbor on the 16th instant, (having had a tedious passage,) I had the honor of receiving your despatches of 29th ultimo and 1st instant, announcing the capture of Derne, after a contest, in which, permit me to observe, that your conduct, and that of your companions in arms, will not discredit the character which our countrymen have established among the nations of Barbary. I have perused, with deserved attention, the arguments and reasons adduced in your letter of the 1st, on the subject of pursuing the co-operation with Sidi Hamet Bashaw. Being myself too weak for the exertion of letter writing, and my secretary writing with difficulty, owing to an inflammation in his eyes, it is impossible for me to enter into a lengthy reply; nor does it, indeed, appear necessary. The business is now arrived at that point, where, if the ex-Bashaw, after being put in possession of Derne, his former Government, and the district in which his interest is most powerful, has not in himself energy and talent, and is so destitute of means and resources, as not to be able to move on with successful progress, seconded by our naval force acting on the coast, he must be held as unworthy of further support, and the co-operation as a measure too expensive and burdensome, and too little pregnant with hope or advantage, to justify its further prosecution; for whatever, sir, may have been once the intentions of Government on this subject, and whatever your ideas touching those intentions, I feel that I have already gone to the full extent of my authority. The instructions from the Navy Department on this particular point, with which you are not unacquainted, fall short of that unlimited discretion and power of application as relates to funds, insisted on in your letter, and are totally silent in regard to the quantity and description of supplies and stores which you mention to have been in the contemplation of Government to furnish to the Bashaw; hence you will be sensible, that, without taking a latitude that would involve me in a sum of responsibility, which it were the extreme of folly and rashness to encounter, I cannot proceed further. Independent of this consideration, it may not be improper to state, that I have not at my disposal funds sufficient to meet the large sums which, according to your calculation, would be required to pursue the plan with effect. With respect to any engagements to Sidi Hamet, I cannot consider them as binding or definite. We have, by our resources, and your valor and enterprise, placed him at the post from which he was driven, when first he solicited the aid and support of our arms, and in the "most valuable province of Tripoli:" in performing which we have, I conceive, fulfilled every pledge, and that he can neither charge us with bad faith in our engagements, or with injustice to himself. His want of those qualities so essential in the character of a commander, and especially to a prince contending for his throne, is a serious obstacle to the advancement of his cause, not to be surmounted even by the existence, and manly exertion, of them, in those about his person. But it is what we had no reason to anticipate, and still less to suppose, that, when master of the finest province in his kingdom, where his influence is greatest, and his adherents most numerous, his situation would not be materially altered, and himself as destitute of means to carry on the contest as when he was brought from his exile in Egypt. In short, sir, the matter reduces itself to this: we are willing and ready to support the Bashaw, by a union of operations on the coast, so long as the war with Tripoli continues; but you will state explicitly to his excellency, that our supplies of money, arms, and provisions, are at an end, and that he must now depend on his own resources and exertions. This determination will suggest to you and your comrades that line of conduct most prudent to be adopted in the present posture of affairs. I have lost no time in despatching the Hornet with a supply of provisions for the crews of the Argus and Nautilus, and the Christians under your command; and I hope she will arrive in time to prevent your suffering from want.

I have now to acquaint you with an occurrence in our affairs, interesting in itself, and momentous as relates to your situation. In consequence of recent advices from Tripoli, I have thought it my duty to state to the Consul General, Colonel Lear, (now at this place,) my candid opinion that the present is a moment highly favorable to treat for peace; and a communication has, this moment, been handed me from that gentleman, expressing his determination to meet the overture lately made by the reigning Bashaw, so far as to found on it the commencement of a negotiation, and to proceed to Tripoli, in the Essex frigate, in the course of this week. From a variety of concurring circumstances, the present appears to be a period propitious to such a step, and I cannot help indulging sanguine hopes that a very short time will restore Captain Bainbridge and his unfortunate companions to freedom and their country. It would be useless in me to say any thing on the effect which this measure must needs have on your situation and determinations; it is a measure which was anticipated in my letter to you by Captain Hull; and, as such, the intelligence of it will not, I presume, reach you unprepared. The interests of Sidi Hamet will not be overlooked. It is with Colonel Lear's express sanction that I state to you his intention to endeavor at stipulating some conditions for the unfortunate exile, provided this can be done without any considerable sacrifice of national advantage on our part, and without giving up points that are essential.

I have sent, by Lieutenant Evans, two thousand Spanish dollars, which he is directed to deliver to you or Captain Hull. This sum will serve to extinguish any little engagements you may have contracted at Derne.

I am extremely anxious for further intelligence from you, and remain, with much respect, &c.

S. BARRON.

Commodore Samuel Barron to Colonel Tobias Lear, Consul General, &c. &c.

MALTA, May 22, 1805.

SIR:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor of addressing to me on the 19th instant, stating your intention of going to Tripoli in the Essex frigate, for the purpose of opening a negotiation with the Bashaw.

I have now to acquaint you, that, for the reasons mentioned in my communication of the 18th, which every day's experience fatally strengthens, I have conceived it a duty owing to our country, as well as an act of justice to the squadron, to relinquish a station, which the languor of sickness, and consequent mental as well as bodily inactivity, prevent me from filling any longer with approbation to myself or with advantage to the service. I have accordingly written by the Essex to Captain John Rodgers, the officer next in seniority, (now off Tripoli, in the Constitution,) officially resigning to him the command of the naval forces of the United States in this sea; and I have at the same time, expressed my ardent desire that he should give every facility to the important measure which has been agreed upon, and support the negotiation with all his zeal and activity. I beg leave to mention that the Essex is completely ready for sea. Captain Rodgers has now been fifty days on the station, and I feel the importance of his being made acquainted with my determination without delay.

I have sent orders to Captain Campbell to despatch the Vixen to the station off Tripoli, with intelligence of the situation of affairs with Tunis, and have every reason to believe, that they will reach him before the brig leaves the bay.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SAMUEL BARRON.

Commodore Samuel Barron to Captain John Rodgers.

MALTA, May 22, 1805.

SIR:

Since I had the pleasure of writing to you by the President frigate, I have not received any intelligence from the Barbary coast. Captain James Barron, commanding the Essex, has received orders to proceed off Tripoli, for the purpose of conveying the Consul General, who will communicate to you his intentions, which will be further explained by the accompanying copies of my late correspondence with him.

Although I have never disguised from myself that my powers of attention have been weakened by the effects of my long and distressful indisposition, almost equally with my strength and bodily activity, I have nevertheless been drawn on from week to week by the hopes of a speedy recovery, hopes which the unsteady character of the disorder itself rendered plausible, and which I was even authorized to cherish by the corresponding opinions of my medical attendants, gentlemen of high and merited rank in their profession, connected with me no further than as my situation requires their assistance, and only so long as my residence in Malta gives them the opportunity of affording it, and who, therefore, could have no interest in inspiring groundless expectations, with no other possible effect than that of exasperating the final disappointment. But, sir, though I feel myself perfectly justified in forming these hopes of recovery, I am sensible that the moment is arrived when I can no longer persevere justifiably in acting upon them; the season for decisive measures has overtaken me, and I am at length forced to perceive, that my unceasing and anxious impatience for a return of health, from the deep wish of discharging the important functions entrusted to me, has continually retarded that return, and that this inevitable solicitude which, whilst I retain the command, it is impossible that any state of health should obliterate or even suspend, must not only defeat its own immediate object, but greatly diminish and perhaps preclude the probability of my serving my country at any future time. To relinquish my command, therefore, is, I conceive, a duty which I owe to our country and to the service in general, but more particularly to the present squadron; an act of justice which the skill, courage, and general merit of the officers, and the order and discipline of the crews, at once enforce and imbitter; for you, sir, need not be informed that this decision could not be made without a long and painful struggle, as well as deep deliberation; but it is made, and accordingly I do hereby resign the command of the naval forces of the United States in these seas, and by this letter communicate my resignation officially to you, on whom the command devolves by the law of seniority, reserving to myself, however, the right of resuming it in case the war should be protracted beyond my hopes and expectations, and my health be fully restored. I have only to add on this point, that the pain inseparable from this act of duty is greatly alleviated by two reflections: first, that in having you, sir, as my senior captain, I am enabled to resign my station to an officer who already in a high degree enjoys the confidence of our Government; and secondly, that, previous to my resignation, the Consul General has expressed his coincidence with the opinion which I officially communicated to him, respecting the propriety and policy of meeting the recent overtures of the Bashaw of Tripoli, so far as to open a negotiation, for which I am persuaded that the present moment is eminently favorable, and of the success of which I entertain sanguine expectations, conducted, as it will be by a gentleman of such ability, experience, and moderation, as Colonel Lear, with the ready assistance and co-operation which I doubt not he will find in your activity and zeal. I cannot suppress the feeling, that, if any thing could restore me to health, as by a charm, it would be the sight of Captain Bainbridge and his fellow sufferers restored at length to freedom, on terms of peace at once honorable and advantageous to our common country; such terms, on which, I am convinced, notwithstanding all their privations and sufferings, they would alone desire their emancipation, or look back with pleasure on its attainment. Should, however, these hopes be baffled by the extravagance and infatuation of the enemy, I can only express my earnest wish, that the valor and exertions of the squadron may soon create another opportunity, and that to their honor they may succeed in inspiring additional respect for the American name, and a pacific policy in the whole of the Barbary Government; thus realizing an object which must be deep in the hearts of our countrymen, and for the accomplishment of which I should have considered no personal sacrifice too important.

I beg leave to refer you to Captain Barron for full particulars of occurrences since your departure, and for the present distribution of the squadron, and I beg leave also to assure you that my anticipation of the success of Colonel Lear's visit to Tripoli will not diminish, in the smallest degree, the preparations for offensive measures, and that, as far as my strength will permit, I shall proceed with every necessary arrangement till we meet. It is not in my power, at this moment, to transmit you all the papers and documents, the transfers of which become requisite by my resignation. I have, however, directed my secretary to prepare them, and they will be delivered to you on your arrival here.

With my sincere wishes for your health and prosperity, I have the honor to subscribe myself, sir, your very faithful and obedient servant,

SAMUEL BARRON.

Extract of a letter from Robert Dennison, Secretary to the Commander of the Mediterranean squadron, to the Secretary of the Navy.

MALTA, May 22, 1805.

It appears, by a variety of letters which have been received, that the Bashaw is seriously disposed and earnestly desirous for peace with the United States; and what confirms this idea, beyond all doubt, is the receipt, by Colonel Lear, of a letter, written at the express solicitation of the Bey, by the Spanish consul, with overtures for opening a negotiation, and accompanying a teschera, or passport, under the Bey's seal, guarantying the inviolability of any person or persons sent to Tripoli to treat of peace. These direct evidences of a pacific disposition in the Bashaw were a few days ago prefaced by a communication to Commodore Barron from Mr. Nissen, the Danish consul, written at the desire of the minister Sidi Mahomet Dghies, expressing the minister's sincere and earnest wish for the re-establishment of peace, and recommending that a person should be sent over immediately to commence a negotiation. In consequence of these repeated and unequivocal manifestations of a disposition, on the part of the enemy, to accommodate differences, the commander-in-chief thought it his duty officially to communicate to the Consul General his opinion, that the present moment is favorable for opening a negotiation; and the latter having expressed his coincidence therewith, the measure has been agreed upon, and Colonel Lear is making arrangements to proceed on board the Essex frigate to the coast of Tripoli in the course of two or three days. Commodore Barron entertains the most sanguine hopes of the happy issue of this measure, and anticipates, with not less confidence than pleasure, the speedy emancipation of Captain Bainbridge and his suffering companions. I think it is not hazarding too much to say, there is scarcely a doubt but the business will be honorably and satisfactorily terminated in less than a fortnight.

Third article of the preliminary articles of a treaty of peace to be entered into between the President and citizens of the United States of America on one part, and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of Tripoli, in Barbary, on the other part.

Upon the conclusion of a peace, as aforesaid, between the United States and the regency of Tripoli, all the forces of the United States which have been, and may be, in hostility against the Bashaw of Tripoli, in the province of Derne, or elsewhere, within the dominions of the said Bashaw, shall be withdrawn therefrom, and no supplies shall be given by, or in behalf of, the said United States, during the continuance of the peace aforesaid, to any of the subjects of the said Bashaw who may be in hostility against him in any part of his dominions; and the Americans will use all means in their power to persuade the brother of the said Bashaw, who is co-operated with them at Derne, &c. to withdraw from the territory of the said Bashaw of Tripoli, but they will not use any force or improper means to effect that object; and in case he should withdraw himself, as aforesaid, the Bashaw engages to deliver up to him his wife and children, now in his power.

TOBIAS LEAR,

Commissioner in behalf of the United States for negotiating a peace with His Excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli.

Mr. Lear to Mr. Ridgely.

TRIPOLI IN BARBARY, June 6, 1805.

SIR:

In conformity with the power vested in me by the Government of the United States to appoint an agent on their behalf, to take charge of their affairs in Tripoli, provided a peace should be concluded between the United States and the Bashaw of Tripoli, until the pleasure of the President of the United States should be known; and as peace is now happily concluded between the two nations, I find it incumbent upon me to carry into effect the authority vested in me, and as you have expressed your willingness to act as the agent of the United States in this regency, I have the honor herewith to transmit you a power for that purpose, and, at the same time, to express my satisfaction in your readiness to receive it; because, besides the qualifications which I believe you to possess to execute the duties of said agency with honor to yourself and country, I am persuaded that your residence here for nineteen months past, although mostly in a state of confinement, has offered an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the Government, customs, and manners of those people, which will be found essentially useful; and your profession will secure you an influence which cannot always be gained by a person brought up to other pursuits.

Although the salary to be paid to an agent is not specifically mentioned to me by my Government, I shall feel myself justified in saying it will be the same as that allowed to a consul, viz: two thousand dollars per year as salary; wages of the drogoman, stationary, and some other expenses of a public nature, as are necessarily attached to the office, and usually paid by other consuls in this place on account of their Governments.

You will receive herewith the treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and the Bashaw of Tripoli, in English and Arabic, and executed in due form on the fourth day of the present month. This treaty is considered as highly favorable to our country, and you will take care that it be duly observed. The circumstances under which it has been made gives us the least grounded reasons to believe that there will be no attempt on the part of the Bashaw or his subjects to violate it. Should this, however, unfortunately be the case, your firmness and good judgment will be a security against any evils arising from a sudden or violent departure from it.

In order that you may see the relation which the Consul of the United States residing here bears to the Consul General residing in Algiers, I take the liberty of quoting a part of the instructions given to me by the Secretary of State of the United States, under date of the 14th July, 1803:

"The regency of Algiers being of the most importance to the United States, considering its influence with those of Tunis and Tripoli, and our stipulations with that regency requiring the largest expenditures, are the reasons why the Consul General is established there. The relation of the consuls for those other regencies is, therefore, a subordinate one, and they will, consequently, be instructed to correspond regularly with you, as well as directly with the Department of State. In all cases of difficulty and urgency they are to ask and follow your opinion; especially when the state of our affairs may require immediate decision, and where the sacrifice to be made is either of an occasional and not a permanent nature, or of no very high value. They are to keep regular journals of their proceedings, including their pecuniary transactions, and transmit transcripts as often as may be to you. Of so strict a necessity is this latter duty, that they will be given to understand that no allowances for disbursements will be made them unless registered in their journals at the time, and transmitted both to you and this Department, with the very first despatches they may write to either after the expense is incurred."

Our Government had thought it expedient to change the Mediterranean passport heretofore given to our merchant vessels, and arrangements for this purpose have been made with the Emperor of Morocco, and the regencies of Algiers and Tunis. Until the first day of July next ensuing, either the new or old passport will be considered as valid for our merchant vessels, but after that period the new passport will be alone available. I have, therefore, furnished you with twenty tops or testa of both the old and new passports, one of each you will give to every cruiser sailing from Tripoli, before the first of July aforesaid; after which you will withdraw from them the tops of the old passports, and issue the new only. I leave with you also twenty-four forms of consular passports, which were put into my hands by Mr. Cathcart, our late consul here, to be given to the Tripolitan cruisers. These passports must be renewed at least once a year, and an endorsement made upon them by you every cruise which the Corsair may make within the year, noting any change which may take place in the captain's number of guns, &c.

Mr. Nissen, His Danish Majesty's consul here, will have the goodness to give you any information you may wish respecting the usual forms of consular business in this regency, and I am persuaded that his best advice would always be given on any points of business which might arise here relative to our affairs out of the usual routine of consular duties. But whenever such may occur, you will not fail to advise me thereof, by the first and most direct conveyance; and if any thing should happen which may threaten to involve the peace of our country with this regency, you will be pleased to despatch information thereof by a speedy cruiser, either by sea or land, as may be most likely to reach me soonest. To the Department of State you will also make full communications agreeable to the instructions which I have quoted for you in this letter, and in these communications you will be pleased to detail all the information you can obtain respecting the political relations and military forces of this regency, as well as particulars respecting the productions and commerce of the country.

I shall leave in your hands one thousand dollars on account of your salary, to be applied to any necessary expenses on account of the United States of America, and shall place a credit for you for one thousand dollars more on William Higgins, Esq. the navy agent of the United States in Malta.

Wishing you health and happiness, I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

TOBIAS LEAR.

JOHN RIDGELY, Esq.

Appointment of Mr. Ridgely, by Mr. Lear, as United States' Agent at Tripoli.

Whereas the undersigned, Tobias Lear, Consul General of the United States of America for the Regency of Algiers, being duly appointed commissioner by letters patent under the signature of the President, and seal of the United States of America, bearing date at the City of Washington, the 18th day of November, 1803, for negotiating and concluding a treaty of peace with the Bashaw of Tripoli; and whereas, the said undersigned was authorized by instructions from the Secretary of State of the said United States, bearing date the 6th of June, 1804, to appoint an agent to reside in Tripoli in behalf of the United States of America, until the pleasure of the President of the United States should be known thereon, whenever peace should be concluded as aforesaid.

Now know ye, that I, the undersigned, having concluded a peace between the United States of America and the Bashaw Bey and subjects of the Regency of Tripoli, have appointed, and do by these presents appoint, John Ridgely, of the State of Maryland, to reside in Tripoli as the agent of the United States of America, until the pleasure of the President of the United States shall be known as aforesaid; and do authorize and empower him to have and to hold the said agency, and to exercise and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and authorities to the same of right appertaining during the time aforesaid.

And I do hereby request all captains, masters, and commanders of ships, and other vessels, armed or unarmed, sailing under the flag of the said United States, as well as all other of their citizens, to acknowledge and consider him accordingly.

And I do hereby pray and request His Excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli to permit the said John Ridgely fully and peaceably to enjoy and exercise the said office, without giving or suffering to be given to him, any molestation or trouble; but, on the contrary, to afford him all proper countenance and assistance.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed my seal at Tripoli, in Barbary, this sixth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and five.

TOBIAS LEAR.

Extract:—Colonel Lear to William Eaton, Esq.

TRIPOLI, June 6, 1805.

In consequence of a representation made to me by Commodore Barron, that the present was a favorable moment for us to enter into a negotiation with the Bashaw of Tripoli, and my instructions leaving it to the commander of our forces in this sea to determine the proper time for such an attempt, I repaired off this place on the 26th ultimo, in the United States' frigate Essex, and immediately opened a communication with the Bashaw. His demands were two hundred thousand dollars for peace and ransom, and the delivery on our part of all the Tripolines in our possession, and a restoration of all their property. These terms were at once rejected in toto; and, after some discussion, I proposed, as the ultimatum, that a mutual delivery of prisoners should take place, and, as he had a balance of more than two hundred in his favor, I would give him sixty thousand dollars for them; but not a cent fo peace, which should be made on terms of the most favored nation with whom he has a treaty, and a regulation respecting prisoners, if a future war should take place between our nations; and in order to prevent any fruitless altercation, I declared I would not go on there to complete the business, unless these terms were formally acceded to. The weather proving bad for the season, obliged our vessels to keep off, and prevented a regular communication with the shore, which prevented the completion of the preliminaries until the 3d instant, when they were sent off to me with the Bashaw's seal. I immediately went on shore, and in twenty-four hours all the officers and crew of the late frigate Philadelphia were sent on board the ships.

I found that the heroic bravery of our few countrymen at Derne, and the idea that we had a large force and immense supplies at that place, had made a deep impression on the Bashaw. I kept up that idea, and endeavored from thence to make an arrangement favorable to his brother, who, although not found to be the man whom many had supposed, was yet entitled to some consideration from us. But I found that this was impracticable; and that if persisted in would drive him to measures which might prove fatal to our countrymen in his power. I, therefore, engaged, of course, that, on the conclusion of peace, we should withdraw all our forces and supplies from Derne, and other parts of his dominions; and the Bashaw engages, that if his brother withdraws himself quietly from his dominions, his wife and family should be restored to him. This is all that could be done; and, I have no doubt, the United States will, if deserving, place him in a situation as eligible as that in which he was found.

Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES' SHIP CONSTITUTION, MALTA, June 8, 1805.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you, that the preliminaries of peace were signed on the 3d instant, between Joseph, Bashaw of Tripoli, on behalf of himself and his subjects, and Tobias Lear, Esq. on behalf of the United States and Captain Bainbridge, officers, and crew, of the late frigate Philadelphia, liberated on the same day. The Bashaw feeling too sensible that, by a continuance of obstinacy, his town would fall a sacrifice to our forces this summer, proposed and acceded to peace on terms which left us no interest in a refusal of his wishes; as he acknowledged, that he felt sensible our efforts would be sufficient to reduce his town, and oblige him to retire to the mountains; this acknowledgment at once precluded the possibility of acquiring any honor by our arms, but, indeed, the reverse, as it would have been persecuting an enemy who, in anticipation of our vengeance, in this summer's expedition, by his own acknowledgments, felt himself more than half vanquished; and who, perhaps, in his savage perturbation, might have carried his resentment to the sacrifice of three hundred of our unfortunate countrymen, which chance had placed in his power. For your further information on this subject, I enclose you a copy of the preliminary articles.

I am only thirty-eight hours from Tripoli, where I left Colonel Lear, making the necessary arrangements for establishing Doctor Ridgely, late surgeon of the frigate Philadelphia, in charge of our affairs in that regency. The purport of my returning without Colonel Lear, is to carry the Tripoline prisoners, in our possession, back to Tripoli, and to make arrangements for going with the squadron to Tunis, to convince the Bey of that regency, (who, owing to our having detained and sent into Malta some of his vessels that were going to Tripoli, in open violation of the blockade, has shown a refractory disposition, and threatened us with war,) that his menaces are more the production of his ignorance and piratical inclinations, than any interest he can derive by a rupture with the United States. This will be a favorable moment to oblige this gentleman to relinquish his imprudent and unwarrantable demands against the United States; and, at the same time, to convince him, that it is as demonstratively his interest to cultivate our friendship, as it is ours to avoid a war. However, I feel sensible that he knows his own vulnerability too well ever willingly to give us decided cause to make him feel our resentment, by the exercise of such a force as we at present have in the Mediterranean.

The Ceres store ship from Baltimore arrived here thirteen days ago, but I did not receive your advices of the 9th and 27th of March, until the 3d instant, off Tripoli. Neither the John Adams, either of the gunboats, or the other store ship from Baltimore, has arrived yet.

Commodore Barron having resigned the command of the squadron no longer ago than the 22d ultimo, my being off Tripoli ever since, and the multiplicity of business I have at present on hand, prevents my writing you so fully as I could wish, particularly as I am at this moment getting under way for Syracuse, to take on board the prisoners to carry them to Tripoli.

I never thought, myself, that the lives of the American prisoners were in any danger.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN RODGERS.

To the Hon. ROBERT SMITH, Secretary of the Navy of the U. S., Washington.

ON BOARD THE U. S. FRIGATE CONSTITUTION, OFF DERNE, June 13, 1805.

SIR:

At six o'clock, P. M. of the 11th instant, Captain Campbell anchored in this road; at eight, sent Lieutenant Wederstrandt with your letter of the 6th, and Colonel Lear's of the 5th, announcing the conclusion of peace with Joseph, Bashaw of Tripoli, and, consequently, requiring me to evacuate this post; and the next morning, a letter from his own hand, advising me that his ship would receive my garrison. About 9 o'clock the captain came on shore, attended by a few of his officers, whom I accompanied into town. I now communicated to the Bashaw the news of peace on our part with his brother, and the convention that his family should be restored to him on condition of his quietly withdrawing himself from the kingdom. He said, he had no safety but in leaving the country with us; and even this would be impossible with him, and hazardous to us, if the project should transpire before carried into effect; despair would drive his adherents to revenge, and we must fall victims to it. I consequently kept up the idea of an attack on the enemy, an idea which had been excited by a report that reinforcements had come out in the frigate for this purpose; and, accordingly, sent ammunition and extra rations to be distributed among our Moorish and Arab troops, and despatched spies to ascertain the enemy's position. With the same apparent view, I inspected the garrison; ordered them to be divested of all heavy baggage, and to be held at their posts in readiness to advance at the word. At eight in the evening, I placed patroles of marines to stop intercourse between the town and our post: this was a usual precaution at this hour, with the only difference that, on ordinary occasions, this duty was done by routine. In the mean time, all the Constellation's boats were laid along side our wharf; I ordered the captain of cannoniers to embark his company with the field-pieces, and a ten inch howitzer, which fell into our hands on the 27th April; and after them the Greek company. This was executed with silence and alacrity, but with astonishment; the marines remained at their posts. When the boats were seen returning, I sent a messenger to the Bashaw, requesting an interview; understanding the purport of this message, he immediately repaired to the fort with his retinue, dismounted, and embarked in the boats. The marines followed with the American officers; when all were securely off, I stepped into a small boat I had retained for the purpose, and had just time to save my distance, when the shore, our camp, and the battery, were crowded with distracted soldiery and populace; some calling on the Bashaw, some on me, some uttering shrieks, some execrations. Finding we were out of reach, they fell upon our tents and horses, which were left standing; carried them off, and prepared themselves for flight. My garrison, together with the Bashaw and suite, were all on board the Constellation about two in the morning. Before break of day our Arabs were all off to the mountains, and with them such of the inabitants of the town as had means to fly, taking away with them every living animal fit for subsistence or burden, which belonged to the place. This morning a choux from Tripoli, who came out in the frigate, went on shore under a flag of truce, and carried letters of amnesty from Joseph Bashaw to the people of Derne, on condition of their returning to allegiance. He stated, on his return, that nothing but despair depicted itself in the visages of the few wretched inhabitants who remained; that they rejected Joseph Bashaw's terms of pardon, declaring they knew his perfidy too well to suffer themselves to be ensnared by it; and that they were resolved to defend themselves to the last moment, from their terraces, and walls of their houses, against his troops. It is to be hoped, the position they have taken may terminate in an accommodation, and save the tragedy that menaces them. It is now twelve o'clock, and we see no symptoms of the enemy's troops advancing towards the town. This, however, may be accounted for, on other principles than those of humanity or arrangement. On the arrival of the Constellation, the idea impressed itself on them also, that she brought troops and supplies; in consequence of which, they decamped disorderly, and retired with precipitation, to a post fifteen miles in the rear towards the desert; it is possible, they may not yet have heard of our evacuation. In a few minutes more we shall lose sight of the devoted city, which has experienced as strange a reverse in as short a time as ever was recorded in the disasters of war; thrown from proud success and elevated prospects into an abyss of hopeless wretchedness. Six hours ago, the enemy were seeking safety from them by flight; this moment, we drop them from ours into the hands of this enemy, for no other crime but too much confidence in us! The man whose fortunes we have accompanied thus far, experiences a reverse as striking; he falls from the most flattering prospects of a kingdom to beggary.

Our peace with Tripoli is certainly more favorable; and, considered separately, more honorable than any peace obtained by any Christian nation with a Barbary regency, at any period within a hundred years; but it might have been more favorable and more honorable. It now remains, however, to dispose of the instrument we have used in obtaining this peace in such a manner as to acquit our conscience and honor. This will require some diplomatic skill.

My despatches to Commodore Barron of the 15th ultimo, and continued to the 11th instant, accompanying this to your address, is a matter rendered proper by the transfer of the squadron to your command; under actual circumstances they can be of little import, but may, nevertheless, gratify a curiosity.

The duties understood to be annexed to my appointment in the Navy Department having ceased with the war, I have no reasons for remaining any longer in this sea; I request, therefore, you will have the goodness to allow me a passage in the first ship of war, of your squadron, which you may despatch to the United States.

I flatter myself with the gratification of waiting on you at Syracuse in a few days.

In the mean time, I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM EATON.

JOHN RODGERS, Esq. &c. &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Copy of a letter from Hamet Bashaw Caramalli to his friend and brother William Eaton, late General and Commander-in-chief of our allied forces in our Kingdom of Tripoli.

"Without placing in view the misfortunes which so long pursued me, I cannot forbear expressing to you, at this moment of our final separation, the deep sense of gratitude I feel for your generous and manly exertions in my behalf. Be assured, that in whatever situation the will of God shall place me, I shall always bear this impression of gratitude on my heart.

On returning to your happy country, to which I wish you a safe passage, I request you will express to your sovereign my cordial thanks for his manifestations of friendship towards me. Had it been ordained, that measures might have been carried forward to the attainment of my wishes, the restoration of my rightful dominions to me, it would certainly have been cause of eternal gratitude. But it is true my own means were small. I know, indeed, they did not answer your reasonable expectations. And this, I am ready to admit, is a good reason why you should not choose to persevere in an enterprize hazardous in itself, and perhaps doubtful in its issue. I ought, therefore, to say, that I am satisfied with all your nation has done concerning me. I submit to the will of God; and thank the King of America, and all his servants, for their kind dispositions towards me. Situated as I am, you must still allow me to ask another expression of your friendship. You tell me that in your treaty with Jussuff Bashaw, my perfidious brother, he has promised to restore to me my family. I pray you will use your influence with your admiral, to permit one of your vessels to go and ask for them, and that he will give me the means of repairing, with some small assistance to enable me to subsist myself and suite, into some country where I may hope to spend the residue of my days in peace.

Again I repeat to you my love and esteem, and I send honor and long life to your sovereign, which may the merciful God confirm to him.

Done at Syracuse, the 29th day of June, 1805. [Hamet's seal.]

William Eaton to Commodore Rodgers.

SYRACUSE, June 30, 1805.

I have been yesterday and to-day occupied with the proceedings and records of the court of inquiry on Captain Bainbridge, which is the reason I did not wait on you on board yesterday morning.

Enclosed is a copy, by translation, of a letter Hamet Bashaw has written me, dated 29th. This I think is enough to do away any insinuations concerning our intercourse with this prince injurious to the honor of the United States. He tells me he shall write to the same effect to the President.

To-morrow morning I will do myself the honor to wait on you with a statement of the pay due the troops, who served with me through the desert of Derne.

Mr. Lear to the Secretary of State.

ON BOARD THE UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,

SYRACUSE HARBOR, July 5, 1805.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of addressing you under date of the third of November, I have thought it my duty to remain in the vicinity of Tripoli, that I might be at hand for entering into a negotiation with the Bashaw whenever he should give evidence of his disposition to do so on proper terms; and I accordingly took up my residence in Malta, being well assured that nothing would occur to make my presence necessary at Algiers during the winter, and knowing that the Dey was perfectly satisfied as to the cause of my extended absence from his dominions.

On the 28th of December, I received a letter from Don Gerardo Joseph De Tauza, the Spanish consul at Tripoli, stating that, on the 17th of December, he had a private audience with the Bashaw of Tripoli, on the business of his nation; which being over, the Bashaw introduced the subject of this war with the United States, and expressed his willingness to conclude it, if the Americans were disposed to come forward on proper grounds. The Spanish consul answered, that he presumed they would have no objection to finish the war upon honorable terms. There, he says, the subject was dropped; and he took the liberty of making this communication to me, having heard that I was in Malta, adding, as his own opinion, that, if I would come over to Tripoli, in a flag of truce, he had no doubt but a peace might soon be concluded on honorable and satisfactory terms. As I had reason to believe that this communication was made to me with the knowledge, if not by the express desire, of the Bashaw, I felt in no haste to reply to it, as I was persuaded that, if he then discovered a desire to terminate the business, he would be more anxious to do so when the season for active operations should approach. On the 28th of March, Commodore Barron sent a small vessel to Tripoli, with clothing, &c. for our captive countrymen; and by that occasion, I acknowledged the receipt of the Spanish consul's letter, and observed to him, that, as we had, last year, made several overtures to the Bashaw for peace, which had been rejected, he might be assured that we should never make the first advance again on that subject. But that, notwithstanding our force in this sea was very considerable, and would, at the proper season, act with decided vigor, yet we should be ready to receive and consider any propositions which might come from the Bashaw before that season arrived, provided such propositions were compatible with the dignity and rising character of our nation, and tending to an honorable and permanent peace.

On the 21st of April, I received, by the return of the same vessel from Tripoli, another letter from the Spanish consul, saying, that he had communicated to the Bashaw the contents of my letter of the 28th of March, who had directed him to inform me, that, to show his disposition to end the war, he would make a proposition, viz: that the United States should pay him two hundred thousand dollars for peace and ransom, and deliver up to him, gratis, all his subjects in their power, and make full restitution of the property taken from them. The Spanish consul added, that he considered the propositions of the Bashaw rather intended to form the basis for opening a negotiation, than made with an expectation of being granted. At the same time, he mentioned the mode of communication which might be pursued, if I should think proper to come off Tripoli, with a view to opening a negotiation. These propositions were so completely inadmissible, that, after communicating them to Commodore Barron, I thought no more of them, fully expecting further advances, either through the same or some other channel, as it evidently appeared to be the wish of the Bashaw to open a negotiation.

Between the time last mentioned and the 18th of May, there were intimations made, in various ways, of the disposition of the Bashaw to treat, but none in a direct or official manner. On that day, Commodore Barron wrote me the letter No. 1, to which, on the 19th, I returned the answer No. 2; and, on the 22d, he informed me he had relinquished the command of the squadron to Captain Rodgers. On the 24th, I embarked on board the United States' frigate Essex, Captain James Barron, to proceed to Tripoli. On the 26th, in the morning, we saw the town of Tripoli, distant about ten miles, and, at the same time, the United States' frigates Constitution and President. At ten o'clock, A. M., Captain Barron and myself went on board the former, when Captain Rodgers received the letter of Commodore Barron, relinquishing to him the command of the squadron, &c. He returned with us to the Essex, when we stood in for the town, and, within a short distance from the battery, hoisted the white flag, which was immediately answered by the same from the Bashaw's castle. In half an hour, a boat came off, with the Spanish consul and an officer of the Bashaw. I informed the Spanish consul that I had, agreeably to the desire of the Bashaw to treat, come for that purpose; but that the propositions which had been made through him (the Spanish consul) were totally out of the question, and must be relinquished before I would consent to move one step in the business; and that, if I had not the most unequivocal evidence that they would be put aside in toto, I would not go on shore; and told him he had better return with my determination, and come off again the next day, if the Bashaw was desirous of having peace on terms which we could admit. He left the ship; and the wind, during the night, blew so heavily on shore that the ships were obliged to stand off, and were not able to come in near the town again until the 29th; when, at nine, A. M., the Spanish consul came on board, bringing the tiscara or commission of the Bashaw to treat, on his part, on the principal points of accommodation. We now removed from the Essex to the Constitution. The Bashaw relinquished all pretensions to a payment for peace, or any future demand, of any nature whatever; but demanded the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars for the ransom of our countrymen, and the delivery of his subjects gratis. To this I objected as strongly as to the first proposition; and, after some time spent in discussing the subject, I told the Spanish consul that, to prevent unnecessary delay and altercation, I would give him in writing my ultimatum, which must be at once decided upon, viz: that there should be an exchange of prisoners, man for man, as far as they would go; that the Bashaw should send all the Americans in his power on board the squadron now off Tripoli; that his subjects should be brought over from Syracuse, and delivered to him with all convenient speed; and, as he had three hundred Americans, more or less, and we one hundred Tripolitans, more or less, I would engage to give him for the balance in his favor sixty thousand dollars; that a treaty of peace should be made upon honorable and mutually beneficial terms. With this, he went on shore in the evening, but apparently without any expectation of its being accepted.

On the 30th, at 11, A. M., the Spanish consul came again on board the Constitution, and urged me very strongly to go on shore, where every thing, he said, should be satisfactorily arranged; but, as I had determined not to deviate from the ground I had taken, I declined, stating to him, that it now depended on the Bashaw to terminate the business by a single word, and that very little time more would be given for that purpose. He requested permission to send a letter on shore, to which he would await an answer; this was granted; and, on receiving an answer to his letter, he again urged my going on shore in the strongest terms. This I steadily refused to do. The wind increasing obliged the ship to stand off, and prevented the Spanish consul from going on shore this night.

At 8, A. M., on the 31st of May, the Spanish consul went on shore, promising to come off again in a few hours, with the Bashaw's answer. At noon, he came off, and said that the Bashaw had at length agreed to the sum of sixty thousand dollars for the balance of the prisoners; but that he could not think of delivering up the Americans until his subjects were ready to be delivered to him; and again urged me to go on shore. I told him, in one word, that the business had already been protracted beyond what I conceived to be a reasonable time; but, as the weather yesterday would not admit of our countrymen being sent on board, I would allow the Bashaw twenty-four hours from this time to agree to my propositions in toto, or reject them. He begged for further time, but without effect, and left the ship at 5, P. M.

At 11, A. M. June 1st, our unfortunate countryman, Captain Bainbridge came on board, who had been permitted to come off, under the guaranty of the Danish consul and Sidi Mahamet Dghies, the minister of Foreign Affairs. He assured me that the Americans would not be delivered up until a treaty of peace should be made with the Bashaw, as peace was more his object than the sum he might get for the captives; and, as it was our intention to conclude a treaty, it would be cruel to let our countrymen languish in captivity, merely on the punctilio of negotiating the treaty before or after their delivery, as whatever related to them was already understood. I informed him of all which had passed between the Spanish consul and myself, and told him that, as the Spanish consul had come on board as the commissioner of the Bashaw, with his credentials, which he had delivered to me, I considered the business as now brought nearly to a close, and that a very short time remained for the Bashaw to make up his mind. However, as I should make no difference in the terms of the treaty, whether it should be drawn up before or after the delivery of the prisoners, I would enter into an immediate negotiation for that purpose with any proper character whom the Bashaw might send on board, duly authorized, but I would have nothing more to do with the Spanish consul. But the Americans should be sent on board, without waiting the arrival of the Tripolines from Syracuse. Captain B. left us in the evening, and went on shore.

In the forenoon of the 2d of June, Mr. Nissen, His Danish Majesty's consul at Tripoli, came off to the Constitution, bringing a commission from the Bashaw to negotiate with me on the articles of the treaty. As I had a sketch prepared, I communicated it to Mr. Nissen, who observed that there were some articles more favorable to the United States than were to be found in any treaty which the Bashaw had with any other nation; yet he would take them on shore and submit them to the Bashaw. He did so, and returned on board again about 4, P. M. saying that the Bashaw had acceded to the articles, but was very desirous of having an article expressive of our determination to withdraw our forces, &c. from Derne, and that we should endeavor to persuade his brother to leave his dominions. To the first I could have no objection, as it would be a natural consequence of peace; but I insisted that, if his brother should leave his territory, he should have his wife and family restored to him. Mr. Nissen thought the latter clause would meet objections. However, he took it on shore.

In the morning of the 3d of June, Mr. Nissen came on board again, and declared that the Bashaw would not agree to deliver the wife and children of his brother. I adhered to that part of the article, and, after a little time, he went on shore, saying that, if the Bashaw still persisted in refusing that part of the article, the white flag should be hauled down on shore. When Mr. Nissen had left us, I told Commodore Rodgers, and Captain Smith, of the Vixen, who was on board, that, if the Bashaw should persist in his opposition to that article, I would not suffer the business to be broken off, and leave our countrymen in slavery, but would, at all hazards, take a boat and go on shore, if the white flag should be hauled down. At 4, P. M., Mr. Nissen came off again with the seal of the Bashaw to the preliminary articles; but with a condition that time should be allowed for the delivery of the wife and family of his brother. I consented to it, and we went on board the Vixen to stand into the harbor. When we were near the town, we fired a gun, and hauled down the white flag. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the batteries, and answered by the Constitution. I went into the harbor in the Constitution's barge, with the flag of the United States displayed, and was received at the landing place by the American officers, who had been in captivity, with a sensibility more easily to be conceived than described. An immense concourse of people crowded the shore, and filled the streets, all signifying their pleasure on the conclusion of the peace.

This, I believe, is the first instance where a peace has been concluded by any of the Barbary States on board a ship of war. I must here pay a tribute of justice to Commodore Rodgers, whose conduct, during the negotiation on board, was mixed with that manly firmness and evident wish to continue the war, if it could be done with propriety, while he displayed the magnanimity of an American, in declaring that we fought not for conquest, but to mantain our just rights and national dignity, as fully convinced the negotiators that we did not ask, but grant peace. You will pardon me if I here introduce a circumstance evincive of the spirit of our countrymen. At breakfast this morning, Commodore Rodgers observed that, if the Bashaw would consent to deliver up our countrymen without making peace, he would engage to give him two hundred thousand dollars, instead of sixty thousand, and raise the difference between the two sums from the officers of the navy, who, he was perfectly assured, would contribute to it with the highest satisfaction.

In the evening I visited Sidi Mahamet Dghies, whom I found a sensible, liberal, and well-informed man. He is a great friend of ours, and has always been opposed to the war with us.

On the 4th of June, at 11, A. M. the flag-staff was raised on the American house, and the flag of the United States displayed, which was immediately saluted with twenty-one guns from the castle and forts, and was returned by the Constitution, and all our unfortunate countrymen sent off on board their ships. At noon I had an audience of the Bashaw, by appointment, and was received with every mark of respect and attention. He paid me many compliments, and expressed himself on the peace with much manliness. He is a man of very good presence, manly and dignified, and has not, in his appearance, so much of the tyrant as he has been represented to be. His court was much more superb than that of Algiers. We spoke but little on the subject of the treaty, &c. He observed that he had given stronger evidences of his confidence in us than he had ever before given to any nation. He had delivered our people before he had received his own: and, as to the money he was to receive, it was merely nominal —the sum was nothing—but it was impossible to deliver them without something. The other articles of the treaty I might form as I pleased; being convinced I would not insert any thing which was not just. I returned his compliments, and assured him he would find our nation as just as he had found them brave and persevering.

On the 6th of June the Constitution sailed for Malta and Syracuse, to return to Tripoli with the money and the Tripoline prisoners. The Constellation sailed also for Derne, to bring off the few of our countrymen who might be there. I remained at Tripoli till the return of the Constitution, to establish an agent and make a final settlement of our business there. Dr. John Ridgely, of Maryland, late surgeon of the Philadelphia, was strongly recommended as a proper person to reside at Tripoli till the pleasure of the President was known, and I accordingly appointed him, as will be seen by the enclosed power and letter of instructions.

On the 10th, I sent to the Bashaw two copies of the treaty, with translations in the Arabic language, to be signed by him and his divan. He requested me to attend the divan and see the form of business there; and as this was a favor never before granted to a Christian, he gave it as an evidence of his respect, &c. I accordingly attended, and was seated on the same seat with the Bashaw, on his right hand. Great order and solemnity were observed. I presented the treaty to the Bashaw, who delivered it to his first secretary to read article by article. Some observations and short debates took place on several of the articles, but the Bashaw appeared to explain them satisfactorily. After the whole was read, the form of its presentation and acceptance was written by the secretary, and the seals of the Bashaw and members of the divan affixed to the two copies; one of which the Bashaw delivered to me in a solemn manner, and with many expressions of friendship. (He speaks good Italian.)

On the 17th the Constitution arrived, but the wind was too high to admit of her landing the Tripolines or money: on the 18th, both were sent on shore; but, instead of one hundred Tripolines, there were only forty-eight, and forty-one blacks. Seven had been carried to the United States by Commodore Preble, and I could never obtain an accurate account of the whole number. I had the Bashaw's tiscara respecting those who had been taken by Commodore Dale, which had been left in the hands of Mr. Nissen, which I found expressed twenty-one Tripolines and Turks, for whom and their goods seven Americans were to have been delivered. I was, therefore, obliged to make it appear that the blacks were his subjects, and were to be included in the exchange. I found no difficulty in the case, though I am sure he was not convinced of the propriety of it. Those in the United States, I assured him, would be returned by the first opportunity. The sixty thousand dollars were paid, and a receipt therefor given on the treaty left with Dr. Ridgely, and a duplicate therefor, which is enclosed. No consular present is mentioned in the treaty: butt hat, it is understood, will be given, as usual with all nations, when a consul shall be sent; it does not exceed six thousand dollars, and the particulars I shall send in my next, as I shall also my accounts, which cannot yet be adjusted, as our quarantine at Malta did not admit of my having that communication with Mr. Higgins, which was necessary for settling, as I had given him bills on the house of Sir Francis Baring and Company in London, for the money sent to Tripoli, &c.

On the 20th Commodore Rodgers came on shore, and had an audience with the Bashaw, where the assurances of friendship, &c. were repeated by the Bashaw.

On the 21st, in the evening, we sailed for Malta and Syracuse, arrived at the former on the morning of the 24th, where we remained two days, and sailed for this place.

I shall, in a future letter, give a more particular account of Tripoli, &c. At present, I confine myself to the subject of the negotiation and treaty. As I have always been opposed to the Egyptian and Derne expedition, I shall say nothing on that subject, especially as, I presume, there will be full communications respecting it from other quarters.

On the 5th of March last, we were indebted to Algiers for one year's annuity, deducting the cargo of timber, &c. which had been sent. I had learned that they were in great want of wheat at that place, and it struck me that, if a cargo of that article was sent to them on account of our annuity, it would be received with gratitude, and be a great saving to the United States; I, therefore, purchased a cargo of about twelve thousand bushels at Malta, which cost, with charges, about thirty-two thousand dollars, and sent it to Algiers, with a proper letter on the occasion: and I am happy to inform you that it arrived in good time, and in fine order, and was more valuable, as it relates to the United States, than a cargo of money would have been at that time. It was received, as intended, as a proof of friendship, and an evidence of good faith; and will settle our accounts for one year at least.

As our force in this sea is now so respectable, Commodore Rodgers has determined to go to Tunis, not to defy the Bey to war, but to have all differences with that regency settled on a basis that will ensure us future tranquillity from that Power, and place our national honor on a permanent ground. The Bey has lately been threatening us very hard, but I presume he will now be as submissive as he has been presumptuous. I shall go with him to that place on my way to Algiers, and, notwithstanding what Mr. Davis says of the Bey's resolution not to discuss the affairs of the United States, with any other person but himself, I am persuaded I shall find no difficulty in convincing him that the President of the United States will choose whomsoever he may think proper to settle our national affairs, provided there be no well grounded personal objections to the man.

With sentiments of the highest respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, &c.

TOBIAS LEAR.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

William Eaton to the Secretary of the Navy.

SYRACUSE, July 6, 1805.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose herewith copies of my communications to the commodores since I left Egypt: by the next occasion, shall give the correspondence.

I cannot but think our pacification has been too much precipitated. Was it contemplated that so formidable a squadron should be sent into this sea to negotiate, without showing itself before the enemy's port? Such is the fact! If it had only appeared off the place, I have no doubt the effect would have been a peace without money. If it had gone into a vigorous co-operation, Joseph Bashaw must have resigned at discretion, or saved himself by flight; he was calculating more on this than on defence. But we have peace!

The whole expense of my expedition amounts, in cash, to thirty-nine thousand one hundred and eight dollars fifty-eight cents, payment of troops included. As soon as I can effect a full settlement, my accounts will be transmitted. It will be necessary for me to negotiate bills on your Department, in order to enable me to do this, to the amount of seventeen thousand eighty-two dollars fifty-eight cents.

I learn that our consul at Gibraltar, Mr. Gavino, intends resigning. George Dyson, Esquire, who was appointed navy agent here by Commodore Preble, and who has discharged the duties of that office with activity and truth, I am persuaded, would be glad to transfer his concerns to Gibraltar, if the consulate there might be conferred on him. It is believed no man would acquit himself in that trust more to the satisfaction of Government; perhaps, none has better deserved it. Commodore Preble would, I think, say as much.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM EATON.

HON. SECRETARY OF THE NAVY of the United States.

To the People of the United States of America.

SYRACUSE, September 1, 1805.

It is known to the whole world that the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli, Jussuf, obtained the throne by the murder of our father and elder brother, and by my exile, who came next in succession. Driven by his impious and cruel usurpation, I took refuge in Egypt, where I was kindly received by the Mameluke Beys, who gave me a distinguished rank in the military service. Reposing in the security of peace, I had ceased to repine for the loss of my throne, and regretted only the lot of my unhappy subjects, doomed to the yoke of my cruel and tyrannical brother.

It was at this epoch, that the arrival of General Eaton gave me hopes of better fortune; and though I could not tell what were his powers, I trusted to the faith of a great people, of whom he was the ostensible representative, and threw myself into his arms. We concluded a treaty at Alexandria, a copy of which is among the papers of Commodore Barron, in the custody of his secretary Mr. Robert Dennison. This treaty not only stipulates the recovery of the throne for me, but also includes several advantageous articles for the United States, for which General Eaton will be my voucher. Ought I, then, to suppose that the engagements of an American agent would be disputed by his constituent Government? I cannot suppose that a gentleman has pledged towards me the honor of his country on purpose to deceive me.

General Eaton and myself, with our joint followers, had already advanced six hundred miles into the kingdom of Tripoli, and a general defection had seized my brother's army, and all things prepared the protected of America to be hailed sovereign of his usurped throne. At this juncture a peace is concluded, in which a throne, acquired by rapine and murder, is guarantied to its usurper, and I the rightful sovereign, the friend and ally of America, am left unprovided for. No article in my favor, no provision for me and my family, and no remuneration for the advantages I had foregone in trusting to American honor. I am left in Syracuse with thirty dependents, on the pittance of two hundred dollars per month, and no prospect of future establishment. What with the expenses of my retinue, &c. I, a sovereign Prince, am now reduced to the pension of one dollar and fifty cents per day.

I must here observe, that Mr. Eaton, whose generosity I cannot sufficiently praise, has assisted me from his own finances, else hard indeed had been my lot.

When the prevalence of ages has accustomed men to the government of one, the right of a throne enters into the system of human thoughts, and that usage must have its rights like others.

In this situation, I appeal to the virtue, generosity, and candor of the people and Government of America. I trust that a brave and free nation will interest itself in behalf of a fallen prince, who has trusted to its national honor and good faith. I trust the Government will take my case into consideration, and at least send me back to Egypt, indemnified for those comforts lost by uniting my fortune to theirs; and I am confident the American people will feel for the misfortunes of one, who has fought in the united cause of their interest, and his own right.

HAMET BASHAW, son of Ali Bashaw Caramalli, of Tripoli.

Mr. Eaton to the Secretary of the Navy.

WASHINGTON CITY, December 5, 1805.

SIR:

Commodore Barron's instructions to Captain Hull of September 15, 1804, and my convention with Hamet Bashaw, of February 23, 1805, comprise all the obligations entered into with Hamet: copies of both which are in the offices, as are also the correspondences resulting therefrom. By perusing the Bashaw's letters from Syracuse, and by reviewing the transactions to which they refer, I cannot find that any additional observations of mine can throw more light on our transactions. It is impossible for me to undertake to say that the Bashaw has not been deceived. Nor can I, by any shape in which the subject can be viewed, reconcile the manner of his being abandoned, with those principles of national justice and honor which have hitherto marked our character. The term co-operation I always considered so nearly synonymous with alliance, that it would require the nicest distinction of diplomatic skill to discriminate the meaning; and hence supposed that an engagement to co-operate with Hamet Bashaw excluded the idea of using him as an instrument. This construction was the more readily admitted in this case, because until after we had proceeded far in the co-operation, I never heard a syllable of peace, neither from the President, nor from yourself, nor from the commander-in-chief, which did not look forward beyond an effort to chastise the enemy, and because I always felt a confidence, that such an effort, well conducted, would dethrone him. I really can offer no explanations on the subject, which are not to be found in my official communications, except a circumstance which I am aware modesty should conceal, but which was calculated, at all events, to save the honor and the interests of the United States harmless. On entering the ground of war with Hamet Bashaw, Mr. O'Bannon and myself united in a resolution to perish with him before the walls of Tripoli, or to triumph with him within those walls. In the former event we should have acquitted our duty; in the latter glorified our country. We were supported by similar resolutions on the part of commanders in the squadron, and to encourage Hamet Bashaw to perseverance, and in order to move understandingly with him, I induced the convention with him, which has been made the base of our treaty with his rival.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

WM. EATON.

Letter from Achmet Bashaw to the President of the United States.

SYRACUSE, August 5, 1805.

EXCELLENCE:

For nearly eleven years, I have been laboring under the weight of misfortune; but, notwithstanding which, my distress was never equal to that which the actual combination of circumstances has made it.

My residence was near Cairo, when there arrived in Alexandria a brig commanded by Captain Hull, in company with General Eaton, who came recommended to Mr. Briggs, His Britannic Majesty's consul, and inquired of him where I could be found. My place of abode being made known, a courier was despatched for Cairo, by order of the general, and on his arrival at Razid, a second one, which came to Cairo, directed to the house of Tursuf Bashaw, an officer of the Ottoman Porte, who received a letter in which he was requested to suffer me to pass without interruption, in order that I might co-operate with the Americans to take Tripoli. These things being communicated to me, caused me to reflect seriously, whether they could be true or not. All doubts were dissipated by General Eaton meeting in Cairo my secretary, named Mahumed Mezaluna, to whom he consigned another paper, and, in company with two Maltese, arrived at Said, my place of residence, and delivered to me a despatch, urging me to leave that place immediately, in order that we might have a meeting (as really happened) in the city of Damintur, where the general was made known to me as one who had been sent thither by your excellency for the conquest of the Kingdom of Tripoli. I engaged to go with him to Syracuse, and also to keep myself secret, from which circumstance I was necessarily compelled to abandon all I possessed, and thus lose my horses, camels, &c. Previous to my leaving Damintur, General Eaton assured me the peace would never be made, unless I was placed in my own seat (throne) and often swore by himself, that he would never take me from where I was for the sole purpose of making the conquest.

I did not, however, fail to suggest to the general, that in case Jussuf Bashaw should actually remain conqueror, what part he would take in my favor, as I should not be able to remain any longer in the Turkish dominions. I was answered, that if the combinations of war should prove favorable to Jussuf Bashaw, a pension would be granted me, sufficient to maintain my family and suite; the people and money demanded by me, to effect this object, (for such a movement,) were ready; and that I had better expedite my secretary to Captain Hull, to inform him, that the general had come to conduct me from Upper Egypt to Syracuse, but that I could not trust myself at sea in the manner he had. My envoy having executed his commission, arrived first in Syracuse, and afterwards in Malta, in consequence of the absence of Captain Hull from the first, (place,) and whom he afterwards found in the second place, (Malta,) and executed his embassy: he was answered by the same (Hull) that every thing I could possibly want was ready, and in fact, there was sent me a vessel, laden with supplies and provisions, accompanied by the brig commanded by Captain Hull, which arrived at Bomba, delivering to the general and myself a despatch (to him directed) from the commodore, in which he renders Hull responsible for every thing I might want; I then asked for cannon, powder, and other warlike supplies, and was answered that a frigate was hourly expected, and that they would be sent to me. I afterwards left Bomba, in company with General Eaton, and we pursued our route towards Derne, arriving near it in twelve hours. Such a voyage made me extremely happy, as well as all my people, while the manner in which we were treated by the general excited universal admiration; his dignified soul (conduct) merits applause. We were scarcely on the twelfth hour of our voyage, when we saw a schooner, which brought us two pieces of cannon, and nothing more. After an attack of two hours, in which all the troops applaud and admire the courage of General Eaton, Derne was taken, (as the people of that country were much in our favor,) and in which attack the general was wounded in the hand.

After the capture of the city, we received from the chiefs of the brigands, letters offering to join us. After ten days a troop of cavalry and infantry (of the enemy) advanced; they were twice broken and put to flight by us. We now asked from the schooner, which had been sent us, people and arms, while there remained a respite and peace, and were waiting an answer respecting our demand for people and arms, in order that we might go and take Bergaza and Tripoli; in the mean time arrived a frigate which we supposed had brought us people, but she landed a Turkish ambassador from Jussuf Bashaw, who informed the general of the alliance of Jussuf Bashaw with your excellency; saying that the said Bashaw would restore my family, and that your excellency would give me, in the name of the United States, a pension. The same evening of the arrival of the frigate, the general informed me, that I must embark with all my people; and thus was again compelled to abandon all I possessed—the general having prevented the Turkish ambassador from landing, and thus we parted for Syracuse, where we found the whole squadron.

I daily expected my family, when finally I was told that he (the Bashaw) would not let them go: having thus broken his word, I demanded of the general to be replaced in my own country, which was also denied me, saying that he had no orders to that effect from your excellency, and it is thus I find myself in this country, with the small pension of two hundred dollars per month, and on which sum I am to support myself with a number of people. Such a state of things makes me feel that the weight of misfortune has only increased, and for the first time, am completely abandoned, and by a great nation; I therefore fling myself on the mercy of your excellency, who, under the influence of just laws, will not fail to render me that justice which oppression and misfortune entitle me to.

With the hope of an early reply from your excellency, I remain, &c. &c.

ACHMET BASHAW, son of Ali Bashaw, &c.

Commodore John Rodgers to Samuel Barron, Esq.—[Received at Malta, June 2.]

CONSTITUTION, OFF TRIPOLI, May 28, 1805.

SIR:

On the 26th instant, by the Essex, Captain James Barron, I had the honor to receive your letter bearing date 22d instant, with the accompanying letters, resigning the command of the United States squadron in these seas into my hands. The task which your unavoidable indisposition has consequently imposed on me, is a commission which I accept, with a diffidence no less conspicuous than its consequence is repugnant to your zeal and patriotism; and sir, while I commiserate your truly unpleasant situation, be assured that nothing will afford me more real satisfaction, than such a restoration of your health as will authorize your re-assuming a command which devolved on me by mere accident.

A few hours after the arrival of the Essex here, she stretched close in shore, and made the signal indicative of her mission, which was immediately answered by the Bashaw on his castle, in a manner expressive of his unfeigned approbation; and in an hour after the Spanish consul came on board by the Bashaw's order to make the suitable arrangements with Colonel Lear, previous to the opening of the negotiation, and to his going on shore; when from the favorable representation by the Spanish consul of the Bashaw's propitious disposition to peace, Colonel Lear resolved and had made arrangements for waiting on the Bashaw to commence his functions the next morning, but the weather has been so unsettled as to prevent further intercourse until this day.

From the same to the same.

MAY 29, 1805.

The arrival of the Vixen yesterday affords me the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 25th inst. with the accompanying communications from Mr. Eaton, Mr. Davis, and Captain Hull, and happily before Colonel Lear had landed or touched even on the negotiation. Mr. Davis's communications contain information of importance, and their timely arrival will, I sanguinely flatter myself, enable Colonel Lear, (on whose judgment I have the fullest confidence,) to assume an independence in negotiation, which it is equally his own and his country's honor and interest to observe. From the relation, by Captain Barron and Colonel Lear, of your last instructions to Mr. Eaton, I conceive it unnecessary for me to say any thing further on that subject, as he has no doubt evacuated Derne, and is now on his return in the Argus to Syracuse or Malta; and as Colonel Lear is of opinion with myself, that Mr Davis's communications do not require an immediate answer, particularly as the negotiation is already opened with Tripoli, and personally with the Bashaw. So soon as the event, whatever it may be, is known, I shall despatch the Vixen to Malta, to give you the intelligence, and if unfavorable to Captain Barron, to prepare our forces to compel the monster to a sense of reason. Although it is evident that the Bey of Tunis is afraid of the consequences of a war with the United States, yet, at this critical moment, I conceive it necessary that he should not be neglected; therefore, as soon as one of the vessels from this can be spared, I shall send her with advices to Mr. Davis, corroborating and seconding the steps you have already taken with that regency—as it is my determination to respect the lawful rights of that gentleman with as much delicacy as I am resolved to pursue pacific measures no further than his conduct will authorize. A peace with this regency will enable us to represent to him our opinion of his treachery in such language as he best understands.

From the same to the same.

MAY 30, 1805.

Yesterday the Spanish Consul returned on board again, empowered by the Bashaw to negotiate a peace, and although it appeared by his credentials that he was completely authorized to conclude a final settlement of differences with Colonel Lear, previous to his going on shore, yet he did not think Colonel Lear's propositions admissible, and, in consequence, returned on shore last evening to consult the Bashaw further on the business.

The Spanish consul has this moment (10 A. M.) returned on board again, and says that the Bashaw is not satisfied with the propositions that have been made. How things will turn out is yet uncertain. Captain Barron will be able to give you the particulars.

I have the honor, &c.

From the same to the same.

CONSTITUTION, OFF TRIPOLI, June 3, 1805.

SIR:

By the sperronara you despatched from Malta, I have this instant received duplicates of the Government despatches you forwarded by the Nautilus, with Mr. Simpson's representations relative to our affairs with Morocco. I shall be at Malta in the course of three or four days after this reaches you, and in time, I hope, to send a force to Morocco to meet Mr Simpson's wishes. The business is so far finished that a flag-staff is making on board the Constitution to display the American flag on the consular house.

From the same to the same.

SIR: JUNE 3, 1805.

In all probability peace will be concluded with Tripoli to-morrow, in which case it is likely the prisoners will be on board the squadron to-morrow morning. Colonel Lear, who has not yet been on shore, goes to-morrow for the purpose of concluding matters. Captain Bainbridge on parole was on board the Constitution yesterday: he desires to be affectionately remembered to you and your brother.

The Bashaw is much humiliated, which he now himself confesses; and I think I can venture to say that it is the last war that this regency will ever wage against the United States. None of the Philadelphia's officers have died—they are all well—this will be pleasing news to their friends.

In haste, I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

JOHN RODGERS.

General Eaton to Commodore Barron.

SIR: DERNE, May 29, 1805.

Since the departure of the Nautilus with my despatches of the 17th, the enemy have daily showed themselves in a menacing posture near us, but have not come to a general action. Yesterday a detachment of about fifty or sixty of their foot, covered by a troop of horse, descended the mountain, by a ravine, fell upon some of our Arab families, who were encamped in the rear of the town, and drove off several cattle and camels. The Bashaw's people pursued and attacked them under the mountain, killed and wounded three of them, and recovered their cattle. I marched out with Lieutenant O'Bannon, Mr. Mann, and Farquhar, and thirty rank and file, Americans and Greeks, from the garrison, and took a ravine on the left with a view of cutting off their retreat. We fell in with them soon after ascending the mountain—they opposed to us a short resistance, but fled before a charge of bayonet: we pursued them within a short distance of their camp, killed their captain and five men, wounded a number and took two prisoners, without receiving any injury ourselves. The camp beat to arms, mounted and moved towards us in a body, but did not come within musket shot—they could not ascertain our number, and apprehending we were an advanced party aiming to draw them into an ambuscade on disadvantageous ground, formed in order of battle and kept their post, while we retired down the mountain. The enemy swore vengeance, and resolved to execute it to-day. About nine in the morning they advanced their whole force, and posted themselves on an eminence in fair view—proper stations were taken on our part to receive them—they reconnoitered us awhile; but when orders were given to attack, their Arabs mutinied, and retrograded; and the Beys were compelled to follow with their Tripolitans.

JUNE 2.

To-day the enemy brought themselves to a resolution to attack; they had previously forced the Arabs into oaths of fidelity by seizing and chaining hostages from their most considerable families; but their movements this day terminated exactly as on the 29th—the Beys attempted to force the Arabs forward—they resisted, and alleged, as on similar occasions, that they were willing to fight an enemy of their own mode of warfare, but they could not resist the Americans, who fired enormous balls that carried away a man and his camel at once, or rushed on them with bayonets, without giving them time to load their muskets.

Last evening I had the honor to receive your letter of the 19th ultimo, by which I learn that the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli has lately made overtures of peace, which the Consul General, Colonel Lear, has determined to meet, viewing the present moment propitious to such a step. In consequence of which it seems contemplated that we should withdraw ourselves from this coast.

It was an event anticipated in my letter of the 1st ultimo that the reigning Bashaw would seize the moment, when he should apprehend himself seriously in danger from his brother, to rid himself of this rival by detaching from him our succor through overtures of peace. Facts establish the correctness of this conjecture.

That the inhabitants of Tripoli are weary of the war is well ascertained. That they secretly desire the restoration of their legitimate sovereign, because they believe him peaceably inclined, transpires through various indubitable channels: and that the Moors and Arabs of the kingdom, who form its entire population, are generally in a revolutionary state is equally true. Joseph Bashaw is not ignorant of these dispositions. As early as the month of January last, he was, according to the Danish consul, very attentive upon our transactions with his brother in Alexandria. On the 19th ultimo, late overtures had intimated to the Consul General his inclination towards a pacification—we had then been seventy-six days from Alexandria—thirty-five as far forward as Bomba, and twenty-one in possession of this place. Of these movements and operations, intercepted letters by way of Mensurat and Bengazi prove to us the enemy were not uninformed. It is now nineteen days since his forces were beaten on this ground; and since that, detached parties surprised and routed. These are also events which cannot be easily concealed: it does not appear that the season has hitherto permitted any formidable display of our naval force before Tripoli. It cannot be unfair, therefore, to infer, that the pacific overtures of the reigning Basha are influenced in a great measure by apprehensions of his brother's approach. Yet it seems not to be admitted that we have any obligations towards Hamet Bashaw—but if such is the effect of the enemy's apprehensions from this quarter, who certainly knows how to compare the relative influence of the parties, the calculations we have formed of the ultimate result of an effectual co-operation should no longer seem visionary. I do believe it was in the contemplation of Government to have profited of this advantageous circumstance, as instrumental to chastise a perfidious foe, rather than sacrifice a credulous friend. I know it was the general wish, and indeed the expectation of our country, that the enemy should be chastised. How far this wish and expectation will be satisfied from the arrangements now in operation, time and events must determine. But I cannot, from any shape in which the subject can be viewed, be persuaded that the manner of serving ourselves of Hamet Bashaw, and abandoning him, can be reconciled to those principles of honor and justice, which, I know, actuate the national breast. It seems enough to cancel every pledge that we have brought him back to the post from which he had been driven. It ought to be taken into consideration that this is no other than the post from whence he was always asked supplies; and that, consequently, setting him down here, just as he was, can render him no essential service; but that, to abandon him here under actual circumstances, where famine and the ravages of the enemy's forces have exhausted the resources of the province, and while those forces are still in our vicinity, cannot but leave him in a more hopeless situation, than he left the place. And here is an additional reason why his means are not materially altered for the better. He was driven away on account of his intercourse with the enemies of his rival. He has been induced to return under an expectation of receiving aids from the United States, to prosecute his views of recovering his throne. I thought myself authorized, from the assurances given me by the Secretary of the Navy, to encourage him with the prospect of receiving those aids; and frequent expressions of your resolution to make an example of Tripoli. The ensuing summer fortified me in the confidence that the exercise of my discretion here in the manner I have done would eventually, if not directly, assist the accomplishment of those objects. The resistance we met at this place is said to have discouraged the expectation formed of the co-operation in view. This resistance would undoubtedly have been less obstinate, had not the vicinity of the enemy's camp in some measure inspired, or at least encouraged it. But it might have been expected that the Governor of Joseph Bashaw, who, twenty months ago, with forces from Tripoli, drove Hamet Bashaw from the post, and who still held possession, would oppose his return by all the means in his power.

Want of qualities essential in the character of a commander and a prince is stated as a serious obstacle to the advancement of his cause. We do not hitherto find that the enemy possesses those qualities in so eminent a degree as to justify a comparison to the prejudice of his rival. It must be admitted that the latter possesses the capacity of commanding respect, and conciliating affection among his subjects. And I have lately had good reasons to correct the unfavorable opinion at one time entertained of his military enterprise; yet he is not a general: I never knew but one Turk who, I thought, deserved that character. I am not alone in the opinion, it is general among the gentlemen who have acted with me, that Hamet Bashaw possesses talents sufficient to our purpose. As evidence of this, every one of them is not only willing but solicitous to pursue the expedition.

With such aids as I have mentioned to be thought requisite, we could at once break up the enemy's camp in our front, and open our way, without further considerable impediments, to the gates of Tripoli. The enemy is aware of this, and is endeavoring to out-general us—his camp is abroad; of course his defence is weakened at the capital. The total defeat of his forces here would be a fatal blow to his interests. To recall them would be to abandon the provinces of Derne and Bengazi. But to remove the enemy near him by pacification, he may safely turn all his resources against his rival: and, when once relieved from this danger, we shall again undoubtedly have experience of his respect to treaty.

I am suspicious that the Spanish consul has an influence in Joseph Bashaw's measures. If my recollection serves me, he was accused by our late consul, Mr. Cathcart, of advising the war. I recollect perfectly well hearing him assert, at Tunis, in December 1801, that the Americans miscalculated if they thought of forcing a peace without paying for it. National shame, perhaps interest, and individual pride, engaged him to favor such an issue of the war: he is said to be the confidential man of the Bashaw.

I am afraid one important consideration has been overlooked in the arrangements lately adopted by Mr. Lear—the danger of falling back to an irrecoverable distance, in case of the failure of the negotiation commenced by him, and at the same time the abandonment of the advantageous ground we hold here—it would certainly have a tendency to unite the kingdom of Tripoli against us, and possibly to encourage the whole coast of Barbary to aggression. Or should it transpire that the evacuation of this post had been recommended, it would certainly have an unfavorable influence on the pending negotiation.

Another consideration is involved, which cannot but wound the pride of military principles. We must strike the flag of our country here in presence of an enemy who have not merited the triumph, and yield to them honor of a victory which no encounter hitherto has given them a right to claim, nor reason to expect; certainly they, and perhaps the world, will place an unjust construction on this retreat: at any rate it is a retreat—and a retreat of Americans! If individual feeling were alone to be consulted in this situation, it would prefer a manly defeat to this mode of safety: the consequences to the national character would be more honorable.

The burden of expense, which must accrue from pursuing the co-operation, seems an insurmountable obstacle I am apprehensive that the ultimate expense of maintaining a peace with Joseph Bashaw will be more burdensome to the United States than that accruing from this co-operation; besides it is calculated that this expense will be reimbursed.

It is insinuated that the Consul General is opposed to the measure. It is possible that he may have better information from whence to form an opinion of its issue, than we who have thus far accompanied the expedition; but it is not probable: has he any agency in the war?

I cannot but indulge the hope that additional instructions from Government will arrive in season, to enable you to furnish the means of prosecuting the co-operation to effect, of chastising the temerity of our enemy, and of preventing the melancholy and disagreeable events, which present appearances threaten. You would weep, sir, were you on the spot, to witness the unbounded confidence placed in the American character here, and to reflect that this confidence must shortly sink into contempt and immortal hatred; you would feel that this confidence, at any price, should be carried through the Barbary regencies, at least to Tripoli, by the same means that it has been inspired here. But if no further aids come to our assistance, and we are compelled to leave the place under its actual circumstances, humanity itself must weep. The whole city of Derne, together with numerous families of Arabs, who attached themselves to Hamet Bashaw, and who resisted Joseph's troops in expectation of succor from us, must be abandoned to their fate; havoc and slaughter will be the inevitable consequence; not a soul of them can escape the savage vengeance of the enemy. In proceeding, therefore, thus far and no further, instead of lending aids to the unfortunate people, whom we used as allies, and of whose situation we are actually profiting, to our own exclusive benefit, we involve them in destruction. Could I have apprehended this result of my exertions, certainly no consideration would have prevailed on me to have taken an agency in a tragedy so manifestly fraught with intrigue, so wounding to humane feelings, and, as I must view it, so degrading to our national honor.

It is impossible, though enjoined on me, to say any thing further of the squadron co-operating with Hamet Bashaw, after having been officially informed that a negotiation is opened with his brother, without so far having considered his situation as to have agreed on a cessation of arms. The delusion is already carried too far. If it had not been our intention to support him, or at least to save him, both honor and religion should have forbidden any encouragement to, or use of him.

It is said some provisions will be attempted in his favor, in our peace stipulations; this is, however, to be left to convenience. But before this provision be definitely arranged, if at all, and information of it received here, no armistice being agreed on, both himself and adherents may be cut in pieces by the enemy's army here, and by such of his own party as disappointment and rage will carry over to them.

Viewing the present posture of affairs, therefore, either as relative to our national honor and interests, or the situation of the Bashaw and people here, I consider it due to the confidence of Government, and a bond imposed by all the injunctions of humanity, to endeavor to hold this post till the last moment, in hopes that some happy occurrence may take place to secure our own, and, at the same time, to assist the interests of our friends. And I most devoutly pray heaven, that the blood of innocence may not stain the footsteps of us, who have aimed only to fight the enemies of our country.

JUNE 3.

The enemies feinted another attack to-day, by sending a detachment on the back of the town, which was repelled with loss. Their object seemed to aim at ascertaining the disposition of the inhabitants of the place. These turned out to a man in view of them. Their main body halted at a safe distance; and, after some manœuvring, retired to their camp. During the alarm a detachment from the garrison, under command of lieutenant O'Bannon, passed through town; every body, age and childhood, even women from their recluses, shouted, "Live the Americans! Long live our friends and protectors!" Hapless beings! if they could descry the reverse that probably awaits them, how justly would their acclamations of confidence be turned to execrations!

JUNE 5.

This morning a spy, a religious chief, whom I had employed to watch the enemy's motions, and who last night slept in their camp, reports that a courier arrived yesterday, eleven days from Tripoli, with despatches from the reigning Bashaw to his commander-in-chief in this vicinity, stating his intentions of concluding a peace with the United States, which he was resolved to carry into effect even if he sold his wardrobe: after which he should know how to dispose of his internal enemies. He enjoined it on his commander to hold his position before this town, if possible, till the issue of this project of peace should be known. The Mirabout chief added, that the Beys had it in contemplation to propose an armistice to me; I shall meet such an overture, if it should be offered, until I receive further advice from head quarters.

Eleven o'clock, A. M. this morning came in two deserters from the enemy's camp, both Levant Turks, Ismien and Mahamet, a choux and a cheriff, corresponding with the rank of aid-de-camp and ensign, who confirm the information before stated; and add that the Beys cannot prevail on their troops to attack this place, under our batteries and guns of the shipping; but that they calculate on sacking the city the moment we evacuate our posts. Their officers put themselves under the protection of the American flag, giving this reason for their preference, that "they wished to get out of the kingdom of Tripoli, and thought this a favorable occasion." They say Joseph Bashaw has about two hundred soldiers in Tripoli, in whom he can place confidence, and three or four hundred others who are undisciplined and suspected. They declare that the people, in general, of the kingdom, expect with solicitude and impatience the approach of Hamet Bashaw, as they think him a good man, and are weary of the madness and violence of his brother.

Five o'clock, P. M. This afternoon an Arabic chief, Ab'd'el Selim, with a party of warriors, came over to us. He brings a message from the principal Arab chief at camp, that he will come over to the Bashaw with his cavalry, amounting to about one hundred and fifty, if he can have assurances that the Americans will not abandon him, in which case Joseph Bashaw would devour his family and lands. This chief asserts that the Bey of Bengazi, who is with the camp, is well disposed towards us; and only waits the arrival of our supplies to declare himself. Be assured, sir, we only want cash and a few marines to proceed to Tripoli, and to meet you in the citadel of that piratical kennel for the liberation of our captives. It would only occasion a delay of their release a few months. Their triumph will amply compensate this delay.

It is thought proper to despatch the Hornet with these communications, and hold ground here until your answer can be received.

JUNE 9.

Day before yesterday, Hadge Ismein Bey, the second in command of the enemy's army here, deserted with a few attendants and camels, took off the military chest, and entered the desert for Upper Egypt. This defection is said to have been caused by his being charged with bad generalship in the affair of the 13th ultimo. He commanded the cavalry.

JUNE 11.

Yesterday morning the enemy having received fresh reinforcements of Arabs, appeared in great numbers on the heights which overlook the town, and moved along the site of the mountain for the space of two or three miles, apparently in search of some avenue to descend without being exposed to our cannon; but seemed irresolute. An accident brought on an engagement. The declivity of the mountain is a steep and uneven ledge of rocks, with only one pass where cavalry can move down, and this about two miles and a half from the town. The plain below, bordering on the sea about one mile in depth, is calcareous rock, and red earth, very much broken: in many places of which the brig's brass twelves could take effect, in others impeded by ridges near the shore. About half way between the town and the pass of the mountain, the Bashaw had posted a few cavalry to serve as videts. A detachment of the enemy, of superior numbers, descended the pass, with a view of cutting off this post, but they were manfully resisted and repelled. Reinforcements of small parties joined, and continued to join, on one side and the other, until about two o'clock, when the action became general. We were little more than spectators of the scene. The Argus, as often as the enemy were uncovered from the ridges, galled them with her shot from her long twelves, (the twenty-four pound carronades could not reach,) and we occasionally brought one of our field-pieces to bear on them from our advanced battery. But the fire of the Hornet was lost, by reason of her being too near the shore, the high bluff of which covered the enemy. Captain Hull, who had the fairest opportunity of ascertaining it, judges there were five thousand men on the field. The engagement lasted four hours. Though frequently charged, the Bashaw lost not an inch of ground. At length the enemy gave way, and were pursued quite to the pass of the mountain, where a regard to safety compelled many of them to quit their horses, which fell into the hands of our friends. This action, though fought in the Barbary manner, was conducted judiciously on the part of the Bashaw, and the victory was decidedly his. The number of his killed and wounded is between fifty and sixty; among the latter, four of his principal officers. Some Arab women, who came in from the enemy's camp this morning, say the Beys lost between forty and fifty killed, and upwards of seventy wounded. If we could have furnished but two hundred bayonets to assist a charge, and cut the pass of the mountain, not a horse should have escaped. Mr. O'Bannon was impatient to lead his marines and Greeks (about thirty in number) to the scene of action. This could not be done without leaving our post too defenceless in case of a reverse; besides, I confess I had doubts whether the measures lately adopted by our commissioner of peace would justify me in acting offensively any longer in this quarter. Had the aids come forward seasonably which we hoped to receive here, we might now have been at Cape Mensurat, and in fifteen days more at Tripoli.

Head winds have detained the Hornet, and a gale last night took the Argus to sea: as soon as she returns Captain Evans will be despatched to head quarters.

I have communicated, some days since, such parts of the contents of your letter of the 19th ultimo, as concern him, to Hamet Bashaw. He answers, that, even with supplies, it would be fruitless for him to attempt to prosecute the war with his brother, after you shall have withdrawn your squadron from the coast; but without supplies he must be left in a most forlorn situation, for he can command no resources here, nor can he place any faith in provisions which may be stipulated with his brother in his favor, except guarantied by the United States. He emphatically says, that, to abandon him here is not to co-operate with him, but with his rival! He wishes us to take him off in case of a peace. I am extremely anxious to learn the issue of the negotiation.

Meantime, I have the honor to be, &c.

The germ of this army had been five months in the field, had moved through the greatest extent of the kingdom, and, with every exertion to augment its strength, could only bring this small number to the field. Why? Want of cash on the part of Joseph Bashaw, and want of attachment on the part of his subjects. Though we were enough, with Hamet Bashaw, to defeat this force, we had not the means of pursuing the advantage. Why?

Mr. Davis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: TRIPOLI, June 2, 1807.

I arrived at this place on the 7th ultimo, and on the 10th communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Sidi Dghies, my orders relative to the execution of the third article of the treaty. He expressed some surprise at the demand, and instantly handed me the secret article, (of which I have the honor to enclose you a copy,) and promised to take an early opportunity of acquainting the Bashaw.

On the morning of the 11th, the Minister of Marines, brother-in-law to the Bashaw, waited on me at an early hour, and asked me, in the name of his excellency, to repeat what I had stated the day before to the minister Sidi Dghies. He said it was so strange, that his master supposed there must be some misunderstanding; that every body knew the opposition which was made to that article on the part of the Bashaw, even in the form it stood; and that my Government must be convinced that time had not lessened the difficulties annexed to its execution; that it appeared very inconsistent for me to present assurances of our friendship, while I came instructed to violate the most sacred article of our treaty. I informed him that I only wanted an answer to the demand I had made, by which my future conduct would be regulated; and as his comments could not possibly affect the measures my Government had resolved to take, they might very well be spared.

When he retired, I waited on the minister Sidi Dghies, who had not received any answer from the Bashaw. His impressions were, that my exertions to obtain the release of the family would prove fruitless, and suggested the propriety of my acquainting the Government with the nature of the secret article, which he supposed, from my instructions, they must be ignorant of. I expressed the wish of having an early answer, and informed him, that, as the line of conduct I was to pursue, in case of a refusal, had been directed by the Government, a delay of that kind was very unnecessary, and that he might not be aware of the consequences which might result from the inexecution of the treaty. He requested me to call again the next day.

On the morning of the 12th we again waited on the minister, who received us with a forced gayety, and, after some desultory conversation, asked if I was not of his opinion, that it would be better to wait an answer from the President than to carry things to a serious extreme; that the Bashaw appeared much displeased, and very unhappy, and certainly would not make such a sacrifice for nothing.

I asked if that was to be considered as a definitive answer from his master. He hesitated, and evaded an answer. I assured him that it was unnecessary for us to speak at a distance; that I requested an immediate answer from the Bashaw; that the brig could be detained no longer; and that the family or myself must embark on board.

A short time after we had left him he sent for Mr. Ridgely, and requested I would join him in half an hour. On entering his apartment, I found him walking with extreme agitation. He requested Mr. Ridgely to explain to me the object of this visit. Mr. Ridgely prefaced his observations by saying that he was fully satisfied of the minister's sincerity, and hoped it would influence my conduct. The minister told him he feared for his life, and explained some traits in the Bashaw's character, and reasons which made him so tenacious on this point; that his friendship for the exile was known, and had drawn upon him great and powerful enemies; that my persevering so warmly in the demand might induce the Bashaw to believe that he (the minister) supported rather than opposed me; that he would make a considerable pecuniary sacrifice to obtain my wishes, and, that it might be successful, solicited me to ask the family as a favor rather than demand it as a right; the Divan had been called, and I would be received by them at the castle; that he would be the interpreter, opposing me warmly in lingua Franca, but would take a very different part in Arabic; and concluded with some warm ejaculations for the happy termination of the affair.

I thanked the minister for his friendship, and assured him of my compliance with his wishes; that his confidence in me induced me to add that the expectations of my Government were not restricted to the delivery of the family; that I was instructed to demand an establishment for them. He said, if the first was granted, there would be no great difficulty in the second, to a moderate degree.

At half-past nine, P. M. I was sent for to the castle, where we found the Divan assembled, when my orders were again made known, and each in his turn offered his comments on the secret article; and, after considerable discussion, the Bashaw addressed himself to me, and requested my opinion on the line of conduct he ought to pursue; that he had strong reasons for wishing to retain the family, and that he had justice on his side. I told his excellency that I could foresee no possible ill which could result to him from their immediate delivery, but that his retention of them would do us considerable injury; that our treaty was known to all the world, and our public faith pledged in their behalf; that his brother had co-operated with us, and to deceive him in such a tender point was to disgrace us as a nation. He asked if I would certify that the treaty had been ratified: to which I consented, provided he would execute the third article. He replied that the acts of no individual should again involve him with us, and that the wishes of our Government should be complied with. I thanked him, and informed him that the wife of the Bey and the other married sister were permitted to remain; at which the Divan expressed much satisfaction.

On the 13th I waited on the minister to learn when they would be ready to embark, and requested that their slaves, effects, &c. would not be withheld; to which he consented. I told him that I had now a favor to solicit, which was, that some establishment should be made for the children. He assured us that he had made a considerable pecuniary sacrifice to release them; that the Bey was much disposed to do something for the mother and brothers of his wife; and, in order that no discontent might remain on our part, he would engage that they should be provided for, and that he would give something handsome towards it himself. I told him that he should not lose by his liberality, and that the expenses he had incurred would be remunerated him by the United States; the exact amount of his sacrifices will be ascertained, and I shall trust to his excellency the President to make good my assurances.

Captain Dent's orders being to sail in the evening, and it requiring some time to prepare and clothe the family, I could not avail myself of this opportunity of sending them to Syracuse. The same reason prevented my writing by the Hornet.

I have the honor to enclose you copies of my letters to Commodore Campbell and his excellency Achmet Bashaw. The minister Dghies holds his public situation from policy, perhaps necessity. He is wealthy, and the greatest sufferer in all serious difficulties. He possesses considerable talents, and which I am sure will never be used to foment a war with any Power. The concessions we have obtained here are unprecedented, and every circumstance tends to impress me with the belief that we are not placed beneath England or France.

With profound respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE DAVIS.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

[Secret article of the treaty enclosed in the foregoing letter.]

Whereas his excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli has well grounded reasons to believe, if the wife and children of his brother should be delivered up to him immediately on his leaving his (the Bashaw's) dominions, as expressed in the third article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States of America and the Bashaw of Tripoli on the fourth day of the present month, that he, the said brother, would engage in new operations of hostility against him, to the disturbance of the internal tranquillity of his dominions; and the said United States being willing to evince their good disposition to preserve the said treaty with sincerity, and that tranquillity should be secured in the dominions of the said Bashaw, do hereby agree to a modification of the said article of the treaty aforesaid, so that the term of four years, from the conclusion of said treaty, shall be fixed for the execution of the engagement of the Bashaw to deliver to his brother his wife and children; during which time the said brother is to give evident proofs of his peaceful disposition towards the Bashaw, and of his determination not to disturb the internal tranquillity of his dominions.

Given under my hand and seal, at Tripoli, in Barbary, this fifth day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and five.

TOBIAS LEAR,
Commissioner of the United States of America for concluding a peace with the Bashaw of Tripoli.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 193. [1st SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 10, 1806.

JANUARY 10, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the request of the Senate, expressed in their resolution of December 27, I now lay before them such documents and papers (there being no other information in my possession) as relate to complaints by the Government of France against the commerce carried on by the citizens of the United States to the French islands of St. Domingo.

TH: JEFFERSON.

[TRANSLATION.]

From General Turreau to the Secretary of State.

OCTOBER 14, 1805.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of His Imperial and Royal Majesty to His Excellency the President of the United States of America, has testified, in his conversations with the Secretary of State, his just discontent with the commercial relations which many citizens of different States of the Union maintain with the rebels of every color, who have momentarily withdrawn the colony of St. Domingo from the legal authority.

The principles injuriously affected by such a commerce, or rather by such a system of robbery, (brigandage,) are so evident, so generally acknowledged, and adopted, not only by all nations who have a colonial system to defend, but even by those who have none, and, moreover, even by every wise people to whatsoever political aggregation they may belong, that the statesman, if he has not lost every idea of justice, of humanity, and of public law, can no more contest their wisdom than their existence. And certainly the undersigned, in finding himself called by his duty, as well as by his inclination, in the bosom of a friendly people, and near the respectable Chief who directs its Government; certainly the undersigned ought not to have expected that his first political relations would have for their object a complaint so serious, an infraction so manifest of law, the most sacred and the best observed by every nation under the dominion of civilization.

But it was not enough for some citizens of the United States to convey munitions of every kind to the rebels of St. Domingo, to that race of African slaves the reproach and the refuse of nature; it was moreover necessary to insure the success of this ignoble and criminal traffic by the use of force. The vessels destined to protect it are constructed, loaded, armed in all the ports of the Union, under the eyes of the American people, of its particular authorities, and of the Federal Government itself: and this Government, which has taken for the basis of its political career the most scrupulous equity and the most impartial neutrality, does not forbid it.

Without doubt, and notwithstanding the profound consideration with which the minister plenipotentiary of the French empire is penetrated for the Government of the Union, he might enlarge still further upon the reflections suggested by such a state of things—a circumstance so important, so unexpected. But it would be equally as afflicting for him to dwell upon it, to state its consequences, as it would be for the Government to hear them.

The Secretary of State, who perfectly knows the justice of the principles, and the legitimacy of the rights referred to in this note, will be of opinion, that neither are susceptible of discussion; because, a principle universally assented to, a right generally established, is never discussed, or, at least, is discussed in vain. The only way open for the redress of these complaints, is, to put an end to the tolerance which produces them, and which daily aggravates their consequences.

Moreover, this note, founded upon facts not less evident than the principles which they infract, does not permit the undersigned to doubt that the Government of the United States will take the most prompt, as well as the most effectual prohibitory measures, in order to put an end to its cause; and he seizes with eagerness this occasion of renewing to the Secretary of State the assurance of his high consideration.

TURREAU.

General Turreau, minister plenipotentiary of His Imperial and Royal Majesty, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1806.

SIR:

Formal orders of my Government oblige me to insist upon the contents of my official note of the 14th of October last, relative to the commerce which some inhabitants of the United States maintain with the rebels of St. Domingo.

Not receiving any answer to that note, I had room to hope that the Government of the Union would take prompt and effectual measures to put an end to the causes which produced it: but your silence towards me, especially in relation to St. Domingo, and that of your Government towards Congress, impose upon me the duty of recalling to your recollection the said official note, and of renewing to you my complaints upon the tolerance given to an abuse as shocking, as contrary to the law of nations, as it is to the treaties of peace and friendship existing between France and the United States.

I will not recur, sir, to the different circumstances which have attended the commerce with the revolted part of St. Domingo; to the scandalous publicity given to its shameful success; to the rewards and encomiums prostituted upon the crews of armed vessels, whose destination is to protect the voyages to carry munitions of every kind to the rebels, and thus to nourish rebellion and robbery.

You ought not to be surprised, sir, that I call anew the attention of the American Government to this subject. His excellency M. Talleyrand has already testified his discontent to General Armstrong, your minister plenipotentiary at Paris; and you will be of opinion, that it is at length time to pursue formal measures against every adventure to the ports of St. Domingo occupied by the rebels. The system of tolerance which produces this commerce, which suffers its being armed, which encourages, by impunity, its extension and its excess, cannot longer remain; and the Emperor and King my master expects from the dignity and candor of the Government of the Union that an end be put to it promptly.

I add to this despatch a copy of the official note which has been already transmitted to you. I earnestly request, sir, that you acknowledge the receipt of both; and receive anew assurances of my high consideration.

TURREAU.

[TRANSLATION.]

From M. Talleyrand to General Armstrong.

SIR:

I have several times had the honor to call your attention to the commerce carried on from the ports of the United States to those of St. Domingo occupied by the rebels. These commercial communications would appear to be almost daily increased. In order to cover their true destination, the vessels are cleared for the West Indies, without a more particular designation of the place; and, with the aid of these commissions, provisions, arms, and other objects of supply, of which they stand in need, are carried to the rebels of St. Domingo.

Although these adventures may be no more than the result of private speculations, the Government of the United States is not the less engaged to put an end to them, by a consequence of the obligations which bind together all the civilized Powers, all those who are in a state of peace. No Government can second the spirit of revolt of the subjects of another Power; and, as in this state of things it cannot maintain communications with them, it ought not to favor those which its own subjects maintain.

It is impossible that the Government of the United States should longer shut its eyes upon the communications of their commerce with St. Domingo. The adventures for that island are making with a scandalous publicity. They are supported by armed vessels. At their return, feasts are given in order to vaunt the success of their speculations; and the acknowledgment, even the eulogies of Government are so much relied upon, that it is at these feasts, and in the midst of an immense concourse, where are found the first authorities of the country, that the principles of the Government of Hayti are celebrated, and that vows are made for its duration.

I have the honor, sir, to transmit to your excellency an extract of an American journal, in which are contained sundry details of a feast given in the port of New York, on board of a convoy which had arrived from St. Domingo.

The ninth toast, given to the Government of Hayti, cannot fail, sir, to excite your indignation. It is not, after having covered every thing with blood and with ruins, that the rebels of St. Domingo ought to have found apologists in a nation the friend of France.

But they do not stop at their first speculations. The company of merchants, which gave a feast on the return of their adventure, is preparing a second convoy, and proposes to place it under the escort of several armed vessels.

I have the honor, sir, to give you this information, in order that you may be pleased to call the most serious attention of your Government towards a series of facts, which it becomes its dignity and candor no longer to permit. The Federal Government cannot so far separate itself from the inhabitants of the United States, as to permit to them acts and communications which it thinks itself bound to interdict to itself, or as to think that it can distinguish its own responsibility from that of its subjects, when there is in question an unparalleled revolt, whose circumstances and whose horrible consequences must alarm all nations, and who are all equally interested in seeing it cease.

France ought to expect from the amity of the United States, and His Majesty charges me, sir, to request, in his name, that they interdict every private adventure, which, under any pretext or designation whatever, may be destined to the ports of St. Domingo occupied by the rebels.

Receive, General, the assurances of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

To His Excellency General ARMSTRONG,
Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

From M. Talleyrand to General Armstrong.

PARIS, (29th Thermidor, 13th year,) August 16, 1805.

SIR:

Since the letter I had the honor to write to you, on the 2d Thermidor, concerning the armaments which were making in the ports of the United States for the western part of St. Domingo, fresh information upon this point confirms every thing which had been received. The adventures for St. Domingo are publicly made; vessels are armed for war to protect the convoys; and it is in virtue of contracts entered into between Dessalines and American merchants, that the latter send him supplies and munitions of war.

I add, sir, to the letter which I have the honor to write to you, a copy of a sentence given at Halifax, in the matter of a merchant of New York, who had conveyed into the revolted part of St. Domingo three cargoes of gunpowder, and who was taken on his return by an English frigate.

If even in the English tribunal, where this prize was condemned, the whole island of St. Domingo was considered as a French colony, how can the Federal Government tolerate that the rebels of this colony should continue to receive from America succors against the parent country? It is impossible that that Government should be ignorant of the armaments making in its ports. Too much publicity is given to them not to render it responsible; and it ought to perceive that it is contrary to every system of peace and good friendship to suffer longer in its ports armaments evidently directed against France.

Without doubt the Federal Government would not wish, in order to favor certain private speculations, to give new facilities to rebellion and robbery (brigandage): the tolerance of a commerce so scandalous would be unworthy of it. Neither your Government nor His Majesty can be any longer indifferent to it; and, as the seriousness of the facts which occasion this complaint obliges His Majesty to consider as good prize every thing which shall enter the port of St. Domingo occupied by the rebels, and every thing coming out, he persuades himself that the Government of the United States will take, on its part, against this commerce, at once illicit and contrary to all the principles of the law of nations, all the repressive and authoritative measures proper to put an end to it. This system of impunity and tolerance can no longer continue;* and His Majesty is convinced that your Government will think it due from its frankness promptly to put an end to it.

Receive, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 194. [1st SESSION.

GRAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 17, 1806.†

JANUARY 17, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In my message to both Houses of Congress at the opening of their present session, I submitted to their attention, among other subjects, the oppression of our commerce and navigation by the irregular practices of armed vessels, public and private, and by the introduction of new principles, derogatory of the rights of neutrals, and unacknowledged by the usage of nations.

The memorials of several bodies of merchants of the United States are now communicated, and will develope these principles and practices which are producing the most ruinous effects on our lawful commerce and navigation.

The right of a neutral to carry on commercial intercourse with every part of the dominions of a belligerent, permitted by the laws of the country, (with the exception of blockaded ports and contraband of war,) was believed to have been decided between Great Britain and the United States by the sentence of their commissioners, mutually appointed to decide on that and other questions of difference between the two nations, and by the actual payment of the damages awarded by them against Great Britain for the infractions of that right; when, therefore, it was perceived, that the same principle was revived, with others more novel, and extending the injury, instructions were given to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of London, and remonstrances duly made by him on this subject, as will appear by documents transmitted herewith: these were followed by a partial and temporary suspension only, without any disavowal of the principle. He has, therefore, been instructed to urge this subject anew, to bring it more fully to the bar of reason, and to insist on rights too evident and too important to be surrendered. In the mean time, the evil is proceeding under adjudications founded on the principle which is denied. Under these circumstances the subject presents itself for the consideration of Congress.

On the impressment of our seamen our remonstrances have never been intermitted. A hope existed at one moment of an arrangement which might have been submitted to, but it soon passed away, and the practice, though relaxed at times in the distant seas, has been constantly pursued in those in our neighborhood. The grounds on which the reclamations on this subject have been urged, will appear in an extract from instructions to our minister at London, now communicated.

TH: JEFFERSON.

* Ne pourroit durer davantage.

† In addition to the papers communicated by this message, the President transmitted, confidentially, a number of documents relating to the same subject, by messages of January 17, 27, and 29, and March 24, 1806; nearly all of which will appear in the message of March 22, 1808, No. 215.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 25, 1806.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President has been pleased to refer the resolution of the Senate, dated on the 10th instant, has the honor to make the following report:

The most important of the principles interpolated into the law of nations, is that which appears to be maintained by the British Government and its prize courts, that a trade opened to neutrals by a nation at war, on account of the war, is unlawful.

This principle has been relaxed, from time to time, by orders, allowing, as favors to neutrals, particular branches of trade, disallowed by the general principle; which orders have, also, in some instances, extended the modifications of the principle beyond its avowed import.

In like manner, the last of these orders, bearing date the 24th of June 1803, has incorporated, with the relaxation, a collateral principle, which is itself an interpolation, namely, that a vessel on a return voyage is liable to capture by the circumstance of her having, on the outward voyage, conveyed contraband articles to an enemy's port. How far a like penalty, attached, by the same order, to the circumstance of a previous communication with a blockaded port, would likewise be an interpolation, may depend upon the construction under which that part of the order has been, or is to be, carried into execution.

The general principle, first above stated, as lately applied to re-exportations of articles imported into neutral countries from hostile colonies, or vice versa, by considering the re-exportation, in many cases, as a continuation of the original voyage, forms another interpolation, deeply affecting the trade of neutrals. For a fuller view of this and some other interpolations, reference may be had to the documents communicated with the message to Congress of the 17th instant.

The British principle which makes a notification to foreign Governments of an intended blockade equivalent to the notice required by the law of nations, before the penalty can be incurred; and that which subjects to capture vessels, arriving at a port, in the interval between a removal and return of the blockading force, are other important deviations from the code of public law.

Another unjustifiable measure is the mode of search practised by British ships, which, instead of remaining at a proper distance from the vessel to be searched, and sending their own boat with a few men for the purpose, compel the vessel to send her papers in her own boat, and sometimes with great danger from the condition of the boat and the state of the weather.

To these instances, without adverting to others of an inferior or less definite character, in the practice of Great Britain, must be added the assumed right to impress persons from American vessels, sailing under the American flag on the high seas. An explanation of this practice will be found in the extract from the instructions to Mr. Monroe, communicated with the message of the President above referred to.

Among the interpolations introduced by the French Government, is a decree dated June 6, 1805, (18th Prairial, 13th year,) importing that every privateer of which two-thirds of the crew should not be natives of England, or subjects of a Power the enemy of France, shall be considered as pirates.

Another is evidenced by the result of an application made by the deputy consul of the United States, at Cadiz, through the French consul, to Admiral Villeneuve, for the liberation of some seamen of the United States, who were on board the French fleet under his command. The answer of the Admiral, dated 29th August last, (11th Fructidor, 13th year,) states that "a decision of His Imperial and Royal Majesty provides that every foreigner found on board the vessels of war or of commerce of the enemy, is to be treated as a prisoner of war, and can have no right to the protection of the diplomatic and commercial agents of his nation."

Other unjustifiable innovations on the law of nations are exemplified in the decree of General Ferrand, lately passed at the city of St. Domingo, a translation of which is annexed.

The irregular mode of search above described is also practised by the cruisers of France and Spain.

The cruisers of the two latter Powers have harassed the commerce of the United States in various other forms, but as it is not known or believed that their conduct has been prescribed or santioned by the public authority of their respective nations, they are not considered as falling within the purview of the resolution of the Senate.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

In the name of the Emperor.

DECREE.

AT THE HEAD QUARTERS OF ST. DOMINGO,
20*th Vendemiaire*, 14*th year*, (6*th June*, 1805.)

We, LOUIS FERRAND, General of Brigade, Commander-in-chief, Captain General, pro tempore, member of the Legion of Honor:

Whereas our decrees of the 8th Thermidor, in the twelfth year, and thirteenth Messidor, of the thirteenth year, as well as our instructions to the owners and captains of privateers of the 29th Prairial, in the same year, can have left no doubt of the sentiments which we have repeatedly expressed for the respect due to the freedom of navigation and neutral rights; that those principles have been scrupulously adhered to by the administrative and judicial authorities, under our directions, in several decisions or judgments rendered by them in cases of capture, and releasing several captured vessels.

Considering that we had a right to hope from our candor a just reciprocity on the part of the Governments of the neighboring neutral countries, and their concurrence, by the measures which are in their power, to cause to be observed by their subjects the treaties which bind them to France, as also to restrain the infamous cupidity of those who, contrary to the law of nations, supply the revolted blacks by means of a trade, the suppression of which is required by our personal responsibility to the Emperor of the French.

Considering that, far from having obtained the end which we expected from this frank and loyal conduct, the rigor of our principles in favor of neutral flags has become, to many, a stimulus to their rapacity, and that it results from papers found on board of prizes lately condemned; that the greater proportion of neutral vessels, sailing from the rebels' ports, are very carefully and methodically cleared for the ports of Dominique, Tobago, St. Thomas, Curaçoa, Jamaica, Havana, Baraçoa, St. Jago de Cuba, &c.

Considering that the officers of the customs, in several ports of the United States of America have even had the impudence to give official clearances to neutral vessels for the ports occupied by the rebels, and that, in many instances of this kind, they have used the signature of President Jefferson, whose justice was doubtless surprised.

Considering that, from the voluminous correspondence found on board the captured vessels since our decree of the 23d Messidor, it results that several of the most respectable mercantile houses of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c. have, for a long time past, kept up a continued intercourse with the revolted blacks, and have habitually supplied them with every sort of provisions and warlike stores.

Considering that powerful equipments of neutral vessels, for war and merchandise, have been made in the ports of the United States to protect this infamous commerce; that the brig Jane, of Baltimore, Captain Kennedy, of sixteen guns, and sailing from a port of the rebels, has lately been boarded and captured, after a bloody engagement, by the French privateer, the Superb, Captain Dominique.

Considering that it is notorious that the America of thirty-two guns, the Connecticut of twenty-two, the Indostan of fourteen, and several other American vessels of that description, are not only engaged in that execrable commerce, but actually transport the arms and ammunition of Dessaline's army from one port to another, thereby becoming the auxiliaries of the black rebels against France.

Considering that such conduct, on the part of the subjects of the United States of America, cannot be avowed by that Government without acknowledging explicitly the independence of the black rebels of St. Domingo, and provoking an open rupture with France.

Considering that the twenty-sixth article of the convention, of the 30th September, 1800, ratified 31st July, 1801, expressly prohibits the citizens of both the contracting parties to receive, protect, conceal, harbor, or assist any pirate, and that, notwithstanding, vessels armed under the American flag daily convoy, and sail in concert with vessels of the negroes, bearing a flag unknown amongst the civilized powers, and consequently pirates; which is evidently an infraction of that article of the convention of which we have carefully executed the clauses within the extent of our Government.

Considering, finally, that it is our duty, and for which we are responsible, to put a stop, by every effort in our power, to such outrageous abuses, which tend to furnish profusely the black rebels with the means of carrying on their rebellion, and opposing an obstinate resistance to His Imperial Majesty's arms, when they shall be directed against them, have decreed, and do decree:

ARTICLE 1. All vessels taken either with direct clearances for ports occupied by the rebels, or coming out from them with clearances from the custom-house, or plausibly suspected of a masked clearance, the better to ensure their communication with the rebels, may be conducted into the ports of neighboring islands, either neutral or allied, showing, nevertheless, a legitimate cause opposing their carrying them directly to St. Domingo or Jamaica, derogating, in that instance, from our decree of the 13th Messidor last. The Captains General, Governors, and commanders in these islands, who can no longer doubt the obligations whereby all nations ought to concur in measures to suppress the rebellion in that of St. Domingo, shall be invited to authorize the entry of these vessels into their ports.

ART. 2. In this case, conformably to our instructions of the 29th Prairial last, the functions of our agents or delegates are limited to the putting on or taking off the seals; selecting the documents found on board; receiving the declarations and interrogatories; authorizing provisional sales if there should be imminent danger of damage which shall be proved, and in which case they shall make a process verbal of the unloading, an inventory of appraisement, and judicial sale by adjudication at auction; the proceeds of which shall be deposited, either in the hands of a solvent merchant, or in those of the delegate, to be remitted after definitive judgment to the party in whose favor the judgment shall be rendered.

ART. 3. The suit being concluded, the above mentioned proceedings relative thereto, as well as the ship's papers inventoried, (without subtracting under any pretext whatever the invoices or bills of lading) shall be addressed to the chief of administration, of the marine of St. Domingo, in originals, who shall transmit them to the competent tribunal to take cognizance thereof; and as the original papers might be lost, it shall be the duty of the agent or delegate of St. Domingo to deposite in his office collated copies thereof, which copies in such case, legally proved, shall acquire the full effect and force of the original papers.

ART. 4. It shall beside be their duty to join to the above mentioned paper an order on demand agreeing with the invoices, bills of lading, process verbal of the unloading, appraised inventory, and provisional sale, on which order on demand shall be stated the amount of duties due to Government, calculated at five per cent., which duties shall be rigorously paid at St. Domingo by the certifier of the security of the letter of marque before granting a copy of the judgments of condemnation; and it is expressly forbid that the Registers deliver it, without a certificate from the collector of the duties of invalids, testifying the receipt of those duties which shall be attached to the original of the said judgment.

ART. 5. Conformably with the decree of the 12th Vendemiaire, 11th year, (October 3, 1803,) all the prizes made in contravention of the provisions of the laws and regulations concerning foreign commerce with the colony, shall continue to be adjudged by the ordinary tribunal of first instance at St. Domingo, with an appeal to the special commission established conformably with the same decree for deciding in the last resort; but having regard to the just representations of the owners of privateers, and on account of the considerable expense their equipments occasion, they shall not be liable to the expense of the process, further than to the mere fee for copies of the judgment, fixed at forty-four francs for each of the secretaries, both of the tribunal of first instance and the special commission of appeal. There shall be raised upon the produce of the duties paid in the bank of invalids of the marine, a sum to be divided in the form of a gratification among the members of the tribunal of first instance and those of the commission of appeal, designated by us to participate therein. This sum may not, in any case, exceed the fifth of that paid into the bank for the duties of any one prize; derogating thus far from the eighty-eighth and eighty-ninth articles of our regulation upon the organization of the Judiciary, dated the 5th of last complementary day, of which we suspend, as to those kind of judgments only, the execution until peace, when they shall resume their force and vigor. We, moreover, promise that we will take care, that the greatest celerity be used in all the proceedings relative to prizes.

ART. 6. Our agents or delegates in the neighboring neutral islands, in cases wherein they have proceeded to the institution of process concerning prize, shall receive, for their fee of agency, half per cent. upon the amount of the sales; but they shall not demand any fee of attendance for the crier employed in them.

ART. 7. In case of a judgment of condemnation, the agents or delegates of St. Domingo are bound to state, within three months, the accounts of liquidation and distribution of the proceeds of sales in the form prescribed by the laws, and to address them to the colonial inspector, in order that he may superintend their verification and registry or deposite.

ART. 8. At the time of the transmission of the proceedings and ship's papers to St. Domingo, our agents or delegates are to send us, as soon as possible, the captains, supercargoes, mates, sailors, and passengers, who shall have been taken on board of vessels detained in the act, and in evident communication with the ports of the rebels, appearing by clearances which they may have for those ports, or by those they may have received from the rebels; in order that they may be prosecuted according to the rigor of the laws.

As to captains, whose contravention may not be evidenced by the documents found on board, they shall be informed of the transmission of the ship's papers and proceedings to St. Domingo, with the offer to go with them, if they think proper, and with an express summons in every case to appear, by procuration or in person, within fifteen days, before the judges, who are to take cognizance of the stopping of their vessel, in order there to defend their rights. Mention shall be made of their acquiescence or refusal, in the declaration which shall be taken from them for the purpose.

ART. 9. The agents or delegates of St. Domingo are required to collect, with the greatest care, all the letters and documents which shall be found in vessels detained for communications with the rebels; to take away for the purpose of annexing to the process, only those which may give elucidations concerning the validity of the capture; and to transmit directly to us the remainder, by the most prompt and safe opportunities.

ART. 10. These letters and documents shall be dissected in our secretary's office by the interpreters of the Government; the documents shall be separated, which show the owners, insurers, freighters, merchants, dealers, captains, supercargoes, and others, connected by commercial relations or interests with the revolted blacks; which documents specially marked by the President Regent of the imperial audience or court of appeal, filling here the station of commissary of justice, shall be deposited as proofs of the offences, with those which are already in the registry of the special commission of appeal, established by the decree of the Government of the 12th Vendemiaire, 11th year, to adjudge the captures for contravention of the provisions of the laws and regulations concerning foreign commerce with the colony.

ART. 11. A list shall be drawn up by the same magistrate of the owners, insurers, freighters, merchants, traders, captains, supercargoes, and others, connected by commercial relations or interests with the rebels, and designated in the correspondence and documents deposited as proofs of the offences: at the head of this list shall be placed the owners and others interested in the vessels, stopped in the fact, and condemned as such from their clearances, either directly for the ports of the rebels, or proving that they are coming therefrom by receipts of duties, &c. The same operation shall take place every month. Copies of these lists shall be delivered to every cruiser bearing our letters of mart.

ART. 12. Every vessel whatsoever, under whatsoever flag it may navigate, on board of which shall be found invoices, bills of lading, and other documents, having a direct relation to one or more of the persons contained upon the list directed by the preceding article, shall be provisionally detained, without any regard to the distance of the territorial sea or place in which it may have been found, and shall be carried into port to be there examined. There, after the most exact researches, which shall be made by the competent tribunals, it shall be decided whether there be or not a ground of confiscation and condemnation, either of the vessel or of the whole or part of the cargo only; but in no case may the captured captain claim from the capturing cruiser any indemnity for the deviation from his route, or the delay in his voyage. Even the costs of suit shall in this case be borne by the captains.

ART. 13. Every cruiser, which shall take a vessel at anchor in a port occupied by the rebels, or navigating under the indegine flag, shall be exempt from all duties for his prize.

ART 14. Every cruiser which shall enter at St. Domingo, and convey provisions thither in case of a siege, shall enjoy the same exemption during a cruise of six months.

ART. 15. The present decree shall be transcribed upon the registers of the colonial inspection, of the tribunal of first instance, and of the special commission of appeal, adjudging, in the last resort, captures for contravention of the provisions of the laws and regulations concerning foreign commerce with the colony; it shall be transmitted to our agents and delegates, with an injunction to conform thereto; to the Governors and commandants of allied and neutral islands; to the minister plenipotentiary of France to the United States of America; and, finally, to His Excellency Monseigneur, the minister of marine and the colonies; in order to avail ourselves of every effort in order to repress a shameful and hostile traffic which tends to nourish the most odious of rebellions.

L. FERRAND.

[On the subject of Impressments.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to James Monroe, Esq., dated

JANUARY 5, 1804.

We consider a neutral flag on the high seas as a safeguard to those sailing under it. Great Britain, on the contrary, asserts a right to search for, and seize her own subjects; and under that cover, as cannot but happen, are often seized and taken off citizens of the United States, and citizens or subjects of other neutral countries, navigating the high seas, under the protection of the American flag.

Were the right of Great Britain in this case not denied, the abuses flowing from it would justify the United States in claiming and expecting a discontinuance of its exercise. But the right is denied, and on the best grounds.

Although Great Britain has not yet adopted, in the same latitude with most other nations, the immunities of a neutral flag, she will not deny the general freedom of the high seas, and of neutral vessels navigating them, with such exceptions only as are annexed to it, by the law of nations. She must produce, then, such an exception in the law of nations in favor of the right she contends for. But in what written and received authority will she find it? In what usage except her own will it be found? She will find in both, that a neutral vessel does not protect certain objects denominated contraband of war, including enemies serving in the war, nor articles going into a blockaded port, nor, as she has maintained, and as we have not contested, enemies' property of any kind. But no where will she find an exception to this freedom of the seas, and of neutral flags, which justifies the taking away of any person not an enemy in military service, found on board a neutral vessel.

If treaties, British as well as others, are to be consulted on this subject, it will equally appear that no countenance to the practice can be found in them. Whilst they admit a contraband of war, by enumerating its articles, and the effect of a real blockade by defining it, in no instance do they affirm or imply a right in any sovereign to enforce his claims to the allegiance of his subjects, on board neutral vessels, on the high seas. On the contrary, whenever a belligerent claim against persons on board a neutral vessel is referred to in treaties, enemies in military service alone are excepted from the general immunity of persons in that situation; and this exception confirms the immunity of those who are not included in it.

It is not, then, from the law or the usage of nations, nor from the tenor of treaties, that any sanction can be derived for the practice in question. And surely it will not be pretended, that the sovereignty of any nation extends in any case whatever beyond its own dominions, and its own vessels on the high seas. Such a doctrine would give just claims to all nations, and more than any thing would countenance the imputation of aspiring to an universal empire of the seas. It would be the less admissible too, as it would be applicable to times of peace, as well as to times of war, and to property as well as to persons. If the law of allegiance, which is a municipal law, be in force at all on the high seas, on board foreign vessels, it must be so at all times there, as it is within its acknowledged sphere. If the reason alleged for it be good in time of war, namely, that the sovereign has then a right to the service of all his subjects, it must be good at all times, because at all times he has the same right to their service. War is not the only occasion for which he may want their services, nor is external danger the only danger against which their services may be required for his security. Again, if the authority of a municipal law can operate on persons in foreign vessels on the high seas, because within the dominion of their sovereign they would be subject to that law, and are violating that law by being in that situation, how reject the inference that the authority of a municipal law may equally be enforced on board foreign vessels on the high seas, against articles of property exported in violation of such a law, or belonging to the country from which it was exported; and thus every commercial regulation in time of peace too, as well as of war, would be made obligatory on foreigners and their vessels, nor only whilst within the dominion of the sovereign making the regulation, but in every sea, and at every distance, where an armed vessel might meet with them. Another inference deserves attention. If the subjects of one sovereign may be taken by force from the vessels of another, on the high seas, the right of taking them when found implies the right of searching for them, a vexation of commerce, especially in time of peace, which has not yet been attempted, and which for that as well as other reasons may be regarded as contradicting the principle form which it would flow.

Taking reason and justice for the test of this practice, it is peculiarly indefensible, because it deprives the dearest rights of persons of a regular trial, to which the most inconsiderable article of property, captured on the high seas, is entitled, and leaves their destiny to the will of an officer, sometimes cruel, often ignorant, and generally interested, by his want of mariners, in his own decisions. Whenever property found in a neutral vessel is supposed to be liable on any ground to capture and condemnation, the rule in all cases is, that the question shall not be decided by the captor, but be carried before a legal tribunal, where a regular trial may be had, and where the captor himself is liable to damages for an abuse of his power. Can it be reasonable, then, or just, that a belligerent commander who is thus restricted and thus responsible in a case of mere property of trivial amount, should be permitted, without recurring to any tribunal whatever, to examine the crew of a neutral vessel, to decide the important question of their respective allegiances, and to carry that decision into instant execution, by forcing every individual he may choose into a service abhorrent to his feelings, cutting him off from his most tender connexions, exposing his mind and his person to the most humiliating discipline, and his life itself to the greatest dangers? Reason, justice, and humanity, unite in protesting against so extravagant a proceeding. And what is the pretext for it? It is that the similarity of language and of features between American citizens and British subjects, are such as not easily to be distinguished, and that without this arbitrary and summary authority to make the distinction, British subjects would escape, under the name of American citizens, from the duty which they owe to their sovereign. Is, then, the difficulty of distinguishing a mariner of one country from the mariner of the other, and the importance of his services, a good plea for referring the question whether he belongs to the one or to the other, to an arbitrary decision on the spot, by an interested and unresponsible officer? In all other cases the difficulty and the importance of questions are considered as reasons for requiring greater care and formality in investigating them, and greater security for a right decision on them. To say that precautions of this sort are incompatible with the object, is to admit that the object is unjustifiable; since the only means by which it can be pursued are such as cannot be justified.

The evil takes a deeper die when viewed in its practice as well as its principles. Were it allowable that British subjects should be taken out of American vessels on the high seas, it might at least be required that the proof of their allegiance should lie on the British side. This obvious and just rule is, however, reversed; and every seaman on board, though going from an American port, and sailing under the American flag, and sometimes even speaking an idiom proving him not to be a British subject, is presumed to be such unless shown to be an American citizen. It may safely be affirmed that this is an outrage and an indignity which has no precedent, and which Great Britain would be among the last nations in the world to suffer if offered to her own subjects and her own flag. Nor is it always against the right presumption alone, which is in favor of the citizenship corresponding with the flag, that the violation is committed. Not unfrequeutly it takes place in defiance of the most positive proof, certified in due form by an American officer. Let it not be said that in granting to American seamen this protection for their rights as such, the point is yielded, that the proof lies on the American side, and that the want of it in the prescribed form justifies the inference that the seaman is not of American allegiance. It is distinctly to be understood, that the certificate usually called a protection to American seamen, is not meant to protect them under their own or even any other neutral flag, on the high seas. We can never admit, that in such a situation any other protection is required for them, than the neutral flag itself on the high seas. The document is given to prove their real character, in situations to which neither the law of nations nor the law of their own country are applicable, in other words, to protect them within the jurisdiction of the British laws, and to secure to them, within every other jurisdiction, the rights and immunities due to them. If, in the course of their navigation even on the high seas, the document should have the effect of repelling wrongs of any sort, it is an incidental advantage only of which they avail themselves, and is by no means to be misconstrued into a right to exact such a proof, or to make any disadvantageous inference from the want of it.

Were it even admitted that certificates for protection might be justly required in time of war, from American seamen, they could only be required, in cases where the lapse of time from its commencement had given an opportunity for the American seamen to provide themselves with such a document. Yet it is certain, that in a variety of instances seamen have been impressed from American vessels, on the plea that they had not this proof of citizenship, when the dates and places of impressments demonstrated the impossibility of their knowing in time to provide the proof that a state of war had rendered it necessary.

Whether, therefore, we consult the law of nations, the tenor of treaties, or the dictates of reason and justice, no warrant, no pretext can be found for the British practice of making impressments from American vessels on the high seas.

Great Britain has the less to say in excuse for this practice, as it is in direct contradiction to the principles on which she proceeds in other cases. Whilst she claims and seizes, on the high seas, her own subjects voluntarily serving in American vessels, she has constantly given, when she could give, as a reason for not discharging from her service American citizens, that they had voluntarily engaged in it. Nay more, whilst she impresses her own subjects from the American service, although they may have been settled and married, and even naturalized in the United States, she constantly refuses to release from hers, American citizens impressed into it, whenever she can give for a reason, that they were either settled or married within her dominions. Thus, when the voluntary consent of the individual favors her pretensions, she pleads the validity of that consent. When the voluntary consent of the individuals stands in the way of her pretensions, it goes for nothing. When marriage or residence can be pleaded in her favor, she avails herself of the plea. When marriage and residence and even naturalization are against her, no respect whatever is paid to either; she takes by force her own subjects voluntarily serving in our vessels. She keeps by force American citizens involuntarily serving in hers. More flagrant inconsistencies cannot be imagined.

Notwithstanding the powerful motives which ought to be felt by the British Government to relinquish a practice which exposes it to so many reproaches, it is foreseen that objections of different sorts will be pressed on you. You will be told, first, of the great number of British seamen in the American trade, and of the necessity for their services in time of war and danger. Secondly, of the rights and the prejudice of the British nation, with respect to what are called the British or narrow seas, where its domain would be abandoned by the general stipulation required. Thirdly, of the use which would be made of such a sanctuary as that of American vessels, for desertions, and traitorous communications to her enemies, especially across the channel to France.

1st. With respect to the British seamen serving in our trade it may be remarked, first, that the number, though considerable, is probably less than may be supposed; secondly, that what is wrong in itself cannot be made right by considerations of expediency or advantage; thirdly, that it is proved by the fact, that the number of real British gained by the practice in question is of inconsiderable importance, even in the scale of advantage. The annexed report to Congress on the subject of impressments, with the addition of such cases as may be in the hands of Mr. Erving, will verify the remark in its application to the present war. The statement made by his predecessor during the last war, and which is also annexed, is in the same view still more conclusive. The statement comprehends not only all the applications made by him in the first instance, for the liberation of impressed seamen, between the month of June, 1797, and September, 1801, but many also which had been made previous to this agency, by Mr. Pinckney and Mr. King, and which it was necessary for him to renew. These applications, therefore, may fairly be considered as embracing the greater part of the period of the war; and as applications are known to be pretty indiscriminately made, they may be further considered as embracing if not the whole the far greater part of the impressments, those of British subjects as well as others. Yet the result exhibits two thousand and fifty-nine cases only, and of this number one hundred and two seamen only detained as being British subjects, which is less than one-twentieth of the number impressed; and one thousand one hundred and forty-two discharged or ordered to be so, as not being British subjects, which is more than half of the whole number, leaving eight hundred and five for further proof, with the strongest presumption, that the greater part, if not the whole, were Americans or other aliens, whose proof of citizenship had been lost or destroyed, or whose situation would account for the difficulty and delays in producing it. So that it is certain, that for all the British seamen gained by this violent proceeding, more than an equal number who were not so were the victims; it is highly probable that for every British seaman so gained, a number of others less than ten for one must have been the victims, and it is even probable that this number may have exceeded the proportion of twenty to one.

It cannot, therefore, be doubted that the acquisition of British seamen, by these impressments, whatever may be its advantage, is lost in the wrong done to Americans ignorantly or wilfully mistaken for British subjects, in the jealousy and ill-will excited among all maritime nations by an adherence to such a practice, and in the particular provocation to measures of redress on the part of the United States, not less disagreeable to them, then embarrassing to Great Britain, and which may threaten the good understanding which ought to be faithfully cultivated by both. The copy of a bill brought into Congress under the influence of violations committed on our flag, gives force to this latter consideration. Whether it will pass into a law, and at the present session, is more than can yet be said. As there is every reason to believe, that it has been proposed with reluctance, it will probably not be pursued into effect, if any hope can be supported of a remedy by an amicable arrangement between the two nations.

There is a further consideration which ought to have weight in this question. Although the British seamen employed in carrying on American commerce be in some respect lost to their own nation, yet such is the intimate and extensive connexion of this commerce, direct and circuitous, with the commerce, the manufactures, the revenue and the general resources of the British nation, that, in other respects, its mariners, on board American vessels, may truly be said to be rendering it the most valuable services. It would not be extravagant to make it a question, whether great Britain would not suffer more by withdrawing her seamen from the merchant vessels of the United States, than her enemies would suffer from the addition of them to the crews of her ships of war and cruisers.

Should any difficulty be started concerning seamen born within the British dominions and naturalized by the United States, since the treaty of 1783, you may remove it by observing, first, that very few if any such naturalizations can take place, the law here requiring a preparatory residence of five years, with notice of the intention to become a citizen entered of record two years before the last necessary formality; besides a regular proof of good moral character, conditions little likely to be complied with by ordinary seafaring persons: secondly, that a discontinuance of impressments on the high seas will preclude an actual collision between the interfering claims. Within the jurisdiction of each nation, and in their respective vessels on the high seas, each will enforce the allegiance which it claims. In other situations the individuals doubly claimed will be within a jurisdiction independent of both nations.

2d. The British pretensions to domain over the narrow seas are so absolute, and so indefensible, that they never would have occurred as a probable objection in this case, if they had not actually frustrated an arrangement settled by Mr. King with the British ministry on the subject of impressments from American vessels on the high seas. At the moment when the articles were expected to be signed, an exception of the "narrow seas" was urged and insisted on by Lord St. Vincent; and being utterly inadmissible on our part, the negotiation was abandoned.

The objection in itself has certainly not the slightest foundation. The time has been, indeed, when England not only claimed but exercised pretensions scarcely inferior to full sovereignty over the seas surrounding the British isles, and even as far as Cape Finesterre to the south, and Van Staten in Norway to the north. It was a time, however, when reason had little share in determining the law, and the intercourse of nations, when power alone decided questions of rights, and when the ignorance and want of concert among other maritime countries facilitated such an usurpation.

The progress of civilization and information has produced a change in all those respects; and no principle in the code of public law is at present better established than the common freedom of the seas beyond a very limited distance from the territories washed by them. This distance is not, indeed, fixed with absolute precision. It is varied in a small degree by written authorities, and perhaps it may be reasonably varied in some degree by local peculiarities. But the greatest distance which would now be listened to any where would make a small proportion of the narrowest part of the narrowest seas in question.

What are, in fact, the prerogatives claimed and exercised by Great Britain over these seas? If they were really a part of her domain, her authority would be the same there as within her other domain. Foreign vessels would be subject to all the laws and regulations framed for them, as much as if they were within the harbors or rivers of the country. Nothing of this sort is pretended. Nothing of this sort would be tolerated. The only instances in which these seas are distinguished from other seas, or in which Great Britain enjoys within them any distinction over other nations are, first, the compliment paid by other flags to hers; secondly, the extension of her territorial jurisdiction in certain cases to the distance of four leagues from the coast. The first is a relic of ancient usurpation, which has thus long escaped the correction, which modern and more enlightened times have applied to other usurpations. The prerogative has been often contested, however, even at the expense of bloody wars, and is still borne with ill will and impatience by her neighbors. At the last treaty of peace at Amiens, the abolition of it was repeatedly and strongly pressed by France; and it is not improbable, that at no remote day it will follow the fate of the title of "King of France" so long worn by the British monarchs, and at length so properly sacrificed to the lessons of a magnanimous wisdom. As far as this homage to the British flag has any foundation at present, it rests merely on long usage, and long acquiescence, which are construed, as in a few other cases of maritime claims, into the effect of a general, though tacit convention. The second instance is the extension of the territorial jurisdiction to four leagues from the shore. This, too, as far as the distance may exceed that which is generally allowed, rests on a like foundation, strengthened, perhaps, by the local facility of smuggling, and the peculiar interest which Great Britain has in preventing a practice affecting so deeply her whole system of revenue, commerce, and manufactures: whilst the limitation itself to four leagues necessarily implies that beyond that distance no territorial jurisdiction is assumed.

But, whatever may be the origin or the value of these prerogatives over foreign flags in one case, and within a limited portion of these seas in another, it is obvious that neither of them will be violated by the exemption of American vessels from impressments, which are nowise connected with either; having never been made on the pretext either of withholding the wonted homage to the British flag, or of smuggling in defiance of British laws.

This extension of the British law to four leagues from the shore is inferred from an act of Parliament, passed in the year 1736, (9 Geo. 2. c. 35,) the terms of which comprehend all vessels foreign as well as British; it is possible, however, that the former are constructively excepted. Should your inquiries ascertain this to be the case, you will find yourself on better ground than the concession here made.

With respect to the compliment paid to the British flag, it is also possible that more is here conceded than you may find to be necessary. After the peace of 1783, this compliment was peremptorily withheld by France, in spite of the remonstrances of Great Britain; and it remains for your inquiry, whether it did not continue to be refused, notwithstanding the failure at Amiens to obtain from Great Britain a formal renunciation of the claim.

From every view of the subject, it is reasonable to expect, that the exception of the narrow seas from the stipulation against impressments, will not be inflexibly maintained: should it be so, your negotiation will be at an end. The truth is, that so great a proportion of our trade, direct and circuitous, passes through those channels, and such is its peculiar exposure in them to the wrong practised, that, with such an exception, any remedy would be very partial. And we can never consent to purchase a partial remedy by confirming a general evil, and by subjecting ourselves to our own reproaches as well as to those of other nations.

3d. It appears, as well by a letter from Mr. Thornton, in answer to one from me, of both which copies are enclosed, as from conversations with Mr. Merry, that the facility which would be given, particularly in the British channel, by the immunity claimed for American vessels, to the escape of traitors, and the desertion of others whose services, in time of war, may be particularly important to an enemy, forms one of the pleas for the British practice of examining American crews; and will be one of the objections to a formal relinquishment of it.

This plea, like all others, admits a solid and satisfactory reply. In the first place, if it could prevail at all against the neutral claim, it would authorize the seizure of the persons described only, and in vessels bound to a hostile country only; whereas, the practice of impressing is applied to persons, few or any of whom are alleged to be of either description, and to vessels whithersoever found, even to Great Britain herself. In the next place, it is not only a preference of the smaller object on one side to a greater object on the other, but a sacrifice of right on one side to expediency on the other side.

[On the subject of the Colonial Trade.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to James Monroe, Esq.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 12, 1805.

The papers herewith enclosed explain particularly the case of the brig Aurora.

The sum of the case is, that while Spain was at war with Great Britain, this vessel, owned by a citizen of the United States, brought a cargo of Spanish produce, purchased at the Havana, from that place to Charleston, where the cargo was landed, except an insignificant portion of it, and the duties paid, or secured, according to law, in like manner as they are required to be paid, or secured, on a like cargo, from whatever port, meant for home consumption; that the cargo remained on land about three weeks, when it was reshipped for Barcelona, in old Spain, and the duties drawn back, with a deduction of three and half per cent. as is permitted to imported articles in all cases, at any time within one year, under certain regulations, which were pursued in this case; that the vessel was taken on her voyage by a British cruiser, and sent for trial to Newfoundland, where the cargo was condemned by the court of Vice-Admiralty; and that the cause was carried thence, by appeal, to Great Britain, where it was apprehended that the sentence below would not be reversed.

The ground of this sentence was, and that of its confirmation, if such be the result, must be, that the trade in which the vessel was engaged was unlawful, and this unlawfulness must rest, first, on the general principle assumed by Great Britain, that a trade from a colony to its parent country, being a trade not permitted to other nations in time of peace, cannot be made lawful to them in time of war; secondly, on the allegation that the continuity of the voyage from the Havana to Barcelona was not broken by landing the cargo in the United States, paying the duties thereon, and thus fulfilling the legal pre-requisites to a home consumption; and, therefore, that the cargo was subject to condemnation, even under the British regulation of January, 1798, which so far relaxes the general principle as to allow a direct trade between a belligerent colony, and a neutral country carrying on such a trade.

With respect to the general principle, which disallows to neutral nations, in time of war, a trade not allowed to them in time of peace, it may be observed—

First, That the principle is of modern date; that it is maintained, as is believed, by no other nation but Great Britain; and that it was assumed by her under the auspices of a maritime ascendency, which rendered such a principle subservient to her particular interest. The history of her regulations on this subject shows that they have been constantly modified under the influence of that consideration. The course of these modifications will be seen in an appendix to the fourth volume of Robinson's Admiralty Reports.

Secondly, That the principle is manifestly contrary to the general interest of commercial nations, as well as to the law of nations settled by the most approved authorities, which recognises no restraints on the trade of nations not at war, with nations at war, other than that it shall be impartial between the latter, that it shall not extend to certain military articles, nor to the transportation of persons in military service, nor to places actually blockaded or besieged.

Thirdly, That the principle is the more contrary to reason and to right, inasmuch as the admission of neutrals into a colonial trade shut against them in times of peace, may, and often does, result from considerations which open to neutrals direct channels of trade with the parent state, shut to them in times of peace, the legality of which latter relaxation is not known to have been contested; and inasmuch as a commerce may be, and frequently is opened in time of war, between a colony and other countries, from considerations which are not incident to the war, and which would produce the same effect in a time of peace; such, for example, as a failure or diminution of the ordinary sources of necessary supplies, or new turns in the course of profitable interchanges.

Fourthly, That it is not only contrary to the principles and practice of other nations, but to the practice of Great Britain herself. It is well known to be her invariable practice in time of war, by relaxations in her navigation laws, to admit neutrals to trade in channels forbidden to them in times of peace; and particularly to open her colonial trade both to neutral vessels and supplies, to which it is shut in times of peace: and that one at least of her objects, in these relaxations, is to give to her trade an immunity from capture, to which in her own hands it would be subjected by the war.

Fifthly, The practice which has prevailed in the British dominions, sanctioned by orders of council and an act of parliament, [39 G. 3. c. 98.] authorizing for British subjects a direct trade with the enemy, still further diminishes the force of her pretensions for depriving us of the colonial trade. Thus we see in Robinson's Admiralty Reports passim, that during the last war a licensed commercial intercourse prevailed between Great Britain and her enemies, France, Spain, and Holland, because it comprehended articles necessary for her manufactures and agriculture; notwithstanding the effect it had in opening a vent to the surplus productions of the others. In this manner she assumes to suspend the war itself as to particular objects of trade beneficial to herself; whilst she denies the right of the other belligerents to suspend their accustomed commercial restrictions, in favor of neutrals. But the injustice and inconsistency of her attempt to press a strict rule on neutrals, is more forcibly displayed by the nature of the trade which is openly carried on between the colonies of Great Britain and Spain, in the West Indies. The mode of it is detailed in the enclosed copy of a letter from ——— wherein it will be seen that American vessels and cargoes, after being condemned in British courts, under pretence of illicit commerce, are sent, on British account, to the enemies of Great Britain, if not to the very port of the destination interrupted when they were American property. What respect can be claimed from others, to a doctrine not only of so recent an origin, and enforced with so little uniformity, but which is so conspicuously disregarded in practice by the nation itself, which stands alone in contending for it?

Sixthly, It is particularly worthy of attention that the Board of Commissioners, jointly constituted by the British and American Governments, under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794, by reversing condemnations of the British courts founded on the British instructions of November, 1793, condemned the principle, that a trade forbidden to neutrals in time of peace, could not be opened to them in time of war: on which precise principle these instructions were founded. And as the reversal could be justified by no other authority than the law of nations, by which they were guided, the law of nations, according to that joint tribunal, condemns the principle here combated. Whether the British Commissioners concurred in these reversals does not appear, but whether they did, or did not, the decision was equally binding; and affords a precedent which could not be disrespected by a like succeeding tribunal, and ought not to be without great weight with both nations, in like questions recurring between them.

On these grounds the United States may justly regard the British captures and condemnations of neutral trade, with colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, as violations of right; and if reason, consistency, or that sound policy which cannot be at variance with either, be allowed the weight which they ought to have, the British Government will feel sufficient motives to repair the wrongs done in such cases by its cruisers and courts.

But, apart from this general view of the subject, a refusal to indemnify the sufferers, in the particular case of the Aurora, is destitute of every pretext, because, in the second place, the continuity of her voyage was clearly and palpably broken, and the trade converted into a new character.

It has been already noted that the British regulation of 1798 admits a direct trade, in time of war, between a belligerent colony and neutral country carrying on the trade; and admits consequently the legality of the importation by the Aurora, from the Havana to Charleston. Nor has it ever been pretended that a neutral nation has not a right to re-export to any belligerent country whatever foreign productions, not contraband of war, which may have been duly incorporated and naturalized, as a part of the commercial stock of the country re-exporting it.

The question, then, to be decided under the British regulation itself, is, whether in landing the cargo, paying the duties, and thus as effectually qualifying the articles for the legal consumption of the country, as if they had been its native productions, they were not, at the same time, equally qualified with native productions for exportation to a foreign market. That such ought to be the decision results irresistibly from the following considerations:

1. From the respect which is due to the internal regulations of every country, where they cannot be charged with a temporizing partiality towards particular belligerent parties, or with fraudulent views towards all of them. The regulations of the United States on this subject must be free from every possible imputation, being not only fair in their appearance, but just in their principles, and having continued the same during the periods of war, as they were in those of peace. It may be added that they probably correspond, in every essential feature relating to re-exportation, with the laws of other commercial countries, and particularly with those of Great Britain. The annexed outline of them, by the Secretary of the Treasury, will at once explain their character, and show that, in the case of the Aurora, every legal requisite was duly complied with.

2. From the impossibility of substituting any other admissible criterion, than that of landing the articles, and otherwise qualifying them for the use of the country. If this regular and customary proceeding be not a barrier against further inquires, where, it may be asked, are the inquires to stop? By what evidence are particular articles to be identified on the high seas, or before a foreign tribunal? If identified, how is it to be ascertained whether they were imported with a view to be the market at home, or to a foreign market, or, as ought always to presumed, to the one or the other, as it should happen to invite? or if to a foreign market, whether to one forbidden or permitted by the British regulations? for it is to be recollected that among the modifications which her policy has given to the general principle asserted by her, a direct trade is permitted to a neutral carrier from a belligerent colony, to her ports, as well as to those of his own country. If, again, the landing of the goods and the payment of the duties be not sufficient to break the continuity of the voyage, what, it may be asked, is the degree of internal change or alienation which will have that effect? May not a claim be set up to trace the articles from hand to hand, from ship to ship, in the same port, and even from one port to another port, as long as they remain in the country? In a word, in departing from the simple criterion provided by the country itself, for its own legitimate and permanent objects, it is obvious, that, besides the defalcations which might be committed on our carrying trade, pretexts will be given to cruisers for endless vexations on our commerce at large, and that a latitude and delays will accrue in the distant proceedings of admiralty courts, still more ruinous and intolerable.

3. From the decision in the British High Court of Admiralty itself, given in the case of the Polly, Lasky, master, by a judge deservedly celebrated for a profound judgement, which cannot be suspected of leaning towards doctrines unjust or injurious to the rights of his own country. On that occasion he expressly declares; "It is not my business to say what is universally the test of a bona fide importation: it is argued that it would be sufficient that the duties should be paid, and that the cargo should be landed. If these criteria are not to be resorted to, I should be at a loss to know what should be the test; and I am strongly disposed to hold, that it would be sufficient that the goods should be landed and the duties paid." 2 Rob. Reports, p. 368-9.

The President has thought it proper that you should be furnished with such a view of the subject as is here sketched; that you may make the use of it best suited to the occasion. If the trial of the Aurora should not be over, it is questionable whether the Government will interfere with its courts. Should the trial be over, and the sentence of the Vice Admiralty Court at St. John's have been confirmed, you are to lose no time in presenting to the British Government a representation corresponding with the scope of these observations; and in urging that redress in the case, which is equally due to private justice, to the reasonable expectations of the United States, and to that confidence and harmony which ought to be cherished between the two nations.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of Great Britain.

No. 12, Great Cumberland Place, September 23, 1805.

My Lord:

I flattered myself, from what passed in our last interview, that I should have been honored before this with an answer from your lordship to my letters respecting the late seizure of American vessels. I understood it to be agreed that the discussion which then took place should be considered as inofficial, as explanatory only of the ideas which we might respectively entertain on the subject, and that your lordship would afterwards give me such a reply to my letters respecting that measure as His Majesty's Government might desire to have communicated to the Government of the United States. In consequence, I have since waited with anxiety such a communication, in the daily expectation of receiving it. It is far from being my desire to give your lordship any trouble in this business which I can avoid, as the time which has since elapsed sufficiently shows; but the great importance of the subject, which has, indeed, become more so, by the continuance of the same policy, and the frequency of seizures which are still made of American vessels, place me in a situation of peculiar responsibility. My Government will expect of me correct information on this point, in all its views, and I am very desirous of complying with its just expectation. I must, therefore, again request that your lordship will be so good as to enable me to make such a representation to my Government of that measure as His Majesty's Government may think proper to give.

I am sorry to add, that the longer I have reflected on the subject, the more confirmed I have been in the objections to the measure. If we examine it in reference to the law of nations, it appears to me to be repugnant to every principle of that law; if by the understanding, or, as it may be more properly called, the agreement of our Governments respecting the commerce in question, I consider it equally repugnant to the principles of that agreement. In both these views your lordship will permit me to make some additional remarks on this subject.

By the law of nations, as settled by the most approved writers, no other restraint is acknowledged on the trade of neutral nations with those at war than that it be impartial between the latter; that it shall not extend to articles which are deemed contraband of war, nor to the transportation of persons in military service, nor to places actually blockaded or besieged. Every other commerce of a neutral with a belligerent is considered a lawful commerce; and every other restraint on it to either of the belligerents by the other an unlawful restraint.

The list of contraband is well defined, as are also the circumstances which constitute a blockade. The best authorities have united in confining the first to such articles as are used in war, and are applicable to military purposes; and in requiring, to constitute the latter, the disposition of such a force, consisting of stationary ships, so near the port, by the Power which attacks it, as to make it dangerous for the vessel of a neutral Power to enter it. The late treaty between Great Britain and Russia designates these circumstances as necessary to constitute a blockade, and it is believed that it was never viewed before in a light more favorable to the invading Power. The vessels condemned were engaged in a commerce between the United States and some port in Europe, or between those States and the West India islands, belonging to an enemy of Great Britain. In the European voyage, the cargo consisted of the productions of the colonies; in the voyage to the West Indies, it consisted of the goods of the Power to which the colony belonged, and to which the ship was destined. The ship and cargo, in every case, were the property of American citizens, and the cargo had been landed, and the duty on it paid, in the United States. It was decided that these voyages were continuous; and the vessels and cargoes were condemned, on the principle that the commerce was illegal. I beg to refer more especially in this statement to the case of the Essex, an appeal from the judgment of the Vice Admiralty court at New Providence, in which the Lords Commissioners of Appeals, in confirming that judgment, established this doctrine.

It requires but a slight view of the subject to be satisfied that these condemnations are incompatible with the law of nations, as above stated. None of the cases have involved a question of contraband, of blockade, or of any other kind, that was ever contested till of late in favor of a belligerent against a neutral Power. It is not on any principle that is applicable to any such case that the measure can be defended. On what principle, then, is it supported by Great Britain? What is the nature and extent of her doctrine? What are the circumstances which recommend the arguments which support it? For information on these points we cannot refer to the well known writers on the law of nations; no illustration can be obtained from them of a doctrine which they never heard of. We must look for it to an authority more modern; to one which, however respectable for the learning and professional abilities of the judge who presides, is nevertheless one which, from many considerations, is not obligatory on other Powers. In a report of the decisions of the Court of Admiralty of this kingdom, we find a notice of a series of orders issued by the Government, of different dates and imports, which have regulated this business. The first of these bears date on the 6th of November, 1793; the second on the 8th of January, 1794; the third on the 25th of January, 1798. Other orders have been issued since the commencement of the present war. It is these orders which have authorized the seizures that were made at different times in the course of the last war, and were lately made by British cruisers of the vessels of the United States. They, too, form the law which has governed the courts in the decisions on the several cases which have arisen under those seizures. The first of these orders prohibits altogether every species of commerce between neutral countries and enemies' colonies, and between neutral and other countries, in the productions of those colonies, the second and subsequent orders modify it in various forms. The doctrine, however, in every decision, is the same: it is contended in each that the character and just extent of the principle is to be found in the first order, and that every departure from it since has been a relaxation of the principle, not claimed of right by neutral Powers, but conceded in their favor gratuitously by Great Britain.

In support of these orders, it is urged that, as the colonial trade is a system of monopoly to the parent country, in time of peace, neutral Powers have no right to participate in it in time of war, although they be permitted so to do by the parent country: that a belligerent has a right to interdict them from such a commerce. It is on this system of internal restraint, this regulation of colonial trade by the Powers having colonies, that a new principle of the law of nations is attempted to be founded: one which seeks to discriminate in respect to the commerce of neutral Powers with a belligerent, between different parts of the territory of the same Power, and likewise subverts many other principles of great importance, which have heretofore been held sacred among nations. It is believed that so important a superstructure was never raised on so slight a foundation. Permit me to ask, does it follow, because the parent country monopolises in peace the whole commerce of its colonies, that in war it should have no right to regulate it at all? That, on the contrary, it should be construed to transfer, in equal extent, a right to its enemy, to the prejudice of the parent country, of the colonies, and of neutral Powers? If this doctrine was sound, it would certainly institute a new and singular mode of acquiring and losing rights; one which would be highly advantageous to one party, while it was equally injurious to the other. To the colonies more especially, it would prove peculiarly onerous and oppressive. It is known that they are essentially dependent for their existence on supplies from other countries, especially the United States of America, who, being in their neighborhood, have the means of furnishing them with greatest certainty, and on the best terms. Is it not sufficient that they be subjected to that restraint in peace, when the evils attending it by the occasional interference of the parent country may be, and are, frequently repaired? Is it consistent with justice or humanity, that it should be converted into a principle in favor of an enemy, inexorable of course, but otherwise without the means of listening to their complaints, not for their distress or oppression only, but for their extermination? But there are other insuperable objections to this doctrine. Are not the colonies of every country a part of its domain, and do they not continue to be so until they are severed from it by conquest? Is not the power to regulate commerce incident to the sovereignty, and is it not co-extensive over the whole territory which any Government possesses? Can one belligerent acquire any right to the territory of another, but by conquest? And can any rights which appertain thereto, be otherwise defeated or curtailed in war? In whatever light, therefore, the subject is viewed, it appears to me evident that this doctrine cannot be supported. No distinction founded in reason can be taken between the different parts of the territory of the same Power to justify it. The separation of one portion from another by the sea, gives lawfully to the belligerent, which is superior on that element, a vast ascendency in all the concerns on which the success of the war, or the relative prosperity of their respective dominions may in any degree depend. It opens to such Power ample means for its own aggrandizement, and for the harassment and distress of its adversary. With these it should be satisfied. But neither can that circumstance, nor can any of internal arrangement which any Power may adopt for the government of its dominions, be construed to give to its enemy any other advantage over it. They certainly do not justify the doctrine in question, which asserts that the law of nations varies in its application to different portions of the territory of the same Power: that it operates in one mode in respect to one, and in another, or even not at all, in respect to another; that the rights of humanity of neutral Powers and all other rights are to sink before it.

It is further urged that neutral Powers ought not to complain of this restraint, because they stand under it on the same ground with respect to that commerce which they held in time of peace. But this fact, if true, gives no support to the pretension. The claim involves a question of right, not of interest. If the neutral Powers have a right in war to such commerce with the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, as the parent States respectively allowed, they ought not to be deprived of it by her, nor can its just claims be satisfied by any compromise of the kind alluded to. For this argument to have the weight which it is intended to give it, the commerce of the neutral Powers with those colonies should be placed and preserved through the war, in the same state as if it had not occurred. Great Britain should in respect to them take the place of the parent country, and do every thing which the latter would have done, had there been no war. To discharge that duty, it would be necessary for her to establish such a police over the colony, as to be able to examine the circumstances attending it annually, to ascertain whether the crops were abundant, supplies from other quarters had failed, and eventually to decide whether under such circumstances the parent country would have opened the ports to neutral Powers. But these offices cannot be performed by any Power which is not in possession of the colony; that can only be obtained by conquest, in which case the victor would of course have a right to regulate its trade as it thought fit.

It is also said, that neutral Powers have no right to profit of the advantages which are gained in war by the arms of Great Britain. This argument has even less weight than the others. It does not, in truth, apply at all to the question. Neutral Powers do not claim a right, as already observed, to any commerce with the colonies which Great Britain may have conquered of her enemies, otherwise than on the conditions which she imposes. The point in question turns on the commerce which they are entitled to with the colonies which she has not conquered, but still remain subject to the dominion of the parent country. With such it is contended, for reasons which have been already given, that neutral Powers have a right to enjoy all the advantages in trade which the parent country allows them; a right of which the mere circumstance of war cannot deprive them. If Great Britain had a right to prohibit that commerce, it existed before the war began, and of course before she had gained any advantage over her enemies. If it did not then exist, it certainly does not at the present time. Rights of the kind in question cannot depend on the fortune of war, or other contingencies. The law which regulates them is invariable, until it be changed by the competent authority. It forms a rule equally between belligerent Powers, and between neutral and belligerent, which is dictated by reason and sanctioned by the usage and consent of nations.

The foregoing considerations have, it is presumed, proved that the claim of Great Britain to prohibit the commerce of neutral Powers, in the manner proposed, is repugnant to the law of nations. If, however, any doubt remained on that point, other considerations which may be urged cannot fail to remove it. The number of orders of different imports which have been issued by Government, to regulate the seizure of neutral vessels, is a proof that there is no established law for the purpose. And the strictness with which the courts have followed those orders, through their various modifications, is equally a proof that there is no other authority for the government of their decisions. If the order of the 6th of November, 1793, contained the true doctrine of the law of nations, there would have been no occasion for those which followed, nor is it probable that they would have been issued: indeed, if that order had been in conformity with that law, there would have been no occasion for it. As in the cases of blockade and contraband, the law would have been well known without an order, especially one so very descriptive; the interest of the cruisers, which is always sufficiently active, would have prompted them to make the seizures, and the opinions of eminent writers, which in that case would not have been wanting, would have furnished the courts the best authority for their decisions.

I shall now proceed to show that the decisions complained of are contrary to the understanding, or what, perhaps, may more properly be called an agreement of the two Governments on the subject. By the order of the 6th November, 1793, some hundreds of American vessels were seized, carried into port, and condemned. Those seizures and condemnations became the subject of an immediate negotiation between the two nations, which terminated in a treaty, by which it was agreed to submit the whole subject to commissioners, who should be invested with full power to settle the controversy which had thus arisen. That stipulation was carried into complete effect: commissioners were appointed, who examined laboriously and fully all the cases of seizure and condemnation which had taken place, and finally decided on the same; in which decisions, they condemned the principle of the order, and awarded compensation to those who had suffered under it. Those awards have been since fairly and honorably discharged by Great Britain. It merits particular attention that a part of the twelfth article of that treaty referred expressly to the point in question, and that it was, on the solemn deliberation of each Government, by their mutual consent, expunged from it. It seems, therefore, to be impossible to consider that transaction, under all the circumstances attending it, in any other light than as a fair and amicable adjustment of the question between the parties—one which authorized the just expectation that it would never have become again a cause of complaint between them. The sense of both was expressed on it in a manner too marked and explicit to admit of a different conclusion. The subject, too, was of a nature that when once settled ought to be considered as settled forever. It is not like questions of commerce between two Powers, which affect their internal concerns, and depend, of course, on the internal regulations of each. When these latter are arranged by treaty, the rights which accrue to each party under it in the interior of the other cease when the treaty expires. Each has a right afterwards to decide for itself in what manner that concern shall be regulated in future, and in that decision to consult solely its interest.

But the present topic is of a very different character. It involves no question of commerce or other internal concern between the two nations. It respects the commerce only which either may have with the enemies of the other in time of war. It involves, therefore, only a question of right, under the law of nations, which in its nature cannot fluctuate. It is proper to add that the conclusion above mentioned was further supported by the important fact, that, until the late decree in the case of the Essex, not one American vessel engaged in this commerce had been condemned on this doctrine; that several which were met in the channel by the British cruisers were permitted, after an examination of their papers, to pursue their voyage. This circumstance justified the opinion that that commerce was deemed a lawful one by Great Britain.

There is another ground on which the late seizures and condemnations are considered as highly objectionable, and to furnish just cause of complaint to the United States. Until the final report of the commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794, which was not made until last year, it is admitted that their arbitrament was not obligatory on the parties in the sense in which it is now contended to be. Every intermediate declaration, however, by Great Britain, of her sense on the subject, must be considered as binding on her, as it laid the foundation of commercial enterprises, which were thought to be secure while within that limit. Your lordship will permit me to refer you to several examples of this kind, which were equally formal and official, in which the sense of His Majesty's Government was declared very differently from what it has been in the late condemnations. In Robinson's Reports, vol. 2, page 368, (case the Polly, Lasky, master,) it seems to have been clearly established by the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, that an American has a right to import the produce of an enemy's colony into the United States, and to send it on afterwards to the general commerce of Europe; and that the landing the goods and paying the duties in the United States should preclude all further question relative to the voyage. The terms "for his own use," which are to be found in the report, are obviously intended to assert the claim only that the property shall be American, and not that of an enemy; by admitting the right to send on the produce afterwards to the general commerce of Europe, it is not possible that those terms should convey any other idea. A bona fide importation is also held by the judge to be satisfied by the landing the goods and paying the duties. This, therefore, is, I think, the true import of that decision. The doctrine is again laid down, in still more explicit terms, by the Government itself, in a correspondence between Lord Hawkesbury and my predecessor, Mr. King. The case was precisely similar to those which have been lately before the Court. Mr. King complained, in a letter of March 18, 1801, that the cargo of an American vessel, going from the United States to a Spanish colony, had been condemned by the Viceadmiralty Court of Nassau, on the ground that it was of the growth of Spain, which decision he contended was contrary to the law of nations, and requested that suitable instructions might be despatched to the proper officers in the West Indies, to prevent like abuses in future. Lord Hawkesbury, in a reply of April 11th, communicated the report of the King's advocate general, in which it is expressly stated, that the produce of an enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and re-exported thence to the mother country; and, in like manner, in that circuitous mode, that the produce and manufactures of the mother country might find their way to its colonies; that the landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country broke the continuity of the voyage, and legalized the trade, although the goods were re-shipped in the same vessel, on account of the same neutral proprietors, and forwarded for sale to the mother country of the colony. It merits attention in this report, (so clearly and positively is the doctrine laid down that the landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country broke the continuity of the voyage,) that it is stated as a doubtful point whether the mere touching in the neutral country to obtain fresh clearances will be considered in the light of the direct trade; that no positive inhibition is insisted on any but the direct trade between the mother country and the colonies. This doctrine, in the light herein stated, is also to be found in the treaty between Great Britain and Russia, June 17, 1801. By the second section of the third article, the commerce of neutrals, in the productions or manufactures of the enemies of Great Britain, which have become the property of the neutral, is declared to be free. That section was afterwards explained by a declaratory article of October 20, of the same year, by which it is agreed that it shall not be understood to authorize neutrals to carry the produce or merchandise of an enemy either directly from the colonies to the parent country, or from the parent country to the colonies. In other respects, the commerce was left on the footing on which it was placed by that section, perfectly free, except in the direct trade between the colony and the parent country. It is worthy of remark, that as, by the reference made in the explanatory article of the treaty with Russia, to the United States of America, it was supposed that those States and Russia, Denmark, and Sweden, had a common interest in neutral questions, so it was obviously intended, from the similarity of sentiment which is observable between that treaty as amended and the report of the advocate general above mentioned, to place all the parties on the same footing. After these acts of the British Government, which, being official, were made public, it was not to be expected that any greater restraint would have been contemplated by it, on that commerce, than they impose; that an inquiry would ever have been made, not whether the property with which an American vessel was charged belonged to a citizen of the United States or an enemy, but whether it belonged to this or that American—an inquiry which imposes a condition which it is believed that no independent nation, having a just sense of what it owes to its rights or its honor, can ever comply with. Much less was it to be expected that such a restraint would have been thought of after the report of the commissioners above adverted to, which seemed to have placed the rights of the United States incontestably on a much more liberal and, as is contended, just footing.

It is proper to add, that the decree of the Lords Commissioners of Appeals in the case of the Essex produced the same effect as an order from the Government would have done. Prior to that decree, from the commencement of the war, the commerce in question was pursued by the citizens of the United States, as has been already observed, without molestation. It is presumable that till then His Majesty's cruisers were induced to forbear a seizure by the same considerations which induced the American citizens to engage in the commerce—a belief that it was a lawful one. The facts above mentioned were equally before the parties, and it is not surprising that they should have drawn the same conclusion from them. That decree, however, opened a new scene. It certainly gave a signal to the cruisers to commence the seizures, which they have not failed to do, as has been sufficiently felt by the citizens of the United States who have suffered under it. According to the information which has been given me, about fifty vessels have been brought into the ports of Great Britain in consequence of it; and there is reason to believe that the same system is pursued in the West Indies and elsewhere. The measure is the more to be complained of, because Great Britain had, in permitting the commerce for two years, given a sanction to it by her conduct, and nothing had occurred to create a suspicion that her sentiments varied from her conduct. Had that been the case, or had she been disposed to change her conduct in that respect towards the United States, it might reasonably have been expected that some intimation would have been given of it before the measure was carried into effect. Between Powers who are equally desirous of preserving the relations of friendship with each other, notice might in all such cases be expected. But, in the present case, the obligation to give it seemed to be peculiarly strong. The existence of a negotiation which had been sought on the part of the United States, some considerable time before my departure from Spain, for the express purpose of adjusting amicably and fairly all such questions between the two nations, and postponed on that occasion to accommodate the views of His Majesty's Government, furnished a suitable opportunity for such an intimation, while it could not otherwise than increase the claim to it.

In this communication, I have made no comment on the difference which is observable in the import of the several orders which have regulated, at different times, the seizure of neutral vessels, some of which were more moderate than others. It is proper, however, to remark here, that those which were issued, or even that any had been issued, since the commencement of the present war, were circumstances not known till very lately; on principle, it is acknowledged that they are to be viewed in the same light, and it has been my object to examine them by that standard, without going into detail, or marking the shades of difference between them. I have made the examination with that freedom and candor which belongs to a subject of very high importance to the United States; the result of which has been, as I presume, to prove that all the orders are repugnant to the law of nations, and that the late condemnations, which have revived the pretension on the part of Great Britain, are not only repugnant to that law, but to the understanding which it was supposed had taken place between the two Powers respecting the commerce in question.

I cannot conclude this note without adverting to the other topics depending between our Governments, which it is also much wished to adjust at this time. These are well known to your lordship, and it is therefore unnecessary to add any thing on them at present. With a view to perpetuate the friendship of the two nations, no unnecessary cause of collision should be left open. Those adverted to are believed to be of this kind, such as the case of boundary, the impressment of seamen, &c., since it is presumed that there can be no real conflicting interest between them on those points. The general commercial relation may then be adjusted or postponed as may be most consistent with the views of His Majesty's Government. On that point, also, it is believed that it will not be difficult to make such an arrangement as, by giving sufficient scope to the resources, to the industry, and the enterprise, of the people of both countries, may prove highly reciprocal and advantageous to them. In the topic of impressment, however, the motive is more urgent. In that line, the rights of the United States have been so long trampled under foot, and the feelings of humanity in respect to the sufferers, and the honor of their Government, even in their own ports, so often outraged, that the astonished world may begin to doubt whether the patience with which these injuries have been borne ought to be attributed to generous or unworthy motives: whether the United States merit the rank to which, in other respects, they are justly entitled among independent Powers, or have already, in the very morn of their political career, lost their energy and become degenerate. The United States are not insensible that their conduct has exposed them to such suspicions, though they well know that they have not merited them. They are aware, from the similarity in the person, the manners, and, above all, the identity of the language, which is common to the people of both nations, that the subject is a difficult one. They are equally aware that to Great Britain, also, it is a delicate one; and they have been willing, in seeking an arrangement of this important interest, to give a proof, by the mode, of their very sincere desire to cherish the relations of friendship with her. I have only to add, that I shall be happy to meet your lordship on these points as soon as you can make it convenient to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

To the President of the United States, and the Senate and House of Representatives of America in Congress assembled, the memorial of the merchants of the city of New York.

Your memorialists beg leave respectfully to approach the Government of their country on subjects of great importance, which have affected their minds with the deepest anxiety and alarm.

Confiding in the justice and friendly dispositions of the Government of Great Britain, and entertaining a correspondent expectation that no unusual restrictions would be imposed on neutral commerce without adequate motives and the most ample notice: presuming, especially, that commercial enterprises, commenced under the sanction of established principles, would, on no account, be affected by a change of system; your memorialists have employed a vast capital in importing various colonial productions, the surplus of which, exceeding the demands of this country, they have been accustomed to export freely to the different markets of Europe.

After this, commerce had been prosecuted without restriction for several years, and had attracted a great proportion of their wealth; after their insurers had assumed immense responsibilities, grounded on an opinion that this trade was strictly regular; having never received the slightest intimation that it could be deemed incompatible with the rights of a belligerent nation, they have been suddenly confounded by unexpected intelligence of the arrestation, on the high seas, of a large portion of their property, which had been embarked with the most unsuspecting confidence.

The feelings of your memorialists are not only excited by the losses which they have actually sustained, in consequence of a measure insusceptible of previous calculation, but also from the state of uncertainty in which they are placed with respect to future commercial operations.

Your memorialists have heretofore believed that commerce between the United States and colonies subject to the enemies of Great Britain, when bona fide prosecuted on their own account, would be perfectly safe from interruption; they have also believed that all articles, which might be securely imported into the United States, might be as securely exported, with the exceptions well understood, both in respect to the import and export trade of commerce with places blockaded, or in articles contraband of war.

In a recent interpretation of what is considered by the tribunals of Great Britain as a direct trade between the colonies and the parent countries of their enemies, your memorialists perceive, with concern, the development of a principle which, if conceded on the part of the United States, must prove fatal to their commercial importance.

It is understood to have been decided that, whenever it appears to be the intention of the importer of colonial produce to export the same to Europe, or whenever it is so exported by the original importer, such intention or exportation shall be evidence of a direct trade, and subject the property, though neutral, to confiscation.

Your memorialists consider it their bounden duty to themselves and their country, to express their most decided opposition to this decision.

As to the evidence arising from the supposed intention of an importer, they readily admit that the great quantities of colonial produce which are acquired by means of the American commerce, exceeding the demand for consumption in the United States, will fairly justify a general presumption that the surplus is ultimately destined for European markets. They assert, however, that the intention of a merchant in respect to the future destination of his property must, from the nature of things, be inconclusive. All plans of business formed by individuals are liable to be affected by circumstances, not to be foreseen or controlled; these plans are, therefore, necessarily revocable by those who form them, and an intention, which has not been executed, proves nothing more than might justly be inferred from a general presumption, arising from the course of our commerce. To apply such an intention, in a particular case, to the prejudice of an individual; to presume that he has voluntarily incurred an immense risk, which, consistently with the success of his main object, he might have fairly avoided; and to involve him in ruin for prosecuting a trade, which, if undertaken with a different motive, would have been declared lawful, would be, in the opinion of your memorialists, to confound and reverse the best established principles of reason, equity, and law.

Your memorialists contend for no innovations on the law of nations; and, except where special treaties have prescribed a different rule, they admit that they may lawfully be restrained from transporting the property of the parties engaged in war. In the recent decision, which prohibits an importer of colonial produce from exporting it to Europe, they, however, perceive with concern either a nugatory and vexatious regulation, or a meditated blow at what they deem an incontestable and valuable right.

Heretofore there existed clear and obvious circumstances of discrimination between the direct trade which Great Britain has assumed, the right of denying to neutrals, and the indirect or circuitous trade which she admits to be lawful. The direct trade could be performed by a single shipment or voyage, whereas the circuitous trade subjected the property to double freights and insurances, to deductions in favor of the revenue, and various other expenses in this country.

If the arrival of a ship in the country to which it belongs, the landing of the cargo, the inspection of the custom-house, the payment or security of duties, do not terminate a voyage, then we confess our ignorance on a point which, never having been before questioned, has been assumed by us as an acknowledged truth. If the entry for exportation, the embarkation of merchandise, the reinspection of the custom-house, the bond for securing a delivery in a foreign cruntry, and a public clearance, do not indicate the commencement of a new voyage, then we are yet to learn the meaning of the expression. If all the formalities and sanctions established for the security of our revenue, if operations of immense magnitude, transacted with the greatest publicity, and without any motive for concealment, are considered as unreal representations, and merely colorable and fraudulent contrivances to cover an illicit trade between the colonies and the parent countries of the enemies of Great Britain; then it becomes necessary, both in regard to our characters and interests, to inquire whether the new regulations establish a more definite criterion for the discovery of truth. We repel, with indignation, the suggestion that the transhipment of property for a foreign market by the original importer is evidence of fraud or chicane, or that, unsupported by other circumstances, it can justify a suspicion that it is other than neutral. In our opinion, any discrimination between the rights of an importing merchant, and a vender, in the United States, is manifestly fallacious, as it virtually asserts that the former can exercise only an imperfect dominion over property lawfully acquired and possessed in this country, while, at the same time, he can convey to the latter a title to a privilege not enjoyed by himself. In short, that a trade is unlawful when the advantage is to result to one person, but may be rendered lawful by being participated with another.

If the new doctrine is executed in the mildest form, its operation must be highly injurious, by originating new questions for litigation, and, of course, subjecting all our commerce to new hazards of interruption. We presume not, however, to comprehend to what extent, or in what manner, the principle will be applied. We perceive that the ancient landmark has been removed, but we seek in vain for a beacon to direct our course. If we inquire whether a bona fide sale and delivery of merchandise by an importer, being a citizen, to another known citizen of the United States, for a valuable consideration, will, as in ordinary cases, be conclusive evidence of a transfer of property, and the answer is affirmative, then we complain that our ships have been detained, the rates of insurance enhanced, and our property confiscated, for the establishment of a rule which, when once understood, will become nugatory, and cease to produce any commercial or political effect. If, on the other hand, this evidence is not to be deemed conclusive, we profess ourselves to be utterly at a loss to discover what proofs of ownership and neutrality of property can, with safety, be relied on.

But these embarrassments, though perplexing and vexatious, are not those which principally occasion our solicitude. We are compelled to consider the late decisions of the British tribunals as preliminary steps towards a system for controlling the importations and exportations of colonial productions, and thereby annihilating the most lucrative branches of our foreign commerce.

If we owed this trade solely to the favor of Great Britain, still we might ask what urgent motive, what imperious necessity, required that the favor should be resumed at a period when our commerce was spread over the ocean, and when a change so essential might destroy its security, and subject us to incalculable losses.

We deny, however, that the rights of commerce, as claimed by us, are to be deemed favors: on the contrary, if the law of nations is other than a temporary rule, prescribed by an arbitrary will, and enforced by power, then we appeal to its most universal and inviolable principle in our defence. This principle is, that the goods of a neutral, consisting of articles not contraband of war, in a neutral vessel, employed in a direct trade between neutral countries and ports of a belligerent country, not invested or blockaded, are protected.

In the controversies which have existed, at different times, for extending the privileges of neutral vessels and limiting the grounds of capture, we take no part. We appeal to the old law. If neutral rights can be reduced within more confined limits than this law prescribes, we perceive not how, amidst the collisions of national interests, any neutral commerce can exist, even in our native productions.

If it be intimated that neutrals should be confined to a commerce with such places, and in such articles only, as were allowed in peace by the municipal regulations of the countries engaged in war, the doctrine may be repelled by the notorious fact that no such principle has governed the conduct of nations during any wars in which they have been engaged; all were free to vary, and all in fact have varied, their commercial systems; whatever theoretical opinions may therefore have been advanced, there has existed no such practical rule, and to set up such a rule under the unparalleled circumstances of the present war, must infallibly destroy the commerce of this country.

It is a well known fact that the people of the United States export to foreign countries a greater proportion of the aggregate annual value of the products of their industry than any other people of the globe; they are consequently most deeply interested in the security and freedom of their trade; in short, being almost exclusively an agricultural and commercial people, those parts of our country which, from recent settlement, or from other circumstances, are wholly agricultural, are more immediately interested than any other, as they are in a greater degree dependent on foreign supplies, and consequently most liable to be affected by any vibrations of the commercial system.

As our manufactures do not flourish in proportion to the progress of our population, wealth, and luxury, the necessity of extending our commerce is constantly increasing. The basis of all our trade is the aggregate value of our native productions exceeding what are consumed in the United States. These are exported to various countries, from which we receive supplies for domestic use; or other articles for exportation. A very great proportion of all the results of our commerce with the world centre in the dominions of Great Britain, and we receive, almost exclusively from that country, our clothing and other necessary manufactures. By the events of the late and present war, many countries with which we prosecuted an increasing trade, have been either diverted from manufacturing pursuits, or have been greatly impoverished, or conquered and subjected, to the colonial system of Great Britain. With these preliminary facts in view, we request permission to detail some of the most important consequences of the assumed rule, that neutrals may be restrained, in time of war, to their accustomed trade in time of peace. The injustice of such a rule in relation to the United States will be most manifest. The individuals employed in commerce would not alone be affected; all the internal relations of our country would be disturbed; the interests of those districts which are most remote from our principal ports would, in proportion to their dependence on foreign supplies, be most severely depressed.

The effects of war cannot be confined to the countries engaged in war. The value of money, the price of labor, the rates of freight and insurance, are by war enhanced throughout the world; all articles of merchandise, both of export and import, are variously affected in their quantities and value, by new wants, by the relinquishment of former pursuits, and by the new direction which is thereby given to the industry of different nations. Other consequences result from the effects of war; as the impoverishment of some, and the aggrandisement of other countries; also from the acknowledged right of belligerent nations to interdict commerce in contraband articles and to institute blockades. This last right is highly injurious to neutrals as it frequently restrains them from proceeding to the best markets. It is obviously impossible, therefore, to confine the United States in time of war amidst all these changes and disadvantages, to their accustomed trade in time of peace without destroying all trade.

If, in consequence of the war, certain articles usually exported from the United States, to countries from which we received necessary supplies, cease to be demanded in those countries; may we not export other articles, and thereby obtain the supplies we need? If articles, usually imported into the United States in time of peace, cease to be demanded by us in time of war, in consequence of our ability to obtain substitutes which we prefer, shall we be required to renounce our export trade by being forbid to import other articles for consumption or for commerce? or shall we be compelled to receive in exchange articles we do not require? If in consequence of an increased demand for our exports to particular countries, we obtain, in exchange, articles of commerce exceeding our domestic wants, shall it be required that the surplus perish in our hands? If Great Britain permits commerce between her subjects and the colonies of her enemies, may we not, with the consent of those colonies, participate in the same commerce. If our commerce with the enemies of Great Britain may now be confined to the system established in time of peace, may we not apprehend that the principle will be retaliated in respect to our commerce with the colonies of Great Britain? In that case what can ensue, but war, pillage, and devastation?

These are not imaginary suppositions; they illustrate the most important principles of our commerce; they evince the necessity of a circuitous trade, to enable us to realise the great value of exports in our native productions, by which alone we acquire the power to liquidate the balance against us in our commerce with Great Britain; they demonstrate that the position against which we contend is not a rule of the law of nations. The law of nations ordains no rule which is unequal and unjust.

But still we have other and more forcible objections; the concession which is required would deprive us of many advantages connected with our local situation, our enterprise, our wealth, and our fortune; it would require us to divert much of our capital and industry to new employments; it would amount to an abandonment of views as a commercial people, and might involve us in dangerous controversies by a virtual admission that any essential articles of supply may, at the pleasure of a belligerent nation, be placed in a state of inhibition equivalent to being declared contraband of war.

Hitherto we have regarded it as a peculiar felicity, incident to our neutral situation, that it was equally beneficial to ourselves and to all the parties with whom we are connected: the articles exported by us to the enemies of Great Britain being convenient supplies promised to secure to our ships in their ports a welcome reception and hospitable treatment; as the direct returns for these exports were inconsiderable, and as the products were almost exclusively remitted to Great Britain, and there applied in payment for manufactures purchased on our account, we considered ourselves sure of receiving from them at least that degree of protection which was recommended by a regard to mutual interests.

It is, however, with much surprise that we have recently discovered that the very circumstances upon which our hopes of security were reposed, have been urged as arguments to justify an invasion of our rights, and that having totally suppressed the external commerce of her enemies, Great Britain is now counselled to appropriate to herself that of her friends. If it be true that, as exporters of certain articles to the ultimate markets, our interests are in collision with hers, yet it ought to be recollected that it is a particular and minor interest only which suffers, and that the disadvantage is a necessary consequence of her colonial system; that the general results of our commerce are greatly in her favor; that they invigorate her manufacturing interests, which are the great basis of her wealth; and that these interests can never be promoted by the impoverishment of her best customers. Surely the security of neutral rights ought not to diminish as their value is augmented; surely a maritime preponderancy, which enables its possessor to blockade any of the ports of its enemies, conveys no just title to a monopoly of the commerce of the world!

In the list of our complaints, we cannot forbear to enumerate the humiliating and oppressive conduct of ships of war in the vicinity of our coasts and harbors. We respect the principle, and emulate the conduct of Great Britain, in regard to her own jurisdiction, and we wish merely to claim, to ourselves, the same measure of justice which she exacts from others. But while we contend that we ought not to be exposed to humiliating inquisitions, in the verge of our port, which, by means of secret connexions with our city, may be rendered conducive to the indulgence of partiality, favor, or malice, we disavow every wish to divest the belligerent nations of their rights. If, in particular instances, the American flag, and the character of an American merchant, have been prostituted to unworthy purposes, we declare the individuals thus guilty to be our enemies, and we wish not to screen them from the just consequences of their misconduct. We also assert, that a comprehensive view of our commerce affords conclusive evidence that, of the property circulated through this port, the proportion which can possibly belong to the enemies of Great Britain is an object unworthy the attention of a great Power, especially if, in a rigorous pursuit of its strict rights, it incurs the hazard of forfeiting the esteem of its friends.

If, therefore, the mode in which the American commerce is prosecuted is allowed by the law of nations; if irrefragable evidence arises from our situation, wants, and necessary connexions with the rest of the world, that it is almost exclusively grounded on American capital; if the suggestions that we are the mere agents of foreigners are ungenerous insults, contrived as apologies for injuries; if frauds in relation to foreign trusts are not more frequent in this country than in Great Britain, and if no Government is able wholly to prevent them, then our conclusion in the present, as in all other cases, ought to be deduced from general facts, and not from particular exceptions. This conclusion is, that the American commerce is one of the great links which connect those interests of civilized nations which wars ought not to disturb; that, to break this link, will be to destroy all commerce, and, therefore, that a serious misunderstanding with Great Britain would prove fatal to the most important interests of both countries.

This view of the subject, while it excites our anxiety, furnishes also a resource for our hopes. We wish only for justice; and believing that a commercial nation which disregards justice thereby undermines the citadel of her power, we rely on the effect of mutual interests and wishes in promoting a cordial explanation, and fair adjustment of every cause of misunderstanding; in particular, we rely on the Government of our country that our rights will not be abandoned, and that no argument in favor of an usurpation will ever be derived from our acquiescence.

If our personal interests and local attachments have not greatly misdirected our opinions, the defenceless situation of the port of New York ought to excite the anxious solicitude of every friend of his country; our river is the only commercial avenue to a fertile and populous country, which is rapidly rising into importance; it is here that one-third of the revenue of the Union is collected, and this proportion is understood to be relatively increasing. But, while we are grateful for these distinguished advantages of nature, our satisfaction is diminished by reflecting on their insecurity: for, in proportion as the resources of our country accumulate to this point, is the hazard that they may present a temptation to rapacity, and become the prize of violence. Without recurring to the experience of past times for proofs, that no nation can long maintain an extensive commerce without well defended seaports and an efficient military marine, we are admonished, by the new and portentous aspect of Europe, and the alarming prevalence of piracy in the West Indies, that energetic measures of defence have become indispensably necessary.

We presume not to express any opinion respecting the degree of force of which the permanent navy ought to consist, and being sensible that delay must attend the construction of suitable defences for our port, we shall rest satisfied when we perceive that these measures are commenced in a manner, and upon a scale which will assure to us an efficient completion.

Such, however, is the present organized force of the United States, that we should consider it as inconsistent with the honor, interests, or security, of our country, to parley with the pirates of the West Indies, whose conduct being inconsistent with any known rules of lawful welfare, cannot have been authorized by any civilized nation towards another nation in a state of peace. Our vessels, while pursuing a lawful trade, have been piratically seized; their cargoes have been forcibly taken away and distributed, without even the form of a trial; the vessels, in many instances, sunk and destroyed, and the crews stripped of all their property. All these outrages have been exercised on innocent and defenceless men, aggravated by unprecedented circumstances of insult, oppression, and barbarity. Some of these violences have been committed on vessels which were captured within sight of our harbors; and the great scene of these unparalleled enormities is the island of Cuba, which commands the only avenue by which we preserve a commercial connexion with our brethren of the Western States; a connexion which we cherish with ardor as a source of mutual advantage, and a bond of permanent union.

But it is not on account of our pecuniary losses alone that we complain. The constancy and valor of the seamen of the United States are justly themes of patriotic exultation; from their connexion with us we consider their cause as our cause, their rights as our rights, their interests as our interests. Our feelings are indignant at the recital of their wrongs, and we request, in addition to the protection of a naval force, that, at least in the American seas, our brave countrymen may be permitted to display their energy in their own defence.

Your memorialists conclude with remarking, that they deem the present situation of public affairs to be peculiarly critical and perilous, and such as requires all the prudence, the wisdom, and energy of Government, supported by the co-operation of all good citizens. By mutual exertions, under the benign influence of Providence, upon this hitherto favored nation, we hope the clouds which threaten to obscure its prosperity may be dispelled, and we pledge our united support in favor of all measures adapted to vindicate and secure the just rights of our country.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Signed by the unanimous order, and on behalf of a general meeting of merchants, convened on the 26th December, 1805, at the Tontine Coffee House in the city of New York.

JOHN BROOM, Chairman, and forty-eight others.

New York, December 28, 1805.

To the President of the United States, and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled; the memorial of the merchants and traders of the city of Philadelphia:

At a moment of distress and a season of solicitude, resulting from a novel and peculiar affection of the commercial interest of their country, your memorialists, as composing a great proportion of that interest in one of the principal commercial cities of the United States, submit to you the following considerations:

Under the influence of a form of Government calculated to inspire confidence in the security of our acquisitions, and with a reliance upon the authority of the nation for protection and support in all lawful enterprise, the commerce of the country has increased in a manner almost unparalleled; and has widely extended a spirit of enterprise which has added to the stock of private wealth, and enriched the treasury of the nation.

By the existence of war in Europe, and our neutral standing with the belligerents, our commerce was naturally and necessarily favored and flourishing. Conducted upon fair and honorable principles, our trade wanted no privilege but the just privilege of its neutral character, and it needed no favor but that which had been yielded by the universal consent of civilized nations. But this privilege, we conceive, has been denied to us, and a jealousy of our enterprise and prosperity has excited a design of checking the commercial growth of our country; the fruit of which has been an attempt to innovate upon ancient and approved principles, and to introduce unheard of articles and provisions into the code of public law. Of this design, of its origin and extent, your memorialists are not left in doubt, when they consider the course and nature of the spoliations which have been committed on the American commerce.

For a time your memorialists were disposed to regard the violence committed on the vessels and merchandise of the citizens of the United States, as the unauthorized acts of lawless individuals; for the fact was well known, that many French and Spanish cruisers were on the ocean without legal commissions, who seized without authority, and robbed without even the form of trial. They were aware, that many instances of violated rights were within the knowledge of the Government; and anticipated the adoption of measures calculated to put a stop to the growing mischief. They, moreover, reflected that, during a war between powerful maritime States, it is the unavoidable lot of the neutral to incur loss and suffer inconvenience, even from a fair exercise of the rights of the belligerent; and to be exposed to imposition and outrage, practised sometimes with the color of authority, and sometimes in despite of both law and humanity. Resting, however, with confidence, upon the protection which they regarded their Government as bound to afford to the fair and lawful trader, they submitted to the present inconvenience, and referred themselves to that protecting principle, and to the integrity of the superior tribunals before which the seizures of their property would be finally considered, as the sureties of a certain, though distant retribution.

It becomes your memorialists to state, that the pressure of these evils has greatly increased, and that others of even superior magnitude have arisen, which assume a most alarming and distressing form. What were considered as irregularities, unsusceptible of prevention, have, by continuance and success, strengthened into regular and systematic plunder. What were regarded as mischiefs incident to a state of war, temporary, though not remediless, are vindicated upon the ground of right, and their practice is reiterated under the authority of Government, and receives the solemn sanction of the law. They, moreover, foresee, in the prevalence of the principles, and in the continuance of the practices alluded to, nothing but the ruin of individuals, the destruction of their commerce, and the degradation of their country.

Could the judgment, or even the charity, of your memorialists see, in the new doctrines of the British court nothing but the revival and enforcement of an ancient and established principle, which friendship had relaxed or favor permitted to slumber, they might regret the departed good, but could impute no injustice to the hand that withdrew it. They are struck, however, with the novelty of these doctrines; their unequivocal hostility to neutral interest and rights; their inconsistency with former declarations of their ministry and decisions of their courts, and with the extraordinary time and manner of their annunciation.

In the reflection that the great code of the laws of nations presents a system of reason and right, approved by the unimpassioned and disinterested judgment of the civilized world, neither tempering its provisions to the wants or demands of an imperious belligerent, nor yet giving aid to the crooked subtleties of unfaithful neutrality, your memorialists have conceived the rights of their nation, as a neutral, to stand upon unchangeable ground. These rights, they cannot but believe, extend to a free and uninterrupted commerce, with their own goods in their own vessels, with other neutrals, if admitted by their laws, or with the belligerents themselves, subject to the received regulations relating to blockade, and to articles contraband of war. The established restrictions on the points just mentioned, with the right of examination and search, have been reasonably considered as giving to the belligerent the most ample security against the infidelity or cupidity which would lend a covert assistance to his antagonist. The policy and interested views of a single State may call for severities against neutral commerce, which are neither commanded of right, nor sanctioned by usage; but the principles of public law cannot vary with the purposes of the politic, nor shift with the designs of the interested. That policy, not justice, that interest, not fair and admitted precedent, have given birth to the principle that neutrals should be restricted to the same commerce with a belligerent, which was allowed to them by that Power, in the time of peace, is conceived, by your memorialists, to be true. Incompatible with the general freedom of neutral commerce, this rule has the sanction of no common observance by civilized nations, and cannot bear that faithful test which every fair and righteous principle of the law of nations will abide. Against the soundness of the principle itself, it is also to be observed, that its advocates, instead of tracing its currency from age to age, point to the war of 1756 as the era of its discovery; and, instead of stamping its validity by the concurrence of the civilized world, indicate its fallibility by a labored detail of their own relaxation and contraction of the rule.

The effect of this novel principle upon neutral interests is of the most serious and alarming character. It goes to nothing short of the destruction of neutral commerce, and, from the well-known neutral situation and character of the United States, to nothing short of inflicting a most deep and deadly wound upon their trade.

But your memorialists cannot but consider, that this principle has not the weight of a consistent and uniform support by the Government which professes to uphold it. In 1801, the declarations of its ministry and the decisions of its courts were unequivocally, "that the produce of the colonies of the enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and be re-exported from thence, even to the mother country of such colony;" and, also, "that landing the goods, and paying the duties in the neutral country, breaks the continuity of the voyage, and is such an importation as legalizes the trade, although the goods be re-shipped in the same vessel, and on account of the same neutral proprietors, and forwarded for sale to the mother country." In 1805, it is decided, that landing and paying duties does not break the continuity of the voyage, and that the course of trade pointed out to the neutral four years before, as legal and safe, is now unsatisfactory to the belligerent, and attended, infallibly, with confiscation. What clear and immutable principle of the laws of nations can that be, your memorialists would ask, which is supported by the High Court of Admiralty, and avowed by the ministry in 1801, and which is prostrated by the ministry and the high court of appeals in 1805? Such a principle must be considered as partaking rather of the shifting character of convenience, than of that of permanent right and established law.

The time and manner of announcing it accord with the principle itself. At a moment when mercantile enterprise, confiding in the explanations on this point given by the British ministry to our ambassador, was strained to the utmost, a new decision of the court of appeals is announced, and every sail is stretched to collect the unwary Americans, who are unsuspectingly confiding in what was the law of nations.

After this view of the principle itself, your memorialists would state, that it has received a vigorous and active enforcement. Under this pretence, many American vessels, with cargoes unquestionably American, have been carried into the ports of Great Britain, charged with a departure from neutral character in this important particular. Some have, indeed, been liberated, after long delay, and with great expense; but many are still detained, without a clear understanding of the precise grounds of detention.

On this interesting point, your memorialists refer themselves, with confidence, to the wisdom and the honor of their Government. In the principles they have here submitted to your consideration, they feel all the confidence of justice, and all the tenacity of truth. To surrender them, they conceive, would derogate from the national character and independence of the United States. From the justice of Government, they hope for their avowal; from the spirit of Government, they hope for their defence; and from the blessing of heaven, they hope for their establishment.

The attention of Government is also solicited by your memorialists, to other embarrassments of their commerce, and to inconveniences deeply affecting the trading interest of the United States, in a different quarter. With a forbearance seldom exercised under like circumstances, the merchants of this country have expected retribution for the injuries imposed upon them by another nation. Instead of receiving this retribution, fresh injuries have been inflicted; and, even during the existence of the present war, adjudications, which outrage every principle of justice, have passed in the courts of Spain on American property. From the Government of that country, between whom and the United States there exists a treaty of friendship and commerce, we had the right to expect, within her ports and jurisdiction, perfect safety and protection. Instead of receiving them, it is too notorious that we have experienced from the officers of that Government, when applied to, the most mortifying inattention; and that, in entire derogation of our treaty, we have been the pointed objects of their neglect and injustice. The severity of this case is increased by the consideration, that, at the time of its occurrence, the very country at whose hands this injustice has been experienced, stood indebted to us for supplies essential to subsistence, and for giving currency and value to its products. Under this head it deserves also to be mentioned, as a point not beneath the notice of Government, that in our own ports, and under your own eyes, public officers of that nation have had the confidence to extort from our merchants fees and emoluments unprecedented and unreasonable.

In detailing the general distresses of our commerce, your memorialists must also remark, that the license of pirates and plunderers in the West Indies has become almost unbounded; and that the defenceless and unprotected state of our shipping exposes it to the most outrageous ravages of the daring and unprincipled. That our seamen should be exposed to the meanest insults, and most wanton cruelties, and the fruits of our industry and enterprise fall a prey to the profligate, cannot but excite both feeling and indignation, and call loudly for the aid and protection of Government. That a belligerent power should depart from the common and accustomed course of examining the ships of the neutral, on the high seas, as chance or vigilance should give the opportunity of search, and should station its vessels of war at the entrance of our ports and harbors, to scrutinize every thing that enters or departs, must also be regarded as attaching reproach to the fairness of our neutral conduct, and is by no means compatible with our dignity or our rights.

Since your memorialists have directed their attention to Government on the subjects herein submitted, they have seen with astonishment a proclamation issued by General Ferrand, an officer of the French Government commanding at the city of St. Domingo, in the island of Hispaniola, which they regard as declaratory of the most outrageous and hostile intentions. As an act of an authorised agent (an officer of Government) it is considered as without a parallel. Taken in its obvious extent, it gives authority to vessels in French commission to carry in all Americans they meet with, because the terms of the proclamation are so indefinite as to leave every thing to the discretion of the cruiser. Experience has too fatally proved, that property once taken into their ports is irretrievably lost.

If this proclamation have issued under the authority of the French nation, it can only be considered as a declaration of war. If it be ultimately disavowed by the Government of this agent, it must be at a distant point of time, when mischiefs great and ruinous may have been done under its authority. It is to prevent these mischiefs that your memorialists solicit the attention of Government, and respectfully suggest, that this extraordinary measure might be speedily counteracted by our national force.

Under the pressure of this state of things, your memorialists have thought proper freely to make known to their Government the injuries sustained and apprehended by the commercial interest of the country. They feel themselves bound to address to you their firm persuasion, that [the amount of losses sustained by the merchants of the United States, from unlawful depredations, would, of itself, be sufficient to defray the expense of an armament adequate to the protection of their commerce. As citizens, they claim protection; and they conceive that the claim is enforced by the consideration, that from their industry and enterprise is collected a revenue which no nation has been able to equal, without a correspondent expense for the protection of the means.

After this fair and candid statement of the distress and exposure of the commerce of the United States, your memorialists cannot but feel and express extreme solicitude for the possible event. In perfect confidence that their foreign commerce was sheltered not only by the law of nations, but by existing treaties, with some of the belligerents, and by the explanations given to the public law by another, they have extended it to every sea, with no other security than a reliance upon those treaties and explanations. It is, of course, defenceless, and liable to arrestation by the most inconsiderable force. It may, then, be naturally supposed, that your memorialists look, with anxiety, to the remedies which may be applied to these pressing evils. To preserve peace with all nations is admitted, without reserve, to be both the interest and the policy of the United States. They, therefore, presume to suggest, that every measure, not inconsistent with the honor of the nation, by which the great objects of redress and security may be attained, should first be used. If such measures prove ineffectual, whatever may be the sacrifice, on their part, it will be met with submission. But whatever measures may be pursued by their Government, your memorialists express their firmest faith that every caution will be used to preserve private property and mercantile credit from violation.

With these observations, submitted with deference and respect to the President and representative body, it remains only to add the hope of your memorialists, that, on subjects of such deep and extensive concern, such measures will be adopted as consists with the honor and interest of the United States.

To the Honorable James Madison, Secretary of State of the United States: the memorial of the merchants of Newburyport and its vicinity, respectfully represents:

That while pursuing a just and legal commerce, we have suffered great and aggravated losses from unwarrantable depredations on our property by several of the belligerent Powers of Europe. In conducting our commerce, we have endeavored strictly to conform ourselves to the laws of nations and existing treaties, to the regulations of our own Government, and to those of the belligerent Powers; yet, nevertheless, our property has, in various instances, been taken from us on the high seas, in a piratical manner; in some others, it has been seized by the cruisers of one nation, carried into the ports of another, and there embezzled with scarcely the semblance of a trial; and in many cases our vessels and cargoes have been captured, tried, and condemned in courts of law, under unusual and alarming pretences, which, if permitted to continue, threaten the ruin of our commercial interests.

So far from obtaining redress of our grievances, by the ordinary modes and processes of law, we have in most cases been subjected to heavy costs, and suffered embarrassing and distressing detention of property, even where no pretence could be found to authorize the seizure of it.

In this alarming situation of our commercial affairs, both our duty and interest strongly urge us to embrace the earliest opportunity to communicate to the constituted guardians of our rights, such facts and documents as may enable them effectually to demand indemnification for past losses, and security from future aggressions.

You will, therefore, have the goodness, as soon as may be, to lay before the President of the United States, the enclosed list of losses sustained by the merchants of Newburyport and vicinity, together with the memorial.

Having sustained these losses and injuries in the prosecution of our lawful commerce, and in the exercise of our just rights, we rely with confidence on the wisdom, firmness, and justice of our Government, to obtain for us that compensation, and to grant to us that protection which a regard to the honor of our country, no less than to the rights of our citizens, must dictate and require.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM BARTLETT,
MOSES MOWN,

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS—Port of Newburyport:

By this public instrument of protest, be it known and made manifest, that, on this second day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and in the thirtieth year of the independence of the United States of America, personally came and appeared before me, Michael Hodge, Notary Public, by legal authority admitted and sworn, dwelling in the town of Newburyport, in the Commonwealth aforesaid, William Morris, master of the brig Lucretia, of Newburyport, William Kloot, mate of the said brig, who, being duly sworn according to law, did severally solemnly and sincerely depose, testify, and declare, that they sailed in the said brig Lucretia from Newburyport on the 24th day of August last past, laden with a cargo suitable for the West India market, and bound for the island of Martinico. That on the 20th day of September following, being then in latitude twenty-one degrees north, and longitude fifty-eight degrees west, they saw at five P. M. a brig bearing southeast, steering northwest; at half past five they fired a gun and were brought to, hailed, and ordered Captain Morris to veer round under his stern, and he would send on board his boat, which he accordingly did, and took Captain Morris out of the brig, and left a prize-master and one man on board the Lucretia; at about half past six P. M. they again sent their boat on board with four more men, armed with pistols and cutlasses; they went immediately below, and began to break open every thing in their way, in search, as they said, for naval stores, though it evidently appeared plunder was their object. They robbed the brig of all her new canvass, all her candles, pump nails, locks, and gimlets; all the beans, coffee, and tea, and all the cabin stores: they broke open the medicine chest, and took several things out of it: they went down into the run, broke open several boxes of sweet oil, and broke a number of the bottles, took half a tierce of bread, several buckets of potatoes, and the bucket. They also robbed the said William Morris, the master, of his watch, great coat, a new pair of boots, a new hat, and a pair of blue trowsers: they also robbed the mate, William Kloot, of twenty-three pair of shoes, twenty-four morocco skins, and one pair of trowsers, and the cooper of eighty pair of shoes, and all the people's clothing they could find. That at about ten o'clock, they took William Gilbert, one of the Lucretia's hands, and tied him up to the main rigging: they presented a pistol to the said mate, and declared that if he offered to move, or to speak, they would blow his brains out: they twice went with the plunder they took, and returned the third time, and Captain Morris with them, it being then about eleven o'clock, bringing with them clubs instead of their weapons as before; that they began plundering again, and on the people's entreating them to leave their clothing, they began to beat them with their clubs, and three of the people were most inhumanly beaten; that they struck Captain Morris twice with their boat's tiller in his face for only requesting them to cease plundering them any more; that during all this time, they on board the armed brig kept up a constant firing with their musketry. That at about midnight, they permitted the Lucretia to proceed on her voyage. That the brig which abused and plundered them carried eighteen or twenty guns, from Africa bound to Jamaica; they told Captain Morris, the brig's name was the Andromeda, of London, commanded by Captain Carrol. Wherefore, the said William Morris, the master as aforesaid, doth require me, the said notary, to protest. I, the said notary, do, therefore, at the request aforesaid, and on behalf of the said William Morris, the master as aforesaid, and of the owner or owners, shippers, freighters, insurers, and all others in anywise concerned or interested in the said brig Lucretia, or her lading, as aforesaid, or of any part thereof, solemnly protest against the owners, captains, officers, and crew of the said brig Andromeda, for the robbery of the said brig Lucretia, by the boat's crew of the said Andromeda, as is particularly set forth in the body of this protest, and their abusive and inhuman conduct while on board the said Lucretia, for all losses, costs, charges, damages, and expenses whatsoever had, borne, suffered, and sustained, or to be had, borne, suffered, and sustained by the said master, owner or owners, shippers, freighters, insurers, and all others in anywise concerned or interested in the said Lucretia, or her lading, as aforesaid, or any part thereof, for or by reason of the matters and things as aforesaid. Thus done and protested at Newburyport, in the Commonwealth aforesaid.

In faith and testimony whereof, as well the said William Morris, and William Kloot, the deponents, as I, the said notary, have to these presents subscribed our names. And the said notary have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, at Newburyport aforesaid, the day, month, and year aforesaid.

WILLIAM MORRIS,
WILLIAM KLOOT.

M. HODGE, Notary Public.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS—Essex, ss:

Be it known, that the foregoing, on this sheet, is a true copy of a certain protest, entered of record in the office of me, the aforesaid Michael Hodge, as notary public as aforesaid.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, at Newburyport aforesaid, this fifth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five.

M. HODGE, Notary Public.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, June 12, 1805.

To the honorable James Madison, Esquire, Secretary of State of the United States. The memorial of the President and Directors of the South Carolina Insurance Company, and of the merchants and others interested in the commerce of the city of Charleston, respectfully showeth:

That your memorialists are deeply affected by the recent capture, at the very entrance of this port, of the American ship Two Friends, by a French privateer. This event has excited, among all classes of citizens, the strongest sensations, not only because the said ship was captured without any color of pretence, within sight of land, but because she is our only regular London trader, and had on board a full supply of spring and summer goods. The distress and anxiety occasioned by these circumstances are greatly enhanced from our having been hitherto deprived of our spring supplies, and from an anticipation of the consequences justly to be apprehended from a continuance of similar outrages, should not the most prompt and effectual measures be adopted for the protection and security of our commercial interests. Your memorialists are authorized to add (although the fact be not detailed in the protest) that it appears, from undoubted authority, that the magnitude of the prize was the sole inducement of the abovementioned capture, the captors having said that they would release the Two Friends, in the event of their falling in with any other valuable prize, which might be more worthy of their notice.

This most extraordinary capture, in direct violation of our treaty with France, (as appears by the accompanying documents,) has already been followed by events no less alarming, our harbor being at this moment completely blockaded by three French privateers, (and more are daily expected,) which examine all vessels coming in and going out of this port, and either detain or release them, according as their value excites the cupidity of the cruisers.

This degrading state of our harbor has necessarily raised the premiums of insurance, thus forcing additional sums from the pockets of our citizens, has advanced the price of every commodity, and created a distressing stagnation of our exports; for the merchants, not receiving their goods from abroad, are incapacitated from purchasing the produce of the country. Among these deplorable effects of the defenceless and humiliating condition of our commerce may be, moreover, enumerated the immense loss of duties, those in the ship Two Friends alone being estimated by the collector at forty-five thousand dollars.

Your memorialists have the best reasons for believing that this early success, experienced by these French privateers, will immediately allure others in swarms to our coast and bar, to the total ruin of private mercantile concerns, and the most fatal defalcation of the public revenue. Your memorialists have no less ground for apprehending that British cruisers, availing themselves of the absence of domestic protection, will, under the color of expelling the French, assume and occupy their ground, and either retain us in the same degraded state, harassing our vessels by searches and detention, or subject us to the disgraceful and mortifying obligations of gratitude for alien succor and relief.

Your memorialists are the more alarmed at these depredations because much valuable property is still expected this summer from other quarters than London, and considerable importations will be looked for in the fall, for our winter supplies; and should there not be an early and effectual check to these aggressions; should our fall importations be also interrupted, the calamities of the last year, produced by the hurricane and other causes, in which this city has largely participated, would be aggravated to such an extent as to eventuate in general ruin. And these just alarms and apprehensions of your memorialists are heightened by the well known circumstance of many of the cruisers which infest our shores, belonging to St. Jago de Cuba and Baracoa, in which receptacles our vessels and their cargoes, with the knowledge of the Government of Cuba, are instantly sold without any condemnation whatever, or even the formality of a trial, thereby precluding every future possibility of redress.

Your memorialists avail themselves of this occasion to notice a late decision of the district court within this State, grounded on an act of Congress, whereby the territorial jurisdiction of the United States is limited to the short distance of three miles, or a marine league from the coasts or shores, which by the said court is construed to mean three miles from the land; consequently, the middle channel of our bar, being more than three miles distant from the nearest land, is pronounced by judicial authority to be without the jurisdiction of the United States—the very entrance of our harbor, in full sight of the city, where vessels are frequently obliged to anchor while waiting for a tide, and with a pilot on board, is, by our own tribunals, acknowledged to be without the protection of our Government!!

Your memorialists refrain from commenting on the pernicious effects of a system of policy, so pregnant with dishonor and ruin to the trade and navigation of the United States at large, but more particularly to those of Charleston, from the geography of whose shores, and peculiar local situation of whose bar and harbor, every vessel, in her ingress and egress, is thus subjected to search, detention, or seizure, and content ourselves with a bare statement of the above grievances, superadded to so many others, not doubting that the President will take the same into consideration, and being duly impressed with the necessity of some early remedial arrangement, either of a legislative or diplomatic nature, will recur to such as may appear most conducive to the desired end.

Your memorialists, having thus exhibited but an imperfect view of their ruinous, unprotected and degraded situation, rely with confidence on the prompt interposition of the President, to obtain, by representations to the ministers of France, and of Spain, (in the event of the Two Friends being carried to a Spanish port) restitution of the said ship and her cargo, and to cause a stop to be put to similar spoliations; and your memorialists further most earnestly solicit some immediate and effectual naval protection for our harbor and shores, together with such other measures as the national councils in their wisdom may deem expedient, as well for prevention of the renewal of the outrages we have sustained, as for the permanent safety and protection of our commercial and navigating rights and interests.

THOMAS CORBETT, President of the South Carolina Insurance Company, and 106 others.

Memorial of the Merchants and Traders of the city of Baltimore to the President of the United States, and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

Your memorialists beg leave, respectfully, to submit to your consideration the following statement and reflections produced by the situation of our public affairs, in a high degree critical and perilous, and peculiarly affecting the commerce of their country.

In the early part of the late war between Great Britain and France, the former undertook to prohibit neutral nations from all trade whatsoever with the colonies of the latter. This exorbitant pretension was not long persisted in. It was soon qualified in favor of a direct trade between the United States and these colonies, and some years afterwards was further relaxed in favor of European neutrals. The United States being thus admitted, by the express acknowledgment of Great Britain, to a direct trade, without limit, between their own ports and the colonies of the opposite belligerents, another trade naturally and necessarily grew out of it, or rather formed one of its principal objects and inducements. The surplus colonial produce beyond our own consumption, imported here, was to be carried elsewhere for a market; and it was accordingly carried to Europe, sometimes by the original importer, sometimes by other American merchants, either by the vessels in which the importation was made, or in others. In the course of this traffic, it was understood to be the sense of Great Britain, and was explicitly declared by her courts of prize, that, although she had not expressly allowed to the merchants of the United States, by the letter of her relaxations, an immediate trade between the colonies of her enemies and the markets of Europe, a circuitous trade to Europe, in the production of these colonies, was unexceptionable; and that nothing more was necessary to make it so, than that the continuity of the voyage should be broken by an entry and payment of duties, and the landing of the colonial cargo in the United States. During the greater part of the late war, and the first years of the present, this trade was securely prosecuted by our merchants in the form which Great Britain had thus thought fit to give to it.

The modification of a traffic, in itself entitled to be free, was submitted to, on our part, without repining, because it presented a clear and definite rule of conduct, which, although unauthorized in the light of a restriction, was not greatly inconvenient in its practical operation; and your memorialists entertained a confident hope, that while, on the one hand, they sought no change of system by which the assumption of Great Britain to impose terms, however mild in their character and effect, upon their lawful commerce, should be repelled; on the other hand, it would not be desired, that the state of things which Great Britain had herself prescribed, and which use and habit had rendered familiar and intelligible to all, should be disturbed by oppressive innovations; far less that these innovations should, by a tyrannical retrospection, be made to justify the seizure and confiscation of their property, committed to the high seas, under the protection of the existing rule, and without warning of the intended change.

In this, their just hope, your memorialists have been fatally disappointed. Their vessels and effects, to a large amount, have lately been captured by the commissioned cruisers of Great Britain, upon the foundation of new principles, suddenly invented, and applied to this habitual traffic, and suggested and promulgated, for the first time, by sentences of condemnation; by which unavoidable ignorance has been considered as criminal, and an honorable confidence in the justice of a friendly nation pursued with penalty and forfeiture.

Your memorialists are in no situation to state the precise nature of the rules to which their most important interests have thus been sacrificed: and it is not the least of their complaints against them, that they are undefined, and undefinable, equivocal in their form, and the fit instruments of oppression by reason of their ambiguity.

Your memorialists know that the circumstances which have heretofore been admitted, to give legality to their trade, in colonial productions, with their European friends, protect it no longer. But they have not yet been told, and are not soon likely to learn, what other circumstances will be suffered to produce that consequence. It is supposed to have been judicially declared, in general, that a voyage undertaken for the purpose of bringing into the United States the produce of the belligerent colonies, purchased by American citizens, shall, if it appears to be intended that this produce shall ultimately go on to Europe, and an attempt is actually made to re-export and send it thither, be considered, on account of that intention, as a direct voyage to Europe, and therefore illegal, notwithstanding any temporary interruption or termination of it in the United States.

Your memorialists will not here stop to inquire upon what grounds of law or reason, the same act is held to be legal, when commenced with one intention, and illegal, when undertaken with another. But they object, in the strongest terms, against this new criterion of legality, because of its inevitable tendency to injustice, because of its peculiar capacity to embarrass, with seizure, and to ruin, with confiscation, the whole of our trade with Europe in the surplus of our colonial importations.

The inquiry which the late system indicated was short and simple, and precluded error on all sides; but the new refinement substitutes in its place a vast field of speculation, overshadowed with doubt and uncertainty, and of which the faint and shifting boundaries can never be distinctly known.

Intention, as to the object of our colonial voyages, may be inferred from numerous circumstances, more or less conclusive. To anticipate them all is obviously impracticable; and, of course, to guard against the inference in this respect, which British captors and British courts may be disposed to draw, will be impossible. Our property is therefore menaced by a great and formidable danger which there are no means of eluding; for, even if it should chance to escape the condemnation which this pernicious novelty prepares for it, the wound inflicted upon our commerce by arrestations on suspicion, and detentions for adjudication, will be deep and fatal. The efforts of our merchants will be checked and discouraged by more than ordinary inquisitions; our best concerted enterprises broken up, without the hope of retribution, or even reimbursement for actual costs, upon the footing of an intention arbitrarily imputed; and the only alternative which will be presented to our choice will be, either to refrain at once from a traffic which enriches our country while it benefits ourselves, or to see it wasted, and in the end destroyed, by a noxious scheme of maritime depredation.

Your memorialists are the more alarmed by this departure from a plain and settled rule, in favor of a pliant and mysterious doctrine, so eminently suited to the accomplishment of the worst purposes of commercial jealousy, because the injurious and vexatious qualities of the substituted rule must have been known to those who introduced it, and because, if these qualities did not recommend it to adoption, it is difficult to conceive why it was adopted at all. If it is meant that our trade to Europe shall, notwithstanding this rule, be allowed to continue without being subjected to extraordinary difficulties, operating as actual reductions and mischievous restraints; if it is meant that a few facts, known and comprehended, shall, as heretofore, form a standard by which the lawfulness of our European voyages may be unequivocally ascertained; if a wide range has not been designed for the inquiry after intention, and a real effect expected from that inquiry; if, in a word, the late regulation has not been supposed to be capable of bearing on our trade, in a manner new and important, we should hardly have now been called upon to remonstrate against a change. It is not pretended that the rule now enforced against us is levelled against any practice to which we may be supposed to have lent ourselves, of disguising as our own the property of the enemies of Great Britain. That is not its object; and if it were, we are enabled to assert, solemnly and confidently, that our conduct has afforded no ground for the injurious suspicion which such an object would imply. The view is professedly to regulate and affect our traffic in articles fairly purchased by us from others, and if the consequences to that traffic were not intended to be serious and extensive, and permanent, your memorialists search in vain for the motive by which a state, in amity with our own, and, moreover, connected with it by the ties of common interest, to which many considerations seem to give peculiar strength, has been induced to indulge in a paroxysm of capricious aggression upon our rights, by which it dishonors itself without promoting any of those great interests for which an enlightened nation may fairly be solicitous, and which only a steady regard for justice can ultimately secure. When we see a powerful state in possession of a commerce, of which the world affords no examples, endeavoring to interpolate into the laws of nations casuistical niceties and wayward distinctions, which forbid a citizen of another independent commercial country to export from that country what unquestionably belongs to him, only because he imported it himself, and yet allow him to sell a right of exporting it to another; which prohibit an end because it arises out of one intention, but permit it when it arises out of two; which, dividing an act into stages, search into the mind for a correspondent division of it in the contemplation of its author, and determine its innocence or criminality accordingly; which, not denying that the property acquired in an authorized traffic, by neutral nations from belligerents, may become incorporated into the national stock, and under the shelter of its neutral character, thus super-induced, and still preserved, be afterwards transported to every quarter of the globe, reject the only epoch which can distinctly mark that incorporation, and point out none other in its place; which, proposing to fix with accuracy and precision the line of demarcation, beyond which neutrals are trespassers upon the wide domain of belligerent rights, involves every thing in darkness and confusion: there can be but one opinion as to the purpose which all this is to accomplish.

Your memorialists have endeavored, with all that attention, which their natural anxiety was calculated to produce, to ascertain the various shapes which the doctrine in question is likely to assume in practice, but they have found it impossible to conjecture in what way, consistently with this doctrine, the excess of our imports from the belligerent colonies can find its way to foreign markets. The landing of the cargo, and a compliance with all the forms and sanctions, upon which our revenue depends, will not so terminate the voyage from the colonies, as that the articles may be immediately re-exported to Europe by the original importer. But if they cannot be exported immediately, what lapse of time will give them a title to be sent abroad, and if not by the original importer, how is he to devolve upon another a power which he has not himself? And if by a sale he can communicate the power, by what evidence is the transfer to be manifested, so as to furnish an answer to the ready accusation of fraud and evasion? In proportion as this doctrine has developed itself, it has been found necessary to invent plausible qualifications, tending to conceal its real character from observation. It has accordingly been surmised, that, notwithstanding the obstacles which it provides, against the re-exportation of a colonial cargo, by the importer, such a re-exportation may, perhaps, be lawful. Attempts on his part to sell in the United States, without effect, (which must often happen,) may, it is supposed, be sufficient to save him from the peril of the rule. But, admitting it to be certain, instead of being barely possible, that these attempts would form any thing like security against final condemnation, it is still most material to ask how they are to afford protection against seizure? By what documents they can be proved to the satisfaction of those, to whom interest suggests doubts, and whom impunity encourages to act upon them? The formal transactions of the custom house once deserted as a criterion, the cargo must be followed, through private transfers, into the warehouses of individual merchants; and when proofs have been prepared, with the utmost regularity, to establish these transfers, or the other facts which may be deemed to be equivalent, they are still liable to be suspected, and will be suspected, as fictitious and colorable, and capture will be the consequence. For the loss and damage which capture brings along with it, British courts of prize grant no adequate indemnity. Redress to any extent is difficult; to a competent extent, impossible. And even the costs which an iniquitous seizure compels a neutral merchant to incur, in the defence of his violated rights, before their own tribunals, are seldom decreed, and never paid.

Your memorialists have thus far complained only of the recent abandonment, by Great Britain, of a known rule, by which the oppressive character of an important principle of her maritime code has heretofore been greatly mitigated. But they now beg leave to enter their solemn protest against the principle itself, as an arbitrary and unfounded pretension, by which the just liberty of neutral commerce is impaired and abridged, and may be wholly destroyed.

The reasons upon which Great Britain assumes to herself a right to interdict to the independent nations of the earth a commercial intercourse with the colonies of her enemies, (out of the relaxation of which pretended right has arisen the distinction, in her courts, between an American trade, from the colonies to the United States, and from the same colonies to Europe,) will, we are confidently persuaded, be repelled with firmness and effect by our Government.

It is said by the advocates of this high belligerent claim, that neutral nations have no right to carry on with either of the parties at war any other trade than they have actually enjoyed in time of peace. This position forms the basis upon which Great Britain has heretofore rested her supposed title, to prevent altogether, or to modify at her discretion, the interposition of neutrals in the colony trade of her adversaries.

But, if we are called upon to admit the truth of this position, it seems reasonable that the converse of it should also be admitted. That war should not be allowed to disturb the customary trade of neutrals in peace; that the peace traffic should, in every view, be held to be the measure of the war traffic; and that, as on the one hand there can be no enlargement, on the other there shall be no restriction. What, however, is the fact? The first moment of hostilities annihilates the commerce of the nations at peace, in articles deemed contraband of war; the property of the belligerents can no longer be carried in neutral ships; they are subject to visitation on the high seas, to harassing and vexatious search, to detention for judicial inquiry, and to the peril of unjust confiscation: they are shut out from their usual markets, not only by military enterprises against particular places, carried on with a view to their reduction, but by a vast system of blockade, affecting and closing up the entire ports of a whole nation: such have been the recent effects of an European war upon the trade of this neutral country; and the prospect of the future affords no consolation for that of the past. The triumphant fleets of one of the contending Powers cover the ocean; the navy of her enemies has fallen before her; the communication by sea with France, and Spain, and Holland, seems to depend on her will, and she asserts a right to destroy it at her pleasure: she forbids us from transporting in our vessels, as in peace we could, the property of her enemies; enforces against us a rigorous list of contraband; dams up the great channels of our ordinary trade; abridges, trammels, and obstructs what she permits us to prosecute, and then refers us to our accustomed traffic in time of peace, for the criterion of our commercial rights, in order to justify the consummation of that ruin with which our lawful commerce is menaced by her maxims and her conduct.

This principle, therefore, cannot be a sound one; it wants uniformity and consistency; is partial, unequal, and delusive: it makes every thing bend to the rights of war, while it affects to look back to, and to recognise, the state of things in peace, as the foundation and the measure of the rights of neutrals. Professing to respect the established and habitual trade of the nations at peace, it affords no shadow of security for any part of it: professing to be an equitable standard for the ascertainment of neutral rights, it deprives them of all body and substance, and leaves them only a plausible and unreal appearance of magnitude and importance: it delivers them over, in a word, to the mercy of the States at war, as objects of legitimate hostility; and while it seems to define, does, in fact, extinguish them. Such is the faithful picture of the theory, and practical operation of this doctrine.

But, independent of the considerations thus arising out of the immediate interference of belligerent rights and belligerent conduct with the freedom of neutral trade, by which the fallacy of the appeal to the precise state of our peace trade, as limiting the nature and extent of our trade in war, is sufficiently manifested, there are other considerations which satisfactorily prove the utter inadmissibility of this principle.

It is impossible that war, among the primary Powers of Europe, should not, in an endless variety of shapes, materially affect the whole civilized world. Its operation upon the prices of labor and commodities; upon the value of money; upon exchange; upon the rates of freight and insurance; is great and important. But it does much more than all this. It imposes upon commerce in the gross, and its details, a new character: gives to it a new direction, and places it upon new foundations. It abolishes one class of demands; creates, or revives others; and diminishes, or augments the rest. And, while the wants of mankind are infinitely varied by its powerful agency, both in object and degree, the modes and sources of supply, and the means of payment, are infinitely varied also.

To prescribe to neutral trade thus irresistibly influenced, and changed, and moulded by this imperious agent, a fixed and unalterable station would be to say, that it shall remain the same, when not to vary is impossible: and to require, since change is unavoidable, that it shall submit to the ruinous retrenchments, and modifications, which war produces, and yet refrain from indemnifying itself by the fair advantages, which war offers to it as an equivalent, cannot be warranted by any rule of reason or equity, or by any law to which the great community of nations owes respect and obedience.

When we examine the conduct of the maritime powers of Europe, in all the wars in which they have been engaged for upwards of a century, we find, that each of them has, occasionally, departed from its schemes of colonial monopoly; relaxed its navigation laws, and otherwise admitted neutrals, for a longer, or a shorter space, as circumstances required, to modes of trade, from which they were generally excluded.

This universal practice, this constant and invariable usage, for a long series of years, would seem to have established among the European States a sort of customary law upon the subject of it, from which no single power could be at liberty to depart, in search of a questionable theory at variance with it. Great Britain is known to suspend, in war, and on account of war, her famous act of navigation, to which she is supposed to owe her maritime greatness, and which, as the palladium of her power, she holds inviolable in peace; and her colonies are frequently thrown open, and neutrals invited to supply them, when she cannot supply them herself. She makes treaties in the midst of war, (she made such a treaty with us,) by which neutrals are received into a participation of an extensive traffic, to which before they had no title. And can she be suffered to object, that the same, or analogous, acts are unlawful in her enemies; or that, when neutrals avail themselves of similar concessions made by her opponents, they are liable to punishment, as for a criminal intrusion into an irregular and prohibited commerce?

The weight of this consideration has been felt by the advocates of this doctrine, and it has, accordingly, been attempted to evade it by a distinction, which admits the legality of all such relaxations in war, of the general, commercial or colonial systems of the belligerents, as do not arise out of the predominance of the enemy's force, or out of any necessity resulting from it.

It is apparent, however, that such relaxations, whether dictated by the actual ascertained predominance of the enemy's force, or not, do arise out of the state of war, and are almost universally produced and compelled by it; that they are intended as reliefs against evils which war has brought along with it, and that the opposite belligerent has just as much right to insist, that these evils shall not be removed by neutral aid or interposition, as if they were produced by the general preponderance of her own power, upon the land, or upon the sea, or by the general success of her arms. In the one case, as completely as in the other, the interference of the neutral lightens the pressure of war; increases the capacity to bear its calamities, or the power to inflict them; and supplies the means of comfort and of strength. In both cases, the practical effect is the same, and the legal consequences should be the same also.

But whence are we to derive the conclusion of fact, upon which this extraordinary distinction is made to turn? How are we to determine, with precision and certainty, the exact cause which opens to us the ports of a nation at war, to analyze the various circumstances of which, perhaps, the concession may be the combined effect; and to assign to each the just portion of influence, to which it has a claim? How easy it is to deceive ourselves, on a subject of this kind, Great Britain will herself instruct us, by a recent example. Her courts of prize have insisted, that, during the war, which ended in the peace of Amiens, France was compelled to open the ports of her colonies, by a necessity, created and imposed by the naval prowess of her enemies. And yet these ports were opened in February, 1793, when France and her maritime adversaries had not measured their strength in a single conflict; when no naval enterprise had been undertaken by the latter, far less crowned with success; when the lists were not even entered, and when the superiority, afterwards acquired by Great Britain in particular, was yet a problem; when the spirit of the French nation and Government was lifted up to an unexampled height by the enthusiasm of the day, and by the splendid achievements by which their armies had recently conquered Savoy, the country of Nice, Worms, and other places on the Rhine, the Austrian low countries, and Liege. It should seem to be next to impossible to contend that a concession made by France to neutrals, on the subjeect of her colony trade, at such a period of exultation and triumph, was "compelled by the prevalence of Britsh arms," that it was "the fruit of British victories," or the result of "British conquest," that it arose out of the predominance of the enemy's force, that it was produced by "that sort of necessity, which springs from the impossibility of otherwise providing against the urgency of distress, inflicted by the hand of a superior enemy," and that "it was a signal of defeat and depression." It would seem to be impossible to say of a traffic, so derived, "that it could obtain, or did obtain, by no other title, than the success of the one belligerent against the other, and at the expense of that very belligerent, under whose success the neutral sets up his title." Yet all these things have been solemnly said, and maintained, and have even been made the foundation of acts, by which the property of our citizens has been wrested from their hands. It cannot be believed that the laws of nations have entrusted to a belligerent, the power of harassing the trade, and confiscating the ships, and merchandise of peaceable and friendly nations, upon grounds so vague, indefinite, and equivocal. Of all law, certainty is the best feature; and no rule can be otherwise than unjust and despotic, of which the sense and the application are and must be ambiguous. A siege, or blockade, presents an intelligible standard, by which it may always be known, that no lawful trade can be carried on with the places against which either has been instituted. But, the suggestions upon which this new belligerent encroachment, having all the effect of a siege or blockade, is founded, are absolutely incapable of a distinct form, either for the purpose of warning to neutrals, or as the basis of a judicial sentence. The neutral merchant finds that, in fact, the colonial ports of the parties to the war are thrown open to him, by the Powers to which they belong; and he sees no hostile squadrons to shut them against him. Is he to pause before he ventures to exercise his natural right, to trade with those who are willing to trade with him, until he has inquired and determined why these ports have been thus made free to receive him? To such a complicated and delicate discussion no nation has a right to call him. It is enough that an actual blockade can be set on foot to close these ports, and that they may be made the object of direct efforts, for conquest or occlusion, if the enemy's force is, in truth, so decidedly predominant as it is pretended to be. And if it is not predominant to that point and to that extent, there can be no cause for ascribing to it an effect, to which it is physically incompetent, or for allowing it to do that constructively, which it cannot do, and has not done, actually. The pernicious qualities of this doctrine are enhanced and aggravated, as from its nature might be expected, by the fact, that Great Britain gives no notice of the time when, or the circumstances in which, she means to apply and enforce it. Her orders of the 6th November, 1793, by which the seas were swept of our vessels and effects, were, for the first time, announced by the ships of war and privateers, by which they were carried into execution. The late decisions of her courts, which are in the true spirit of this doctrine, and are calculated to restore it, in practice, to that high tone of severity which milder decisions had almost concealed from the world, came upon us by surprise; and the captures, of which the Dutch complained, in the seven years' war, were preceded by no warning. Thus is this principle most rapacious and oppressive in all its bearings. Harsh and mysterious in itself, it has always been, and ever must be used, to betray neutral merchants into a trade supposed to be lawful, and then to give them up to pillage and to ruin. Compared with this principle, which violence and artifice may equally claim for their own, the exploded doctrine of constructive blockade, by which belligerents, for a time, insulted and plundered the states at peace, is innocent and harmless. That doctrine had something of certainty belonging to it, and made safety at least possible. But there can be no security while a malignant and deceitful principle, like this, hangs over us. It is just what the belligerent chooses to make it—lurking, unseen, and unfelt—or visible, active, and noxious. It may come abroad when least expected; and the moment of confidence may be the moment of destruction. It may sleep for a time, but no man knows when it is to awake, to shed its baleful influence upon the commerce of the world. It clothes itself, from season to season, in what are called relaxations, but again, without any previous intimation to the deluded citizens of neutral powers, these relaxations are suddenly laid aside, either in the whole, or in part, and the work of confiscation commences. Nearly ten months of the late war had elapsed before it announced itself at all, and when it did so, it was in its most formidable shape, and in its fullest power and expansion. In a few weeks it was seen to lose more than half its substance and character, and before the conclusion of the war was scarcely perceptible. With the opening of the present war, it re-appeared in its mildest form, which it is again abandoning for another, more consonant to its spirit. Such are its capricious fluctuations, that no commercial undertaking, which it can in any way affect, can be considered as otherwise than precarious, whatever may be the avowed state of the principle at the time of its commencement.

It has been said that, by embarking in the colony trade of either of the belligerents, neutral nations, in some sort, interpose in the war, since they assist and serve the belligerent in whose trade they so embark. It is a sufficient answer to this observation, that the same course of reasoning would prove that neutrals ought to discontinue all trade whatsoever with the parties at war. A continuance of their accustomed peace trade assists and serves the belligerent, with whom it is continued; and if this effect were sufficient to make a trade unneutral and illegal, the best established and most useful traffic would, of course, become so. But Great Britain supplies us with another answer to this notion, that our interference in the trade of the colonies of her enemies is unlawful, because they are benefited by it. It is known that the same trade is, and long has been, carried on by British subjects; and your memorialists feel themselves bound to state, that according to authentic information lately received, the Government of Great Britain does, at this moment, grant licenses to neutral vessels taking in a proportion of their cargoes there, to proceed on trading voyages to the colonies of Spain, from which she would exclude us, upon the condition that the return cargoes shall be carried to Great Britain to swell the gains of her merchants, and to give her a monopoly of the commerce of the world. This great belligerent right, then, upon which so much has been supposed to depend, sinks into an article of barter. It is used, not as a hostile instrument, wielded by a warlike state, by which her enemies are to be wounded, or their colonies subdued, but as the selfish means of commercial aggrandizement, to the impoverishment and ruin of her friends: as an engine by which Great Britain is to be lifted up to a vast height of prosperity, and the trade of neutrals crippled, and crushed, and destroyed. Such acts are a most intelligible commentary upon the principle in question. They show that it is a hollow and fallacious principle, susceptible of the worst abuse, and incapable of a just and honorable application. They show that in the hands of a great maritime state, it is not, in its ostensible character of a weapon of hostility that it is prized, but rather as one of the means of establishing an unbounded monopoly, by which every enterprise, calculated to promote national wealth and power, shall be made to begin and end in Great Britain alone. Such acts may well be considered as pronouncing the condemnation of the principle against which we contend, as withdrawing from it the only pretext upon which it is possible to rest it.

Great Britain does not pretend that this principle has any warrant in the opinions of writers on public law. She does not pretend, and cannot pretend, that it derives any countenance from the conduct of other nations. She is confessedly solitary in the use of this invention, by which rapacity is systematized, and a state of neutrality and war are made substantially the same. In this absence of all other authority, her courts have made an appeal to her own early example for the justification of her own recent practice. Your memorialists join in that appeal, as affording the most conclusive and authoritative reprobation of the practice which it is intended to support by it.

It would be easy to show, by an examination of the different treaties to which Great Britain has been a party from times long past, that this doctrine is a modern usurpation. It would be equally easy to show, that during the greater part of the last century her statesmen and lawyers uniformly disavowed it, either expressly or tacitly. But it is to a review of judicial examples, of all others the most weighty and solemn, that your memorialists propose to confine themselves.

In the war of 1744, in which Great Britain had the power, if she had thought fit to exert it, to exclude the neutral states from the colony trade of France and Spain, her high court of appeals decided that the trade was lawful, and released such vessels as had been engaged in it.

In the war which soon followed the peace of Aix la Chapelle, Great Britain is supposed to have first acted upon the pretension, that such a trade was unlawful, as being shut against neutrals in peace. And it is certain, that during the whole of that war, her courts of prize did condemn all neutral vessels taken in the prosecution of that trade, together with their cargoes, whether French or neutral. These condemnations, however, proceeded upon peculiar grounds. In the seven years' war, France did not throw open to neutrals the traffic of her colonies. She established no free ports in the east, or in the west, with which foreign vessels could be permitted to trade, either generally, or occasionally, as such. Her first practice was simply to grant special licenses to particular neutral vessels, principally Dutch, and commonly chartered by Frenchmen, to make, under the usual restrictions, particular trading voyages to the colonies. These licenses furnished the British courts with a peculiar reason for condemning vessels sailing under them, viz. "that they became in virtue of them the adopted or naturalized vessels of France."

As soon as it was known that this effect was imputed to these licences they were discontinued, or pretended to be so; but the discontinuance, whether real or supposed, produced no change in the conduct of Great Britain; for neutral vessels, employed in this trade, were captured and condemned as before. The grounds upon which they continued to be so captured and condemned, may best be collected from the reasons subjoined to the printed cases, in the prize causes, decided by the High Court of Admiralty, (in which Sir Thomas Salisbury at that time presided,) and by the lords commissioners of appeals, between 1757 and 1760.

In the case of the America, (which was a Dutch ship, bound from St. Domingo to Holland, with the produce of that island, belonging to French subjects, by whom the vessel had been chartered,) the reason stated in the printed case is, "that the ship must be looked upon as a French ship, (coming from St. Domingo,) for by the laws of France no foreign ship can trade in the French West Indies."

In the case of the Snip, the reason (assigned by Sir George Hays, and Mr. Pratt, afterwards Lord Camden) is, "that the Snip (though once the property of Dutchmen) being employed in carrying provisions to, and goods from, a French colony, thereby became a French ship, and as such was justly condemned."

It is obvious that the reason, in the case of the America, proceeds upon a presumption, that, as the trade was, by the standing laws of France, even up to that moment, confined to French ships, any ship found employed in it must be a French ship. The reason, in the other case, does not rest upon this idle presumption, but takes another ground; for it states, that, by the reason of the trade in which the vessel was employed, she became a French vessel.

It is manifest that this is no other than the first idea of adoption or naturalization, accommodated to the change attempted to be introduced into the state of things, by the actual or pretended discontinuance of the special licenses. What, then, is the amount of the doctrine of the seven years' war, in the utmost extent which it is possible to ascribe to it? It is in substance no more than this, that as France did not, at any period of that war, abandon, or in any degree suspend, the principle of colonial monopoly, or the system arising out of it, a neutral vessel found in the prosecution of the trade, which, according to that principle and that system, still continuing in force, could only be a French trade and open to French vessels, either became, or was legally to be presumed to be a French vessel. It cannot be necessary to show, that this doctrine differs essentially from the principle of the present day: but even if were otherwise, the practice of that war, whatever it might be, was undoubtedly contrary to that of the war of 1744, and, as contrasted with it, will not be considered, by those who have at all attended to the history of these two periods, as entitled to any peculiar veneration. The effects of that practice were almost wholly confined to the Dutch, who had rendered themselves extremely obnoxious to Great Britain, by the selfish and pusillanimous policy, as it was falsely called, which enabled them, during the seven years' war, to profit of the troubles of the rest of Europe.

In the war of 1744, the neutrality of the Dutch, while it continued, had in it nothing of complaisance to France; they furnished from, the commencement of hostilities, on account of the pragmatick sanction, succors to the confederates, declared openly, after a time, in favor of the Queen of Hungary; and finally determined upon and prepared for war, by sea and land. Great Britain, of course, had no inducement, in that war, to hunt after any hostile principle, by the operation of which the trade of the Dutch might be harassed, or the advantage of their neutral position, while it lasted, defeated. In the war of 1756, she had this inducement in its utmost strength. Independent of the commercial rivalry existing between the two nations, the Dutch had excited the undisguised resentment of Great Britain, by declining to furnish against France the succors stipulated by treaty; by constantly supplying France with naval and warlike stores, through the medium of a trade systematically pursued by the people, and countenanced by the Government; by granting to France, early in 1757, a free passage through Namur and Maestricht, for the provisions, ammunition, and artillery, belonging to the army, destined to act against the territories of Prussia, in the neighborhood of the low countries; and by the indifference with which they saw Nieuport and Ostend put into the hands of France, by the court of Vienna, which Great Britain represented to be contrary to the barrier treaty and the treaty of Utrecht. Without entering into the sufficiency of these grounds of dissatisfaction, which undoubtedly had a great influence on the conduct of Great Britain towards the Dutch, from 1757 until the peace of 1763, it is manifest, that this very dissatisfaction, little short of a disposition to open war, and frequently on the eve of producing it, takes away, in a considerable degree, from the authority of any practice to which it may be supposed to have led, as tending to establish a rule of the public law of Europe. It may not be improper to observe too, that the station occupied by Great Britain, in the seven years' war, (as proud a one as any country ever did occupy) compared with that of the other European powers, was not exactly calculated to make the measures, which her resentments against Holland, or her views against France, might dictate, peculiarly respectful to the general rights of neutrals. In the north, Russia and Sweden were engaged in the confederacy against Prussia, and were, of course, entitled to no consideration in this respect. The Government of Sweden was, besides, weak and impotent. Denmark, it is true, took no part in the war, but she did not suffer by the practice in question. Besides, all these powers combined would have been as nothing against the naval strength of Great Britain in 1758. As to Spain, she could have no concern in the question, and, at length, became involved in the war on the side of France. Upon the whole, in the war of 1756 Great Britain had the power to be unjust, and irresistible temptations to abuse it. In that of 1744 her power was, perhaps, equally great, but every thing was favorable to equity and moderation. The example afforded on this subject, therefore, by the first war, has far better titles to respect, than that furnished by the last.

In the American war, the practice and decisions on this point followed those of the war of 1744.

The question first came before the lords of appeal, in January, 1782, in the Danish cases of the Tiger, Copenhagen, and others, captured in October, 1780, and condemned at St. Kitts, in December following. The grounds on which the captors relied for condemnation, in the Tiger, as set forth at the end of the respondent's printed case, were, "for that the ship, having been trading to Cape François, where none but French ships are allowed to carry on any traffic, and having been laden at the time of the capture, with the produce of the French part of the island of St. Domingo, put on board at Cape François, and both ship and cargo taken confessedly coming from thence, must (pursuant to precedents in the like cases in the last war) to all intents and purposes be deemed a ship and goods belonging to the French, or at least adopted and naturalized as such."

In the Copenhagen, the captor's reasons are thus given:

1st. Because it is allowed, that the ship was destined, with her cargo, to the island of Guadaloupe, and no other place.

2dly. Because it is contrary to the established rule of general law, to admit any neutral ship to go to, and trade at, a port belonging to a colony of the enemy, to which such neutral ship could not have freely traded in time of peace.

On the 22d of January, 1782, these causes came on for hearing before the lords of appeal, who decreed restitution in all of them: thus, in the most solemn and explicit manner disavowing and rejecting the pretended rules of the law of nations, upon which the captors relied; the first of which was literally borrowed from the doctrine of the war of 1756, and the last of which is that very rule on which Great Britain now relies.

It is true that, in these cases, the judgment of the lords was pronounced upon one shape only of the colony trade of France, as carried on by neutrals; that is to say, a trade between the colony of France and that of the country of the neutral shipper. But, as no distinction was supposed to exist, in point of principle, between the different modifications of the trade, and as the judgment went upon general grounds applicable to the entire subject, we shall not be thought to overrate its effect and extent, when we represent it as a complete rejection both of the doctrine of the seven years' war, and of that modern principle, by which it has been attempted to replace it. But, at any rate, the subsequent decrees of the same high tribunal did go that length. Without enumerating the cases of various descriptions, involving the legality of the trade in all its modes, which were favorably adjudged by the lords of appeal, after the American peace, it will be sufficient to mention the case of the Vervagting, decided by them in 1785 and 1786. This was the case of a Danish ship, laden with a cargo of dry goods and provisions, with which she was bound on a voyage from Marseilles to Martinique and Cape François, where she was to take in for Europe a return cargo of West India produce. The ship was not proceeded against, but the cargo, which was claimed for merchants of Ostend, was condemned as enemy's property, (as in truth it was,) by the Vice-admiralty of Antigua, subject to the payment of freight pro rata itineris, or rather for the whole of the outward voyage. On appeal, as to the cargo, the lords of appeal, on the 8th of March, 1785, reversed the condemnation, and ordered further proof of the property to be produced within three months. On the 28th March, 1786, no further proof having been exhibited, and the proctor for the claimants declaring, that he should exhibit none, the lords condemned the cargo, and on the same day reversed the decree below, giving freight pro rata itineris, (from which the neutral master had appealed,) and decreed freight generally, and the costs of the appeal.

It is impossible that a judicial opinion could go more conclusively to the whole question on the colony trade than this; for it not only disavows the pretended illegality of neutral interpositions in that trade, even directly between France and her colonies, (the most exceptionable form, it is said, in which that interposition could present itself,) it not only denies, that property engaged in such a trade is on that account liable to confiscation, (inasmuch as, after having reversed the condemnation of the cargo pronounced below, it proceeds afterwards to condemn it merely for want of further proof as to the property,) but it holds that the trade is so unquestionably lawful to neutrals, as not even to put in jeopardy the claim to freight for that part of the voyage which had not yet begun, and which the party had not yet put himself in a situation to begin. The force of this, and the other British decisions produced by the American war, will not be avoided by suggesting that there was any thing peculiarly favorable in the time when, or the manner in which, France opened her colony trade to neutrals on that occasion. Something of that sort, however, has been said! We find the following language in a very learned opinion on this point: "It is certainly true, that in the last war (the American war) many decisions took place, which then pronounced, that such a trade between France and her colonies was not considered as an unneutral commerce; but under what circumstances? It was understood that France, in opening her colonies, during the war, declared, that this was not done with a temporary view relative to the war, but on a general permanent purpose of altering her colonial system, and of admitting foreign vessels universally and at all times, to a participation of that commerce; taking that to be the fact, (however suspicious its commencement might be, during the actual existence of a war,) there was no ground to say that neutrals were not carrying on a commerce as ordinary as any other in which they could be engaged; and therefore, in the case of the Vervagting, and in many other succeeding cases, the lords decreed payment of freight to the neutral ship owner. It is fit to be remembered, on this occasion, that the conduct of France evinced how little dependence can be placed upon explanations of measures adopted during the pressure of war; for hardly was the ratification of the peace signed, when she returned to her ancient system of colonial monopoly.

We answer to all this that to refer the decision of the lords in the Vervagting and other succeeding cases, to the reason here assigned, is to accuse that high tribunal of acting upon a confidence which has no example in a singularly incredible declaration, (if indeed such a declaration was ever made,) after the utter falsehood of it had been, as this learned opinion does itself inform us, unequivocally and notoriously ascertained.

We have seen that the Vervagting was decided by the lords, in 1785 and 1786, at least two years after France had, as we are told, "returned to her ancient system of colonial monopoly," and when of course the supposed assertion of an intended permanent abandonment of that system could not be permitted to produce any legal consequence.

We answer further, that if this alleged declaration was in fact made, (and we must be allowed to say, that we have found no trace of it out of the opinion above recited,) it never was put into such a formal and authentic shape as to be the fair subject of judicial notice.

It is not contained in the French arrêts of that day, where only it would be proper to look for it, and we are not referred to any other document proceeding from the Government of France in which it is said to appear. There does not, in a word, seem to have been any thing which an enlightened tribunal could be supposed capable of considering as a pledge on the part of France, that she had resolved upon, or even meditated, the extravagant change in her colonial system which, she is said, in this opinion, to have been understood to announce to the world. But even if the declaration in question was actually made, and that, too, with all possible solemnity, still it would be difficult to persuade any thinking man that the sincerity of such a declaration was, in any degree, confided in, or that any person, in any country, could regard it in any other light than as a mere artifice, that could give no right which would not equally well exist without it. Upon the whole, it is manifestly impracticable to rest the decisions of the lords of appeal, in and after the American war, upon any dependence placed on this declaration, of which there is no evidence that it ever was made, which, it is certain, was not authentically or formally made; which, however made, was not, and could not, be believed at any time, far less in 1785 and 1786, when its falsehood had been unquestionably proved by the public and undisguised conduct of its supposed author in direct opposition to it. That Sir James Marriot, who sat in the High Court of Admiralty of Great Britain, during the greater part of the late war, did not consider these decisions as standing upon this ground is evident; for, notwithstanding that, in the war of 1756, he was the most zealous, and perhaps able, advocate for the condemnation of the Dutch ships engaged in the colony trade of France, yet, upon the breaking out of the late war, he relied upon the decisions in the American war, as authoritatively settling the legality of that trade, and decreed accordingly.

If, as a more plausible answer to these decisions, considered in the light of authorities, than that which we have just examined, it should be said they ought rather to be viewed as reluctant sacrifices to policy, or even to necessity, under circumstances of singular difficulty and peril, than as an expression of the deliberate opinion of the lords of appeal, or the Government of Great Britain; on the matter of right it might, perhaps, be sufficient to reply, that if the armed neutrality, coupled with the situation of Great Britain as a party to the war, did in any degree compel these decisions, we might also expect to find, at the same era, some relaxation on the part of that country relative to the doctrine of contraband, upon which the convention of the armed neutrality contained the most direct stipulations, which the northern Powers were particularly interested to enforce. Yet such was not the fact. But in addition to this and other considerations of a similar description, it is natural to inquire why it happened, that, if the lords of appeal were satisfied that Great Britain possessed the right in question, they recorded and gave to the world a series of decisions against it, founded, not upon British orders of council, gratuitously relaxing what was still asserted to be the strict right, (as in the late war,) but upon general principles of public law. However prudence might have required, (although there is no reason to believe it did require,) an abstinence, on the part of Great Britain, from the extreme exercise of the right she had been supposed to claim, still it could not be necessary to give, to the mere forbearance of a claim, the stamp and character of a formal admission, that the claim itself was illegal and unjust. In the late war, as often as the British Government wished to concede and relax, from whatever motive, on the subject of the colony trade of her opponents, an order of council was resorted to, setting forth the nature of the concession, or relaxation, upon which the courts of prize were afterwards to found their sentences; and, undoubtedly, sentences so passed cannot, in any fair reasoning, be considered as deciding more, than that the order of council is obligatory on the courts whose sentences they are. But the decrees of the lords of appeal, in and after the American war, are not of this description; since there existed no order of council on the subject of them, and of course, they are, and ought to be, of the highest weight and authority against Great Britain, on the questions involved in, and adjudged by, them.

This solemn renunciation of the principle in question, in the face of the whole world, by her highest tribunal in matters of prize, reiterated in a succession of decrees, down to the year 1786, and afterwards, is powerfully confirmed by the acquiescence of Great Britain, during the first most important and active period of the late war, in the free and unlimited prosecution by neutrals, of the whole colony trade of France; she did, indeed, at last prohibit that trade by an instruction unprecedented in the annals of maritime depredation; but the revival of her discarded rule was characterized with such circumstances of iniquity and violence, as rather to heighten, by the effect of contrast, the veneration of mankind for the past justice of her tribunals.

The world has not forgotten the instruction to which we allude, or the enormities by which its true character was developed. Produced in mystery, at a moment when universal confidence in the integrity of her Government had brought upon the ocean a prey of vast value and importance; sent abroad to the different naval stations, with such studied secrecy that would almost seem to have been intended to make an experiment how far law and honor could be outraged by a nation, proverbial for respecting both, the heralds by whom it was first announced were the commanders of her commissioned cruisers, who at the same instant carried it into effect with every circumstance of aggravation, if of such an act there can be an aggravation. Upon such conduct there was but one sentiment. It was condemned by reason and justice. It was condemned by that law which flows from and is founded upon them; it was condemned, and will for ever continue to be condemned, by the universal voice of the civilized world. Great Britain has made amends, with the good faith which belongs to her councils, for that act of injustice and oppression; and your memorialists have a strong confidence, that the late departure from the usual course of her policy will be followed by a like disposition to atonement and reparation. The relations which subsist between Great Britain and the United States rest upon the basis of reciprocal interests, and your memorialists see in those interests, as well as in the justice of the British Government, and the firmness of our own, the best reasons to expect a satisfactory answer to their complaints, and a speedy abandonment of that system, by which they have been lately harassed and alarmed.

Your memorialists will not trespass upon your time with a recital of the various acts, by which our coasts, and even our ports and harbors, have been converted into scenes of violence and depredation; by which the security of our trade and property has been impaired, the rights of our territory invaded, the honor of our country humiliated and insulted, and our gallant countrymen oppressed and persecuted. They feel it to be unnecessary to ask that the force of the nation should be employed in repelling and chastising the lawless freebooters, who have dared to spread their ravages, even beyond the seas, which form the principal theatre of their piratical exertions, and to infest our shores with their irregular and ferocious hostility.

These are outrages which have pressed themselves, in a peculiar manner, upon the notice of our Government, and cannot have failed to excite its indignation, and a correspondent disposition to prevent and redress them.

Such is the view which our memorialists have taken, in this anxious crisis of our public affairs, of subjects which appear to them, in an alarming degree, to affect their country and its commerce, and to involve high questions of national honor and interest, of public law, and individual rights, which imperiously demand discussion and adjustment. They do not presume to point out the measures which these great subjects may be supposed to call for. The means of redress for the past, and security for the future, are respectfully and confidently submitted to your wisdom; but your memorialists cannot forbear to indulge a hope, which they would abandon with deep reluctance, that they may yet be found in amicable explanations, with those who have ventured to inflict wrongs upon us, and to advance unjust pretensions to our prejudice.

Representation of the Merchants of Norfolk.

NORFOLK, December 3, 1805.

SIR:

I have been selected by the merchants of this place, to forward to you memorials upon the cases of spoliation committed by the belligerent Powers on their commerce; in consequence of which, I have the honor to address you, and to forward memorials with copies of documents accompanying, in the following cases:

1. Conway and For. Whittle, ship Eliza, John Evans, master.
2. John Granbery, sloop George, Reynolds, master.
3. Donaldson, Thorburn & Co., ship Charles Carter, Tompkins, master.
4. James Dykes & Co, schooner Iris, Samuel Pearson, master.
5. Edward Chamberlain, brig Nancy, John Christy, master.
6. Alexander Leckie, brig Catharine, John Seward, master.
7. Moses Myers, ship Argus, E. Chamberlain, master.
8. Moses Myers, schooner Adeline, Nathaniel Strong, master.
9. Richard Drummond, schooner Favorite, Fletcher, master.
10. John Burke, schooner Two Brothers, Canby, master.

I am directed to state that the originals in each case are lodged with me, or will be subject to my order, provided they are considered by you as requisite, and if they should be so considered, that they will be forwarded whenever you direct them. There are, I am informed, sundry other cases, but the owners either have not received protests from the masters, or have neglected to send them to me; as I receive them I shall do myself the honor to transmit them to your Department.

I have the honor to be, with consideration and respect, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PENNOCK.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, &c.

From Mr. Gore to Mr. Madison.

BOSTON, November 18, 1805.

SIR:

The ship Indus, David Myrick, master, was taken by His Britannic Majesty's ship the Cambrian, Captain John P. Beresford, in latitude thirty-one degrees thirty minutes north, and longitude sixty-one degrees fifty-six minutes west, and sent to Halifax, where she, and all the property on board, belonging to the owners, master, and supercargo, were condemned, on the ground, as is said, of the illegality of the trade which she was prosecuting at the time of the capture. An appeal has been claimed, and will be duly prosecuted, before the lords commissioners of appeal, in Great Britain, by the insurers, to whom the said ship and cargo have been abandoned. These insurers consist of four companies, in the town of Boston, incorporated under the names of the Massachusetts Fire and Marine Insurance, the Suffolk Insurance, the Boston Marine Insurance, and the New England Insurance, who are not only interested in the above decision, as it relates to the particular case in which it was rendered, but are deeply concerned on account of insurances made by them on vessels and cargoes that may be embraced, as they fear, by rules and principles said to have been adopted in the case of the Indus. These fears derive but too much weight from decisions that have taken place in London, condemning property for being in a commerce always by them understood to be lawful, not only from their own sense of the law of nations, but also from the assent of Great Britain, discovered by her former practice, and by principles advanced by her judges in support of such decrees.

The amount of property withheld, and ultimately depending on the decisions of the high court of appeals, in the case of the Indus, is sufficient, of itself, to demand their serious attention; but when combined with the effect of principles, supposed to have been applied in this instance, they are apprehensive of further and still greater injuries to their own property, and that of their fellow citizens in this quarter of the country; and these losses, should they be realized, would be encountered in the prosecution of a trade in which they felt themselves as unoffending against the rights of others—as secure from the interruption of the power that now molests them, as in coasting voyages between different parts of the United States.

They hope, therefore, not to be thought intrusive in asking of the Government its interference, through their minister at the court of London, or otherwise, as the President, in his wisdom, may judge proper, to protect their commercial rights, and to obtain redress of the particular injury of which they complain. They have even felt it a duty, due from them to the Government of their country, to apprize those entrusted with the administration of its concerns, of events, so injurious in themselves, and pregnant with consequences so momentous to their individual property and the general prosperity of the country. Such reflections have influenced these several companies to request me to present you a statement of the case of the Indus, for the inspection of the Government, and the purposes above alluded to; and also to subjoin some of the reasons which have occasioned the security with which they have hazarded their property on voyages now pretended to be unlawful.

In the summer of 1804, Messrs. David Sears and Jonathan Chapman, native citizens of the United States, and residents in Boston, owned a ship called the Indus, which they fitted out for a voyage to India. They put on board her sixty-three thousand six hundred and forty dollars, and three sets of exchange, drawn by themselves, on Messrs. John Hodshon and Son, of Amsterdam, at ninety days' sight, for twenty-five thousand three hundred guilders, which amount of specie and bills they confided to Abishai Barnard, a native citizen of the United States, and supercargo. This ship and property, altogether owned by themselves, they despatched with orders to go to the isles of France and Bourbon, and, if able, to purchase a cargo there, so to invest the specie and bills, if not, to proceed to Batavia, for the same purpose; if not practicable there, to go on to Calcutta, and obtain a cargo, with which cargo, wherever procured, the said ship was directed to return to Boston, unless, before the vessel should quit the isle of France, or Batavia, a peace should take place in Europe, in which event she was ordered to proceed to Falmouth, in England, and to conform herself to the orders of her owners' correspondents in London. All the papers on board showed these facts; and such, and such only, was the property and destination of the vessel and her lading. In a memorandum relating to the purchase of the cargo, given to the supercargo, he was reminded not to forget to insert in the manifest, after the arrival of the vessel in the tide waters of Boston, the words "and Embden," viz:

from the isle of France, or Batavia, to Boston "and Embden," as this would not deprive the owners of the privilege of unloading wholly in Boston. The object of this request was, in case of peace, to avoid an expense and inconvenience which Mr. Sears, the principal owner of this ship and cargo, suffered at the last peace, viz: the unloading of the entire cargo of a vessel called the Arab, from India, in the port of Boston, which, under the then existing circumstances, viz: a state of peace, he inclined to send immediately to Europe, but which he would not have contemplated had not peace taken place, and which he did not anticipate when the vessel sailed from Boston, as he did not foresee a termination of the war: such being the construction put by the collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, on the laws in force, when the vessel referred to arrived, and when the Indus sailed in 1804. The expense of unloading and reloading this vessel would have amounted to several thousand dollars; and in case of the law being at her arrival as when she sailed, and of a peace in Europe, and the owners sending her there, (in which event alone did they ever entertain the least intention of not closing the voyage in America,) this expense might have been saved.

With this property, and under these instructions, the Indus proceeded on her voyage to the isle of France: not being able to procure a cargo there, she went to Batavia, where she loaded with the proceeds of her specie and one set of her bills. In the prosecution of her voyage, from Batavia to Boston, the ship was so damaged by storms, that she was obliged to put into the isle of France, where the vessel was condemned as no longer seaworthy; the cargo was taken out, a new vessel purchased by the supercargo, which he named the Indus; and such of the articles as were on board the former Indus, and not damaged, were re-shipped in the new Indus; these articles, together with some tea, taken on freight for certain citizens of Boston, there to be landed, composed her entire cargo. With this property, she was within a few days, sail of her destined port of Boston, in the latitude and longitude aforesaid, when she was captured by the Cambrian, and sent to Halifax and condemned, as before mentioned.

The assumed ground of condemnation was, as the underwriters are informed, that the direction to insert the words "and Embden," after the arrival of the vessel in the port of Boston, disclosed an intention in the owners to continue the voyage to Europe, whereas, the only object was to reserve to themselves the right to obviate any objection from the custom-house here, to her proceeding thither, in the event of a peace between the present belligerents.

This is manifest from the testimony of the owners, and is confirmed by their instructions to the conductors of this voyage, as to its destination, in case of a peace before they quitted India. On this contingency only were they to proceed otherwise than to Boston. The reason why Mr. Sears directed the words "and Embden" to be inserted, is obvious from what he suffered in the case of the Arab, as related by himself and the collector of the customs; and that it was only in the event of peace that he contemplated sending to Europe the vessel and cargo to which his memorandum referred, is confirmed by his former practice and course of trade, viz: during the last ten years he has been engaged in voyages to India, and likewise in shipping the produce of the East and West Indies to Europe: and in no case, during the existence of war, has he sent to Europe articles imported by himself in the same vessel in which they were brought from India. Further, in the case of the ship Lydia, which arrived from India at Boston, in the summer of 1804, and on board which vessel there was the like instruction as in the Indus, which instruction was complied with by the master; yet, as the war continued, on her arrival at Boston, he sold the whole cargo to a merchant of this town, and also that of the Indus, in the voyage preceding the one in which she was lost, wherein the like precaution was also taken, and for the like purpose; but as it was war when she arrived, the voyage terminated here. Thus, sir, in this case, there exists the most plenary evidence, that the voyage which the Indus was performing, when captured, was direct from Batavia to Boston, there to terminate. A trade perfectly legal, not only in the understanding of the owners, but so acknowledged, admitted, and declared by Great Britain, in her practice, for ten years past, in her instructions to her cruisers, in the decrees of her courts, and in the rules and principles advanced by her judges in promulgating their decrees.

The principle understood to be assumed by Great Britain is, that, in time of war, a trade carried on between two independent nations, one neutral and the other belligerent, is unlawful in the neutral, if the same trade was not allowed and practised in time of peace. This principle, though assumed by Great Britain, is now, and always has been, resisted as unsound, by every other nation. She always assumes as a fact, that the trade with a colony has always been confined, exclusively, to ships of the parent country. In virtue, therefore, of this assumption of principle and fact, she deems unlawful and derogatory to her rights, the trade of a neutral with the colonies of her enemies. However, in the last war, she so far modified her principle, as to assent to the lawfulness of the voyage of a neutral, if direct between the ports of the neutral and the colony of the enemy; and also a trade in such colonial articles from the country of the neutral to any other country, even to the parent country of such colony, provided such articles were imported, bona fide, for the use of the neutral, and there purchased, or afterwards shipped by himself; and also in articles, the produce of the parent kingdom, from the neutral state to the colony of that metropolitan kingdom, provided the exporting and importing were bona fide as in the other case. But this modification she always affected to consider as a relaxation of her strict rights, and from this consideration assumed greater authorities to interfere with the permitted trade, as she would say of neutrals.*

The underwriters have therefore thought it important to examine how far the doctrine is sanctioned by the law of nations, and the grounds on which it is supposed to rest are conformed to, or contravened by, the practice of the belligerents themselves.

This principle was first brought forward in the war of 1756, and was then attempted to be supported on the doctrines advanced by Bynkershock. You, sir, to whom the writings of this eminent civilian are doubtless familiar, must be aware, that the rule laid down by him is brought forward to a very different purpose; and from the manner in which he treats on the rights of neutrals, and the historical fact quoted from Livy, to illustrate and sanction the principle asserted, shows that it can by no means warrant the proceedings which it has been attempted to justify; and that there is no analogy between the case cited and that of the mere peaceable trade of a neutral with a belligerent, in articles not contraband of war, nor to places under blockade.

His general position is, that whatever nations had the power and faculty to do in time of peace, they have the right to do in time of war; except that they have not a right to carry to either of two enemies articles contraband of war, or to trade to blockaded places, because this would be to intermeddle in the war.

The author before cited is the principal, if not the only one, whose opinions are adduced, as capable of affording support, or in any way bearing upon this doctrine. An authority, however, to interrupt the trade of a neutral in war, which he was not free to carry on in peace, is assumed as a legitimate consequence of his acknowledged rights. The law of nations not only prescribes rules for the conduct, and supports the rights of nations at war, but also contains regulations and principles by which the rights of such as remain at peace are protected and defined.

The intercourse between independent nations must exclusively rest on the laws which such nations may choose to establish. This is a natural consequence of the equality and independence of nations. Each may make such commercial and other internal regulations as it thinks proper. It may open its whole trade to all foreign nations, or admit them only to a part; it may indulge one nation in such a commerce, and not others; it may admit them at one time, and refuse them at another; it may restrict its trade to certain parts of its dominions, and refuse the entrance of strangers into others. In this respect it has a right to consult only its own convenience, and whatever it shall choose to admit to others, may be enjoyed by them without consulting a third Power. Great Britain acts upon this principle: at one time she executes her navigation law with strictness; at other times she relaxes most of its regulations, according to the estimate she forms of advantage or disadvantage to be derived from its execution or relaxation; neither does she allow the competence of any foreign Power to call in question her right so to do. In time of peace she compels a strict adherence to the principles and letter of her navigation act: in time of war she suspends most of its provisions, and to this she is doubtless induced by the paramount interest of manning her navy, whereby she is enabled to employ a much greater number of seamen in her own defence, and to destroy the commerce of her foes.

* Polly Lasky. Robinson's Admiralty Reports, page 361. Immanuel Robinson, page 186, particularly 203.

In consequence of a superiority derived, in some degree, from this relaxation, England is rendered an entrepot for receiving and supplying all the products of the world; and after reaping a considerable revenue from the merchandise thus introduced, she furnishes not only the continent of Europe generally, but her own enemy, with such articles as are wanted, many of which she prevents his receiving in the ordinary course.

The other nations of Europe possessing foreign colonies, and influenced by motives of convenience, certainly not by considerations of a higher nature than actuate Great Britain, find their advantage in a similar change of their commercial systems.

The mere circumstance that the innocent property of a neutral is engaged in a trade permitted now, though prohibited at a former period, is in itself perfectly innocent, and does not seem capable of interfering with the rights, or justifying the complaints of a third Power.

The ordinary policy of a nation may be to encourage the manufacture or growth of a certain article within its own dominions, and for this end may prohibit or restrict the importation of the like articles from other countries. Does the repeal or suspension of such restriction confer any right to impede the transportation, by a third, of the article, the prohibition whereof is suspended? Because the corn laws of a nation operate three years in five, as a prohibition to the importation of all corn, can it be inferred that a friendly Power should abstain from carrying its surplus corn to market? Has any belligerent a right to stop the corn owned by neutral merchants on the way to its enemy, whose crops have failed, and prohibitory laws have been repealed? The simple state of the case, that the trade, though illegal in peace, is legal in war, decides the question.

Recourse is therefore had to another principle, in order to render that unlawful which, on every ground of the equality and independence of nations, is lawful.

The belligerent has a right to distress the person and property of his enemy, and thereby compel a submission to his demand, and for this purpose he may use all the means in his power.

By interrupting the trade of neutrals which is opened to them in war, and was prohibited in peace, the belligerent distresses his enemy, lessens his revenue, and prevents the exercise of his commercial capital and the employment of his merchants, and deprives him of the enjoyment of those articles which administer to his comfort and convenience; therefore such interruption is lawful.

An obvious answer to this reasoning is, that it proves too much, and is founded on a principle so comprehensive as to embrace all trade between neutrals and a nation at war. If it distress a nation to interrupt that commerce, which has become lawful since the war, it would distress him much more to cut off all trade, that which was allowed in time of peace, as well as that which was not; and the same reason which is used to authorize an interruption of the one would as well justify the other. Indeed, we have several times seen the like doctrine extended this length in the heat of contest; but no instance has occurred of an attempt to vindicate it in time of peace: for the legality of a trade in innocent articles, to a place not blockaded, and the right of the neutral to carry it on, depends entirely on the laws of the two countries between which, and by whose inhabitants it is prosecuted, and in no degree on the consent of the belligerent. If this argument of distress, combined with that of an unaccustomed trade, should be admitted in all its latitude, no trade with belligerents would be legal to neutrals. The enemies of Great Britain would be disposed to attribute much weight to a consideration of the peculiar advantages which a Power constituted as hers may be supposed to derive, and such evils as she may be presumed to prevent by the relaxation of her commercial system. A continental Power may derive some accommodation and some convenience from relaxing her commercial restrictions; but nothing essential to her safety, nothing, as was demonstrated in the last war, materially affecting the great objects of the contest. She might obtain the articles of East and West India produce a little cheaper by these means, than if compelled to procure them by her own ships, or through the medium of her enemy; for it is a circumstance which very much impairs the argument of distressing the foe, that in modern wars it is the practice of commercial nations, notwithstanding they respectively capture each other's property, to open their ports for the exchange of their merchandise, by the assistance of neutrals, and in this way afford the succor they mutually need. It will, however, be said that it is not the trade between neutral countries and the metropolitan dominions of Europe which is deemed illegal, but the trade of neutrals with their colonies. It is not easy to perceive the grounds on which this distinction rests, but without complaining of an exceptionable rule, because the practice under it is not as extensive as its principle might be supposed to warrant, it may be examined in the case to which it is applied.

The argument of distressing the enemy is adduced to vindicate the interruption of the trade of neutrals with enemies' colonies. This distress can be inflicted in two ways: by depriving the colony of the necessary supplies, or the parent country of the colony productions. To supply the enemies' colonies is now considered legal, provided it be done from the neutral country; and also to furnish the parent country with the produce of the colony, provided it be done from the neutral country. The agument, therefore, of distress is narrowed down to a mere trifle; to the addition of a fraction in the price of the article supplied to the parent country; for, so far as respects the supply of the colony and the finding a market for its produce, and the arguments flowing from thence, these, surely the most plausible on the score of inflicting distress, are utterly abandoned. But further, the same commercial spirit which has been before noticed, leads the great nations of Europe themselves to contribute to those very supplies, the depriving the enemy whereof is alleged as a justification for interrupting the trade of neutrals. Not only a trade in Europe, but a regular and authorized trade, to the extent of every necessary and almost every other supply, was carried on during the last war between the British and Spanish colonies; and instances have again and again occurred, and before the close of the late war ceased to be considered as extraordinary, where the cargoes of neutral vessels bound to the Spanish colonies were seized by the British, and condemned in the Vice-admiralty courts, on pretence that the trade was illegal; and the articles thus stopped and made prize of, under the plea of distressing the enemy, were shipped on board a Spanish or British vessel supplied with a British license, and sent to the original port of their destination. Surely such a mode of distressing the enemy may be more properly denominated distressing the neutral, for the purpose of supplying the enemy at the exclusive profit of the belligerent.

Such, sir, are some of the observations which these gentlemen make on the difference between the practice and avowed principles of belligerents, and the unavoidable consequences of such principles, and which satisfy their minds that, according to the practice of belligerents themselves, there is no foundation for the arguments raised on pretence of distressing the enemy, and that interrupting a trade in war, because not exercised in peace, is inconsistent with the equality and independence of nations, and an infringement of their perfect rights. It is also evident, that the wants and interests of all nations at war, even of those who possess the most powerful and commercial military navy, require them to contradict in their own practice those principles which are avowed in justification of the injuries they inflict on neutrals.

To support this doctrine, it is also necessary to assume as true, that all trade and intercourse between the colonies of the different European Powers and other countries, have been constantly and uniformly interdicted in time of peace, and that such colonies depended exclusively on the metropolitan kingdom for supplies of every kind. That nothing could be received by or from them, but through the mother country; except when the overpowering force of the public enemy had prevented all such communication. This supposed exclusive trade, so confidently assumed, will, on examination, be found subject to many exceptions. It is well known that some of the British West India colonies, during the commotion which existed in England in consequence of the disagreement between Charles the First and his Parliament, exported their produce to Europe by Dutch ships, manned with Dutch seamen, and that the navigation act originated in the double view of punishing some of these colonies, who had discovered an attachment to the cause of defeated royalty, and of curtailing the means enjoyed by the Dutch of increasing their wealth, influence, and power. An intercourse has always been admitted; at some times very restrained; at others more extended, as suited the caprice of the Governors, or as the necessity of the colonies required.

Until a period subsequent to the treaty of Utrecht, France seems to have paid no attention to her West India colonies. Previous to that time, they do not appear to have enjoyed any constant correspondence or direct intercourse with the mother country; and at all times, as well as before, since the independence of the continental colonies of Great Britain, a direct trade has existed between the colonies of France and those of Great Britain in the West Indies, and also with the settlements on the continent of North America, more or less limited, as real or pretended convenience demanded.

Great Britain, prior to the independence of the United States, had less occasion to admit the entry of vessels and merchandise from, or the export of, the produce of her colonies to any other than her own dominions: yet instances are not wanting of the relaxation of her navigation act for both purposes, and in the year 1739 a bill passed the Parliament, allowing the sugar colonies, for a limited time, to export their produce to foreign ports. In fact, colonies depending on other countries for their supplies, and at a distance from their parent country, must, at times, admit the intercourse of foreigners, or suffer the greatest impoverishment and distress. It will not be denied, that the British provinces in the West Indies depend, in a great measure, if not altogether, on the United States, for their corn. True it is, that the shipment is generally made in the British vessels; but should the United States deem it for their interest, to insist on its being transported thither in American ships, it is not certain that the convenience, not to say the necessities of the colonies, would not render an acquiescence advisable. The fact is, in regard to the colonies in the West Indies, whether belonging to France or Great Britain, that the monopoly has not been, and, in the nature of things, never can be very strict, constant, and exclusive. The United States always have enjoyed, and without hazarding much, one may pronounce with confidence, that they always must enjoy a direct intercourse with their colonies, however adverse to the dispositions or supposed interest of the parent countries in Europe. Thus stands the fact of an accustomed trade in time of peace as relates to the West Indies. In regard to the East Indies, it is certain that the vessels of the United States have always gone freely to the British settlements there, and it is believed that the vessels of our country were the first to export sugars from Bengal, and that their exportations have augmented immensely the culture of that article in that country. To many of the Dutch settlements our vessels have gone with but little interruption; and to some of these, and to the French possessions, more especially to the isles of France and Bourbon, the trade of the United States has been constant, uninterrupted, and increasing, ever since the year 1784. It is difficult then, sir, for these gentlemen to conceive how the doctrine of the fact assumed by Great Britain can be supported by the law of nations, or reconciled to the truth.

Moreover, Great Britain professes that the decisions of her admiralty courts are always regulated by the law of nations; that they do not bend to particular circumstances, nor are guided by the orders or instructions of the Government. The principles of this law are immutable; being founded on truth and justice, they are ever the same. Now it appears from the practice of Great Britain herself, that in the war of 1744, and in that which was concluded in 1783, whether the trade was an accustomed one in time of peace, made no part of the discussion, nor was it pretended that the trade not having been prosecuted in peace, subjected the vessel or cargo to forfeiture in war. It seems more like the offspring of her pre-eminent power on the ocean in the two wars of 1756, and that which lately ended, than the legitimate doctrine of right and justice. In the war of 1756 Dutch vessels, by special license from France, were permitted to export the produce of the French colonies. These were captured and condemned, on the ground that by adoption they had become French vessels. Afterwards the property was carried to Monte Christi, and exported thence in Dutch vessels. Particular trades and special privileges were also allowed by France, to vessels belonging to citizens of Amsterdam, as a gratification for their peculiar exertions to induce the stadtholder to take part with France against Great Britain. Vessels and their cargoes, so circumstanced, were captured and condemned by the British, and this principle was then brought forward to justify their conduct, as covering in their courts all the cases by a rule as extensive as was the power and cupidity of their cruisers on the sea.

In the war for the independence of America, this principle, set up for the first time in that which preceded it, and contrary to former practice, was abandoned. This is exemplified in the following case, viz: a vessel bound from Marseilles to Martinico and back again, was taken on the outward voyage; the Vice-admiralty court at Antigua gave half freight. On appeal, the lords of appeal gave the whole. It is said, in answer to this, that France opened her colonies, and though it was during the existence of war, yet it was the profession of keeping them always so, but was afterwards found delusive. The lords of appeal, however, in the case of the Danish vessel, could not have acted upon such grounds: for their decision was in 1786, three years after the peace, and after it was manifest, if any doubt had before existed, that the general opening of the trade between the colonies and the mother country to foreigners, was a temporary expedient, and dependent on the duration of the war. The claim before them was merely equitable, being for freight of that part of the voyage which had not been performed, and to obtain which, the party claiming is bound to show that he has offended no law, and interfered with no rights of the belligerent.

What renders the conduct of Great Britain peculiarly injurious to the merchants of our country at this time is the extension of this offensive doctrine, contrary to her own express and public declaration of the law during the last war: for it was then declared, that the importation from an enemy's colony to the country to which the ship belonged, and the subsequent exportation, was lawful; and so of property, the produce of the parent country, going from the United States to the colony—Vide cases of Immanuel and Polly, in Robinson's Admiralty Reports, before cited. Whereas, property going from the United States, the produce of an enemy's country, to her colony, although bona fide imported and landed in the United States, and exported on the sole account and risk of the American merchant, is now taken and condemned on the ground that the same person and vessel imported and exported the same articles; and thus, by an arbitrary interpretation of the intention of the merchant, the second voyage is adjudged to be a continuance of the first. If this new and extraordinary doctrine of continuity is maintained on the part of Great Britain, and acquiesced in by the United States, a very large property, now afloat, may be subject to condemnation, and it must follow that an extensive trade, which has been carried on with great advantage by the United States for these twelve years, and admitted to be lawful, will be totally annihilated.

The Indus and cargo have been condemned on the mere possibility that the same might go to Europe from Boston in case of a peace, in which event Great Britain could pretend to no authority to question the voyage she should make.

Now, to adopt a principle of dubious right in its own nature, and then to extend such principle to a further restriction of the trade of the neutral, without notice, is spreading a snare to entrap the property and defeat the acknowledged rights to which he is entitled.

Such are its effects, both on the individual owners of this property, as well as on the underwriters. For Mr. Sears and Mr. Chapman, in planning this voyage, and, indeed, in every one they ever prosecuted, have endeavored to ascertain what the law authorized them to do, as that law was understood and practised by the belligerents, and for this purpose they examined the orders to the British cruisers, the adjudications in the British courts during the last war, and conceived themselves clearly within even the narrowest limits to which Great Britain professed to circumscribe the trade of neutrals. The underwriters, also, have been uniformly guided, in insuring property, by the rules declared and promulgated by the belligerents themselves. In the present case they considered that, according to the clearest evidence of those rules, they incurred no risk from British cruisers.

Should, then, Great Britain undertake to presume that the law would authorize the interruption of such a trade, these gentlemen cannot bring themselves to believe that, under even such impressions of her rights, she would so far forget what is due to her former understanding of the law, and to the encouragement given to such a commerce, as, without notice of her altered sentiments, to seize and confiscate the property of those who had so conformed their voyages to rules pronounced by herself.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Esq., Secretary of State.

BOSTON, November 26, 1805.

SIR:

Since making the statement herewith enclosed, the underwriters find themselves called upon to represent a new cause of complaint, founded on a still further extension of the principle before remarked on, and which is now made the ground of condemning property going to Europe merely because it is imported into the United States, and exported by the same person, although it has been landed and subjected to the payment of duties here, and was transporting in another vessel and belonging to different owners.

It is the case of property, belonging to the same Mr. Sears, who shipped sundry goods (some of them imported by himself in various vessels, and others purchased here) on board the George Washington, captain Porter, a general freighting ship bound for Amsterdam from Boston.

That vessel has been captured, and the property imported and thus exported, has been condemned in London. This is also abandoned to the underwriters.

This proceeding of the British has been so unforeseen and unexpected by even the most prudent and circumspect, that very serious and general consequences are to be apprehended in this part of the community.

Should the facts related in the statement of the case of the Indus, or of the George Washington now mentioned, require any further verification than what accompanies these papers, and you will please to notify me thereof, I will endeavor to supply the same.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON, Esq. C. GORE.

MARINE INSURANCE OFFICE, NEW YORK, May 15, 1805.

SIR:

On the trial of several vessels, taken on their voyage from this port to Curacoa, the enclosed certificate from Admiral Duckworth was adduced as evidence of the blockade of that island, and had, without doubt, great influence in their condemnation. It is proper to say that no such blockade was ever promulgated or known here; neither was it, as is usual in such cases, communicated to the masters of these vessels; but, on the contrary, they were taken possession of and sent to Jamaica, and there condemned as "enemy's property." As our public offices are deeply interested in these decisions, it becomes necessary for us to know whether this communication was ever made to our Government, and, if so, in what light it was received or considered, for on this will our success on the appeals depend; and, that you may have a correct view of the business, we cover you the masters' protests of the five vessels wherein we are more immediately concerned, from which the facts herein stated will appear, and on which we request your advice and opinion for our government in accepting or rejecting some overtures made us by the captors; and on this subject it is proper to add, that, when successful in an appeal, we sustain great injury from the sale or valuation of property. This arises from forced sales, or appraisement of goods not adapted to the market, and is a subject well worth the attention of the Government. We will illustrate this grievance by a recent case. A vessel worth seven thousand dollars was lately sold in Jamaica for one thousand; of course, our recovery is limited to this sum.

We are, with great respect, sir, the Marine Insurance Company of New York, by

W. NEILSON, President.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

Certificate of the blockade of Curacoa, filed July 30, 1804.

This is to certify whom it may concern, that I, Sir John Thomas Duckworth, knight of the bath, vice-admiral of the blue squadron, and commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed at Jamaica, Bahama Islands, and seas adjacent, deeming it for the good of the King's service, and for the annoyance of the enemy, did direct the port of Amsterdam, in the island of Curacoa, to be blockaded by part of the naval force under my orders; and that notification of such blockade be transmitted to the British minister in America, and to the governors of the Danish and Swedish islands, also of Curacoa, and other Spanish ports, on the 2d day of March, 1804. And I do further certify, that the receipt of the said notification is acknowledged by the British minister, and that it was communicated by him to the Government of the United States of America in the month of April following.

Given under my hand, on board His Majesty's ship Shark, in Port Royal harbor, this 30th day of July, 1804.

Abraham S. Hallett, of the city of New York, merchant, being duly affirmed, according to law, saith, that the annexed instrument of writing is a true and accurate copy of the protest which this affirmant received from Jamaica, and that Hezekiah Pinkham, the master of the schooner Favorite therein mentioned, is not at present in the city of New York, to the knowledge of this affirmant; and he further saith, that he was the true and lawful owner of the schooner Favorite, and of her general cargo, on her late voyage, and that no person or persons whatever, being a subject of France, or of the United Provinces, or of the Batavian, Italian, or Ligurian republics, or inhabiting within any of the territories of France, of the United Provinces, or the said republics, nor their factors or agents, nor any other enemies of the crown of Great Britain, had at the time of the capture of the said vessel, any right, title, or interest either directly in and to the said schooner the Favorite, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, or in or to the cargo before mentioned, or any part thereof; but that the said schooner the Favorite, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and her general cargo, did at the time of the sailing of the said vessel from New York, and at the time of the capture thereof, belong to this affirmant, and would so have belonged to him, in case the said vessel had arrived at Curacoa, her port of destination, and until the same had there been sold anddisposed of for, and on the account and benefit of the affirmant: and this affirmant further saith, that he was not, at the time of shipping the cargo, on board of the said vessel, or at any time after, nor is he at this present time engaged in any partnership in any house of trade belonging to any person or persons enemies of the crown of Great Britain, residing within any of the territories of France, or of the United Provinces, or the Batavian, Italian, or Ligurian republics; and he further saith, that he is a natural born citizen of the United States of America, and was at the time of the sailing of the said vessel on the voyage before mentioned, and still is a resident of the city of New York: and this affirmant further saith, that when he despatched the said vessel on the voyage aforesaid, he did not know that the said island of Curacoa was in a state of blockade.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of New York, ss.

By this public instrument, be it known to all whom the same doth or may concern, that I, Edward W. Laight, a public notary in and for the State of New York, by letters patent under the great seal of the said State, duly commissioned and sworn, and in and by the said letters patent invested with full power and authority to attest deeds, wills, testaments, codicils, agreements, and other instruments, in writing, and to administer any oath, or oaths, to any person or persons, do hereby certify, that the writing hereunto annexed is a true and accurate copy of a protest signed Thomas Brown, and purporting to be sworn to by George Kinkead, which said protest appears to me, the said notary, to be an original instrument, which said copy, hereunto annexed, I, the said notary, have this day duly collated with the said original protest, and find the same to be, in all respects, a true and accurate copy of the said original.

Whereof an attestation being required, I have granted this under my notarial firm and seal.

Done at the city of New York, in the said State of New York, the ninth day of May, in the year one thou sand eight hundred and five.

JAMAICA, ss.

Thomas Brown, late of Perth Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, in the State of New Jersey, in North America, a native citizen of the United States of America, but at present in the city and parish of Kingston, in the county of Surry, and in the island of Jamaica, mariner, late master of the American schooner Bethia, belonging to James Parker, Joseph March, and Cortlandt L. Parker, of Perth Amboy, aforesaid, merchants, and native citizens of the United States aforesaid, being duly sworn, solemnly maketh oath and deposeth, that the said schooner Bethia, under this deponent's command, sailed from the port of Perth Amboy, aforesaid, about the second day of December, last past, being in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, bound to the island of Curacoa, with a cargo of provisions, the property of the said James Parker, Joseph Marsh, and Cortlandt L. Parker. That he proceeded on his said intended voyage, without any material occurrences, and without meeting with any interruption, until the 22d day of said month of December, when being off the said island of Curacoa, the said schooner was boarded, and forcibly taken possession of by an officer and seamen from His Britannic Majesty's ship of war La Franchise, the honorable John Murray, Esq. commander, who took out of the said schooner the Bethia the mate and all the crew. And this deponent further saith, that the said schooner Bethia, then under the command of a prize-master and four English seamen, continued in company with the said ship La Franchise, until 6 P. M. on the same day, when the prize master bore away for the island of Jamaica, aforesaid, by order of the said honorable John Murray, Esq. and arrived in Kingston, aforesaid, on the 28th day of said month of December; the said schooner being much damaged in her sails and rigging by the inattention of the prize-master. And this deponent further maketh oath and saith that the agents of the said ship La Franchise, having proceeded against the said schooner Bethia and cargo in the court of Vice-admiralty, in the said island, for an intentional breach of blockade, this deponent caused a claim to be put in for the same, on behalf of the aforesaid owners. That on the 12th day of January, instant, the same came on to be heard, when his honor, the judge of the said court, was pleased to condemn the said schooner and cargo, as prize to His Britannic Majesty's said ship of war La Franchise.

By this public instrument, be it known to all whom the same doth or may concern, that I, Edward W. Laight, a public notary in and for the State of New York, by letters patent under the great seal of the said State, duly commissioned and sworn, and in and by the said letters patent invested with full power and authority to attest deeds, wills, testaments, codicils, agreements, and other instruments in writing, and to administer any oath or oaths, to any person or persons, do hereby certify, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me the said notary, at the city of New York, personally came and appeared Jaques Ruden and Israel Benjamin Jacobs, who in my presence then and there respectively subscribed the affidavits hereunto annexed, and each being by me duly sworn deposed and said that the contents of the affidavit by him were true.

Whereof an attestation being required, I have granted this under my notarial firm and seal.

Done at the city of New York, in the said State of New York, the 9th day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and five.

E. W. LAIGHT, Notary Public.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, City of New York, ss.

Jaques Ruden, of the city of New York, merchant, being duly sworn, saith, that he was the true and lawful owner of the American schooner the Performance, Isaiah Smart, master, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and of the general cargo laden on board her at New York, the tenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, the said schooner then lying in the harbor of New York, and bound on a voyage to Curacoa. And this deponent further saith, that no person or persons whatever, being a subject or subjects, citizen or citizens of France, or of the United Provinces, or of the Batavian, Italian, or Ligurian republics, their factors or agents, nor any other enemies of the crown of Great Britain, had, at the time of the shipping of the said cargo, or at the time of the capture of the said schooner, any right, title, or interest, either directly or indirectly, in and to the said schooner, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, or to her cargo, so laden on board of her by this deponent as aforesaid, or to any part thereof; but that the said schooner and her cargo aforesaid, did, at the time of the departure of the said vessel on the voyage aforesaid, and at the time of her capture, belong to this deponent, and would so have belonged to him had she arrived in safety at Curacoa, the port of destination. And this deponent further saith, that he is a citizen of the United States of America, and was, at the time of the shipping of the said cargo, and still is, a resident of the city of New York.

Isaiah Smart, at present of the city and parish of Kingston, in the county of Surry, in the said island, master mariner, master of a certain schooner or vessel called the Performance, Israel Benjamin Jacobs, at present of the said city and parish of Kingston, late supercargo on board of the said schooner, Benjamin Remington, at present of the same place, mariner, the mate of the said schooner, and Zachariah Rhodes, at present also of the same place, mariner, a seaman on board of the said schooner, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, severally and respectively make oath and say, that, on or about the 13th day of December now last past, they, these deponents, respectively departed and sailed, in and on board the said schooner or vessel, called the Performance, from the port of New York, in the United States of North America, cleared out for and bound to the island of Curacoa, with a cargo consisting of provisions and a few bales of dry goods, the property of Jaques Ruden of the city of New York, merchant, consigned to this deponent, the said Israel Benjamin Jacobs, for sales and returns. And these deponents further severally make oath and say, that after their departure from New York, as aforesaid, they proceeded on their voyage for and towards Curacoa aforesaid, without any thing material happening, (except meeting with several gales of wind) until about six o'clock in the morning of the 4th day of January last, when they had come in sight of the island of Bonaire, which was at that time bearing south southwest, and distant about three leagues; and these deponents say, that they made all sail, and run down with the said schooner close under the northwest point of the said island of Bonaire, making the best of their way for Curacoa; and that about nine o'clock in the morning of the said last mentioned day, a sail, which afterwards proved to be His Britannic Majesty's ship Franchise, commanded by the honorable John Murray, Esq. was descried from the said schooner, to the eastward, close under the said island of Bonaire, which sail immediately bore down for the said schooner: and these deponents further severally say, that the said schooner continued to make all sail for Curacoa, and the said ship Franchise chased the said schooner, firing frequently at her, till about 11 o'clock on the same day, when the peak of the said island of Bonaire bearing east northeast, three or four leagues distant, and the platform at Curacoa bearing southwest, and the said ship Franchise drawing near, the said schooner hove to for her to come up, which she did in a short time afterwards, and a boat was then sent from her on board the said schooner, with orders for these deponents, the said Isaiah Smart, Israel Benjamin Jacobs, and Benjamin Remington, to go on board the said ship Franchise; and these deponents, the said Isaiah Smart, Israel Benjamin Jacobs, and Benjamin Remington, for themselves, respectively, further severally say, that, in pursuance of the aforesaid orders, did go on board the Franchise, carrying with them all the papers belonging to the said schooner and her cargo, and that the honorable John Murray, Esq. the commander of the said ship, afterwards (and without warning off the said schooner from entering Curacoa,) took possession of the said schooner, and sent on board of her a prize-master and crew, from the Franchise, (together with these deponents,) with orders to proceed with the said schooner for the island of Jamaica aforesaid, where she arrived on the 9th day of the said month of January last. And these deponents further severally say, that since the arrival of the said schooner in this island, she hath been, together with her cargo, proceeded against in the court of vice-admiralty of the said island; and these deponents, the said Isaiah Smart, and Israel Benjamin Jacobs, caused a claim to be interposed for the same; but the said schooner and her cargo (except the private adventures of these deponents, the said Isaiah Smart and Benjamin Remington) have been by the said court condemned and confiscated as good and lawful prize to His Britannic Majesty's said ship Franchise, on the ground, as these deponents are informed, and believe, of an intentional breach of blockade.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, City of New York, ss:

Thomas Stagg, Jun. of the city of New York, merchant, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that he, together with Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg, likewise of the city of New York, merchants, were the true and lawful owners of the brig Lapwing, Lemuel Bourne, master, on her late voyage to Curacoa, and of the cargo on board of the said vessel, and that no person or persons whatever, being a subject or subjects, citizen or citizens of France, or of the United Provinces, or of the Batavian, Italian, or Ligurian republics, or inhabiting within the territory of France or the United Provinces, or of the Italian, Batavian, or Ligurian republics, their factors or agents, or any other enemies of the crown of Great Britain, had, either directly or indirectly, any right, title, or interest in the said brig the Lapwing or her cargo, or any part thereof, at the time of her sailing from New York, on her late voyage, or at the time of her capture, but that the said vessel and her cargo belonged to this deponent and the said Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg, and would so have continued to have belonged to them, had the said vessel arrived in safety at her port of destination, and until the said cargo had there been sold and disposed of, for and on account of this deponent and the said Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg; and this deponent further saith, that he was not, nor were the said Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg, or either of them, at the time of the sailing of the said vessel on the voyage aforesaid, or at any time after, nor are they, or either of them, at this present time, engaged in any partnership in any house of trade belonging to any person or persons enemies of the crown of Great Britain, residing within any of the territories of France, of the United Provinces, or of the Batavian, Italian, or Ligurian republics. And he further saith, that he is a natural born citizen of the United States of America, and that the said Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg are likewise natural born citizens of the United States, and that he, this deponent, and the said Thomas Snell and Peter Stagg were, at the time of the shipping of the cargo on board of the said vessel, in the voyage aforesaid, and still are residents in the city of New York, carrying on trade under the firm of Snell, Stagg, and Co.; and this deponent further saith, that he did not know at the time of sailing of the vessel on the voyage aforesaid, that the island of Curacoa was in a state of blockade. And this deponent further saith, that the annexed instrument of writing is a true and accurate copy of the protest received by this deponent from Jamaica.

I, Edward W. Laight, a public notary for the State of New York, do hereby certify, that on the 10th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, personally appeared before me Thomas Stagg Jun. the persons named in and who subscribed the aforegoing affidavit, and was by me duly sworn to the contents o the affidavit by him before subscribing.

Quod Attestor,

E. W. LAIGHT, Notary Public.

JAMAICA, ss:

Lemuel Bourne, at present of the city and parish of Kingston, in the county of Surry, in the said island, and master mariner, late master of the brig Lapwing, from New York in the United States of America, and Charles Selden, also at present of the city and parish of Kingston aforesaid, mariner, late mate on board of the said brig, being respectively duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, severally make oath and say, that, on the 28th of October now last past, the said brig Lapwing sailed from New York aforesaid, with a cargo on board of her consisting of dry goods, cheese, claret, flour, provisions and lumber, the property of, and belonging to Messrs. Snell, Stagg, and Co. of the said city of New York, merchants and co-partners, destined for the island of Curacoa, and consigned to a Mr. Joseph Foulke, merchant there; and these deponents further severally make oath and say, that they did not speak with any vessel, nor meet with any material occurrence during their voyage, save only that the said brig Lapwing was very leaky from the commencement of her voyage, and continued so until the time of her capture, as hereinafter is mentioned, insomuch as to render it necessary to pump every quarter of an hour. And these deponents further severally make oath and say, that, at eight o'clock A. M. on Monday, the 12th day of November, now last past, they saw the island of Bonaire, and at two o'clock P. M. on the last mentioned day, when off the east end of Curacoa, the brig was captured by His Britannic Majesty's ship of war Diana, Thomas James Maling, Esq. commander, and sloop Pelican, John Marshall, Esq. commander, on the pretence, as they informed these deponents, that the said brig was bound to a blockaded port. And these deponents further severally make oath and say, that the said John Marshall took this deponent, Lemuel Bourne, and the whole of the crew, except this deponent, Charles Selden, and one sick man, out of the said brig Lapwing, on board the said sloop Pelican, and ordered the said brig Lapwing down to this island for adjudication. And these deponents further severally make oath and say, that the said brig Lapwing arrived in the harbor of Port Royal, in the said island of Jamaica, on the 21st day of the said month of November, and shortly after the said Thomas James Maling and John Marshall, on behalf of themselves and their officers, seamen, marines, and mariners, instituted a suit in the Vice-admiralty court of the said island against the said brig Lapwing and the cargo on board her; and this deponent, the said Lemuel Bourne, further saith, that having caused a claim to be filed in the said court, to the said brig's cargo, on behalf of the said Messrs. Snell, Stagg, and Co. the owners thereof, the same came on to be heard at the city and parish of Kingston aforesaid, on Monday the 17th day of December now instant, when his honor the judge of the said court was pleased to condemn the said brig and cargo, from which said sentence this deponent's counsel prayed leave to appeal, and which was granted in the usual terms.

WILLIAM SAVAGE, Magistrate.

BRITISH CAPTURES.

Schooner Charlotte, Masterton.

Insured for B. Dupoy, 19th October 1803, from Cape Francois to New York.
On cargo, $11,000 at four and a half per cent. - - - - - - - - - $10,780

This cargo consisted solely of coffee, purchased and received from the French Government for the outward cargo sold to them, and it was at all times the true and bona fide property of B. Dupoy the assured.

This vessel sailed from Cape Francois 19th October, 1803, and on the same day, going out of the harbor, was taken by the British frigate Æolus, then lying there, and by Commodore Loring, of the British M. W., ordered for Jamaica. On the 24th, at midnight, captured by a French privateer commanded by one John Madelean, who carried them to St. Jago de Cuba. The captain applied to the Governor for redress, but none was afforded; the most part of the cargo taken out of the vessel, and the remainder offered for sale.

Schooner Independence, James Taylor.

Insured for B. Dupoy 25th October, 1803, from New York to Cape Francois.
If forbid entering Cape Francois, to proceed to any other port in the West Indies, not blockaded.

Vessel, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	$2,200
Cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	3,300
	$5,574

Particulars of cargo: twelve casks of claret, pork, beef, flour, lard, cheese, sweet oil, soap, candles, onions, and empty bags. This vessel was within three leagues of the harbor of Cape François on the 16th November, 1803, His Britannic Majesty's sloop of war La Blanche and three others cruising off the harbor, and his register endorsed by Captain Mudge of the La Blanche not to enter said harbor, or go within three leagues of it; if he did, he should take possession of said schooner. In half an hour after the captain returned on board, a boat from the Bellerophon took charge of and ordered the schooner Independence for Jamaica, and she arrived there the 26th November. This vessel was condemned in Jamaica, and the cost to the owners enormous.

Ship Mercury, Speck.

Insured for John Juhel 24th July, 1804, from Martinique to New York.
In cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - $10,000

Cargo, two hundred and seventeen hogsheads clayed, six hogsheads Muscovado, and one tierce brown, sugar. This vessel was captured 11th September, 1804, by the Galatea frigate, Heathcote, carried to Antigua, and there condemned on the 7th October, 1804.

This vessel was a fine French ship, purchased in Martinique by Archibald A. Cock for account of his master, John Juhel of New York. A. A. Cock had been sent to Martinique to collect debts chiefly arising from cargoes sent there while under the British Government, due the said John Juhel, to receive consignments of cargoes from him, to make contracts for sugar and coffee, and to pay for the same from proceeds of the outward cargoes, and make returns to New York.

So far as can be collected from the papers, it appears that A. A. Cock was considered as domiciled at Martinique, and consequently affects the property of his master, a citizen of the United States, but is generally condemned as enemy's property.

Schooner Nancy, Hurd.

Insured for John Juhel, 5th March, 1804, from New York to Martinique, and, if ordered away by a British cruiser, to proceed to St. Thomas, and from thence to New York, warranted American property, in cargo eight thousand five hundred dollars, - - - - - - - - - - - $8,527

Cargo of this vessel sugar and coffee. This vessel arrived at Martinique without interruption, and, on the homeward voyage was captured on the 29th April, 1804, by the frigate Boston, Captain Douglas, sent to and condemned at Halifax, for a breach of blockade at Martinique, notwithstanding the orders to Commodore Hood respecting the blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe.

An appeal is preferred to the lords in England.

Brig Jefferson, J. Crocker.

Insured for Ignatius P. Longchamp, 28th June 1804, from Bordeaux to New York.

Vessel, - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	$4,000
Cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	12,000
	$16,000

Cargo consisted of wines, brandy, and some other articles. This vessel was purchased in France with property left there by him and for his sole account. The cargo also purchased from the same means, the amount left in France in debts due Mr. Longchamp, as appears from sundry documents.

This vessel was captured off the Hook, on the 26th July, by the Cambrian and Leander, ordered for Halifax, the vessel and cargo condemned the 24th September, 1804.

This is a flagrant act of injustice. The only cause for condemnation, we can discover, is that Mr. Longchamp had been in France in the last three years, and that his brother was a conscript in the French service.

Mr. J. P. Longchamp is a native of Avignon.

An appeal is preferred to the lords in England.

Ship John, Patterson, from New Orleans to Bordeaux.

Insured for Joseph Thibaud, 13th March, 1805.
Cargo $4,000, - - - - - - - - - - - - - $4,000

The John sailed from the Balize on the 28th February, 1805, with a load of cotton, sugar, indigo, logwood, and mahogany; on the 30th of the same month, in latitude 36° 40′ north, longitude 64° 00′ west, was captured by the Cambrian, M. W. Captain Beresford, and ordered to Halifax. The ship is condemned on the ground that Mr. Carricabara, the former owner, a French citizen, never duly authorized Mr. Thibaud to make sale of the ship. The fact is, that Mr. Thibaud, the agent of Carricabara, did endeavor to sell the ship, but could not effect it: finally he becomes himself the purchaser, and the amount passed to the credit of Mr. Carricabara. Afterwards Mr. Thibaud sold a moiety of said ship to a Mr. Ignatius Longchamp, and gave him a bill of sale therefor.

The above cargo is condemned merely because it does not appear to the vice-admiralty court at Halifax, what property Mr. Thibaud had at New Orleans to make the purchase.

Ship John, Patterson.

Insured from New Orleans to Bordeaux for Joseph Thibaud.
Cargo $11,800, - - - - - - - - - - - - - $11,800

On sugar and indigo, the property of Mr. P. Lanusse, of New Orleans.
This property is reserved for further proof.

Schooner Araminta, Smith.

Insured for J. P. Durand 31st July, 1824, at and from Cayenne to New York.
Cargo $12,000, - - - - - - - - - - - - - $12,000

Cargo consisting of rocoa, cotton, cocoa, and palm oil. This vessel sailed from Cayenne on the 18th July, 1804, and, on the 15th August following, was captured within four leagues of the light-house of Sandy Hook by the Leander, B. M. W. Skeene, commander, and ordered for Halifax, where they arrived on the 27th of the same month.

The Araminta's cargo was condemned at Halifax on the ground (so far as we can collect) that Mr. Durand did not account for the means of purchase, and that the outward cargo, belonging to another person, was contraband of war.

Ship Manhattan.

Insured for Frederick and Philip Rhinelander, the 14th June, 1804, from New York to Batavia, one other port in India, and back to New York.
In vessel $40,000 valued at that sum, - - - - - - - - - - - $40,000

This vessel was chartered for a voyage to Batavia and back by Messrs. Minturn and Champlin, of New York, a cargo was purchased at Batavia, for their account, consisting of sugar, coffee, indigo, cotton yarn, and spices. On the return was captured by the British armed brig Busy, Captain ——, carried to Bermuda, where, after much trouble, delay, and expense, the vessel was restored, as was the cargo also; but the captors appeal from the sentence, as it appears, merely for the purpose of creating profits from commission to the friends of the captors in Bermuda. The sole cause of capture, so far as can be learned, was that a Dutch passenger was on board from the Cape of Good Hope.

Ship Penman, Coffin.

Insured for Byrd and Barron 19th November, 1804, at and from Batavia to Muskat, and back to Batavia, vessel and cargo $22,000 - - - - - - - - - - - - - $22,000

This vessel sailed on a voyage from New York to Antwerp, thence to India. The voyage insured was an intermediate one, on which she was captured, as sailing contrary to the British instructions of 1803.

The Penman was captured, on the 4th October, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Tremendous, John Osborne, and carried to Columbo, in the island of Ceylon, and there condemned on the 31st December, 1804, as having carried, and, at the time of the capture, carrying on an illicit trade between the Batavian republic, her colonies in the East Indies, and of the colonies of her allies.

Schooner Fairplay, Robins.

Insured for P. A. Cammann 10th October, 1805, from New York to Curacoa; if blockaded, to proceed to a port that is not. Vessel, freight, and cargo, $15,690, - - - - - - - - - $15,690

The schooner Fairplay sailed from New York in October, 1804, and was captured on the 7th November following by His Majesty's ship Diana, and ordered for Jamacia. The capture was made on the pretence of the blockade of Curacoa.

The Fairplay was afterwards retaken by the mate, carried to Carthagena, and the property said to be left in the hands of the Spanish Government whether any or what part will be recovered is uncertain.

Brig Joseph, Winship.

Insured for A. Kirkpatrick 23d April, 1805, from St. Pierre's, Martinique, to New York. Cargo $13,000 $13,000

This vessel was captured on the 11th July by a British ship of war, and carried to Tortola, and the cargo condemned on account that the outward cargo was contraband of war.

Ship Mary, Knight.

Insured for Henry Cheriot, 15th March, 1805, from Martinique to New York.
Cargo twenty thousand dollars, warranted that the outward cargo did not consist of articles contraband of war, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - $20,000

This was a cargo of sugar, the property of Mr. Cheriot.

The Mary was captured on the 26th April, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Ostry, Captain Clinch, and carried to Antigua. The vessel is dismissed, but the cargo detained for proof, on suspicion of being French property. The costs in the island of Antigua are shamefully enormous.

Ship John, Patterson.

Insured for Francis Phillippon, 4th March, 1805, from New Orleans to Bordeaux.
Cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - $10,000

This cargo consisted of two hundred and fifty boxes Havana sugar. The sugar the property of a Mr. —— Phillippon, resident at New Orleans, and, like Mr. Lauresse's property, is reserved for further proof.

Ship Enterprise, Thompson.

Insured for Joseph Thibaud, 9th September, 1805, from Bordeaux to New York.
Cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - $12,000

This vessel is captured and sent into Halifax; the cargo landed and detained for further proof.

Ship Hamilton, Masterton.

Insured for Labouisse & Co. 31st August, and 3d September, 1805, from Bordeaux to New York.
Cargo, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - $12,000

This vessel was captured by the British brig Busy, Captain Byam, on the 18th September last, about fifty miles from Sandy Hook light-house, sent to Halifax, the cargo detained for further proof.

The Enterprise and Hamilton are two only of several vessels lately sent to Halifax, the proof required it is difficult, and in some cases impracticable, to furnish, and it is a question whether it ought to be submitted to. I subjoin a copy of a letter from Mr. Solicitor Stewart to Mr. Michael Wallace, the agent of the assured at Halifax. It fully details the sentiments of Judge Croke.

Copy of Mr. Stewart's letter to Mr. Wallace.

HALIFAX, November 8, 1805.

DEAR SIR:

As the interlocutory decree of the court of vice-admiralty, in the cases of the ships Enterprise, Eugenia, Zulima, and Hamilton, will necessarily affect all other neutral ships engaged in the same trade, and as it is a decree that may lead to a final decision of infinite importance, I have thought fit, for the information of our American friends, to trouble you with a few lines on this subject.

These several ships and their respective cargoes were charged, generally, in the allegation of the King's advocate, to be enemies' property, and various grounds were adopted in support of the allegation. Among the number was a point of national law which the counsel for the captors thought fit to raise, upon very loose information afforded by letters found on board the ships, of a late decree of the Government of France, respecting the importation of goods of British growth or manufacture. It appeared by a number of these letters that certificates of origin, as they were termed, had been carried to France by these several ships, for the purpose of proving the growth and manufacture of their outward cargoes. It appeared also, that unless those certificates had been produced at Bordeaux, the vessels and their cargoes would, in all probability, have been condemned by the French Government, under the decree before mentioned. And it further appeared that the produce of the French colonies, of which the outward cargoes of those ships chiefly consisted, was exempted from duties on the production of the certificates.

Upon these facts it was contended on the part of the captors, that a trade carried on to France by neutrals, under the decree in question, was an unusual course of trade, submitted to for the advantage of the enemy. That the certificates of origin were obtained conformably to that decree, and favored the views of the enemy by rejecting all goods of British growth or manufacture, and by entitling the neutral to the same exemption or reduction of duties, that would be granted to a Frenchman; and that such commerce was unneutral upon the general ground of avowed partiality to the known enemy of Great Britain.

On the part of the claimants, it was answered by their advocates, that the information afforded of the decree, as well as of the certificates of origin, and the duties in question, was extremely garbled and incorrect. That taking the facts, however, for granted, it did not appear that the course of trade was any other than that to which neutrals had been entitled by the law of nations for ages past. That the French Government had a right to impose any restrictions whatever in its own trade, and to admit neutrals to a participation of it upon such terms as a regard for its own interest would naturally dictate; that the decree which directed the certificates of origin was of late date, and it was impossible yet to ascertain what would be the conduct of neutrals with respect to it; but that if they should still continue to carry on their commerce with France, under the restrictions imposed by that decree, they would have a complete right by the law of nations so to do, and would by no means be guilty of that gross partiality which amounts to unneutral conduct.

The judge, however, was very much inclined to adopt, in his decree, the arguments of the King's advocate, and laid much stress upon the course of trade being unusual, and of its having been resorted to by the enemy, in consequence of our naval superiority. He admitted the certificate of origin would not of itself have been sufficient cause of condemnation, and that a decision to this effect had been given by our courts at the close of the last war. But he observed that the decree in question might imposecerta in restrictions and limitations which, if complied with, would create a breach of neutrality; that if neutrals, who were favoring the commerce of France, were allowed the same privileges with Frenchmen, by an exemption from duties or otherwise, he could not but consider them in the same light with the subjects of France; and on that account he was desirous of ascertaining in what respect the course of trade now carried on with the French ports in the mother country differed from the former and customary line of commerce. He, therefore, directed further proof to be produced to the following points:

1. Of what colony or country the outward cargoes were the growth, produce, or manufacture.
2. Under what certificates the same were admitted to entry in the ports of France, and whether liable to foreign or reduced duties.
3. What are the French laws on this subject, and what limitations are imposed on return cargoes.

The judge, concerning the different interests in the cargoes, observed, that he should require from every claimant a notarial copy of the original letter or order, by virtue of which the goods from France were shipped on neutral account, and that all letters of correspondence, bills of lading, and invoices which concern such shipments, or notarial copies of them, must be produced to the court, verified by the attestation of clerks or other indifferent persons. This proof should be accompanied by the test affidavit, as it is called, of the party himself, swearing to his notarial character, and fully stating his right to the property claimed by him, and the funds by which he acquired it. It should conclude with the usual averment, that no enemy of Great Britain has any concern in the goods; that they were at the time they were shipped, and at the time of the capture, and would now be if restored, the sole and exclusive property of the claimant.

The judgments of professional gentlemen in the States can surely supply any further direction that may be necessary on the point of property.

You will, no doubt, write to your several correspondents by this opportunity, and I have only to request you will assure those gentlemen of the best having been done for them, and that they shall have a continuance of my exertions.

OFFICE OF THE UNITED INSURANCE COMPANY,
NEW YORK, 5th July, 1805.

SIR:

In behalf of the United Insurance Company, in the city of New York, I have the honor to transmit you an account of captures, illegally made by certain French privateers, of property insured by the said company. We have no reason to believe that the property was ever condemned by any competent tribunal; on the contrary, we apprehend the same was converted to the private use of the captors, without the form of a judicial proceeding.

Captures of a similar nature having frequently occurred, the United Insurance Company have felt it their duty to transmit to the Government of the United States a correct statement of the circumstances accompanying the violation of our neutral commerce, and a full detail of the facts will be found in the enclosed documents.

They confide in the wisdom and justice of Government to adopt all necessary measures for their indemnity for past injuries, and their security against future ones of a similar nature.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN DELAFIELD,
President United Insurance Company.

Total amount of French captures, $72,215 60

The Almy was captured on the 26th June, by the French privateer schooner La Confiance, Captain La Paze, and carried to Baracoa, in Cuba; arrived there 28th June.

SPANISH CAPTURES, &c.

Brig Success, Brum.

Insured for George Barnwall, from Jamaica to New York, 30th July, 1805; cargo ten puncheons rum, $630

The Success was captured on the 13th July, 1805, by a Spanish galley, belonging to the Havana, called La Bonne Union, commanded by Captain Cæsar, and manned with thirty or forty Spaniards and Frenchmen, with one Irishman, who served as an interpreter. That three days after the said capture, said Captain Brum, the passengers, eight in number, and the people of the said brig, were all ordered below, and the hatches shut upon them; in this situation they were kept through the night. In the morning, the crew of the galley prepared their knives and cutlasses and clubs, opened the forecastle and called for the captain. That this appearer, with the view of preserving the captain's life, stepped forward and ascended to the deck; that the crew of the galley, with their instruments of slaughter, having arranged themselves in two ranks, compelled the seamen of the said brig to run the gantlet, while each gave him a blow or a stab as he passed. That Captain Brum and his passengers and crew, were all, in succession, taken from the hold, and treated with the same horrid cruelty, excepting five French passengers. That an English gentleman, by the name of Smith, who was one of the passengers, was beaten with such severity that he sprang into the long boat and broke his ancle in two places; that the mate of said brig, two English passengers, and two seamen, were put in irons on board the galley, and three days afterwards sent ashore at Congaboutee, about one hundred and eighty miles from Havana, and the said brig and remainder of the crew were sent to Campeachy; and it is stated that the property is in the hands of the Government, subject to the orders of the owners.

PHILADELPHIA, December 10, 1805.

SIR:

Among the numerous captures of American vessels, lately made by British cruisers, the circumstances attending four vessels, taken on their passage from Bordeaux, (three for New York, the other for this place,) has particularly attracted the attention of the merchants and insurance companies of this place, where the property has been principally insured.

Those vessels, carried cargoes from the United Statesto Bordeaux, and were returning with articles, the manufacture or growth of France, partly the proceeds of the goods they carried out, and partly purchased with their funds. The vessels and their cargoes were libelled in the vice-admiralty court at Halifax, and are held for further proof.

By a letter received from the proctor of the claimants, (a copy of which accompanies this,) it appears that the King's advocate advanced on the trial principles new and extraordinary, which were favorably received by the judge, who has called for proofs that have never been required on any former occasion. Such proofs, as have been usual, have actually been sent forward, but strong doubts exist whether the others called for, if obtainable, ought to be adduced. Wishing to act with due circumspection in an affair which may involve important consequences, it has been deemed advisable to submit the case, with such observations as have occurred to us, to the Department of State, that we may benefit of any advice or opinion you may favor us with.

The proofs required by the judge, which to us appear exceptionable, are:

1. Of what colony or country the outward cargo was the growth, produce, or manufacture.

2. Under what certificates were the same admitted to entry in the ports of France, and whether liable to foreign or reduced duties.

3. What are the French laws on this subject, and what limitations are imposed on return cargoes.

We consider the first as exceptionable, inasmuch as it has not been heretofore required; it has been held under former decisions of the British courts that return cargoes are not questionable on account of the outward one, except the latter consisted of articles contraband of war. In the last order of the British King, the exception is confined to the product of articles contraband of war: the embarrassment which the establishing this as a principle would occasion, is too obvious to require explanation.

"2. Under what certificate were the same admitted to entry in the ports of France, and whether liable to foreign or reduced duties."

To this, besides the objection already stated, it seems utterly irreconcilable to the principles of justice, that the claimants should be called upon either to prove a negative, or furnish a cause of condemnation of their property. It was suggested by the judge in his reasoning that the permission of importing into France the produce of her colonies by neutrals, while those of the British dominions were excluded, was, of itself, a breach of neutrality, and if on reduced duties that would be an additional reason.

The fact (as respects those ships,) is, that they carried from the United States cargoes taken on freight, from various people, and consisting of articles, the produce of the United States, and of the French and Spanish colonies; the cargoes with which they were returning are not precisely the proceeds of the outward ones, nor all belonging to the same persons; it is, therefore, imposing upon the owners of the present one a most unreasonable task, and has this still further disadvantage that, if those proofs are furnished in cases in which they are attainable, in every instance in which that could not be done, it may be deemed a ground for condemnation; besides, it would be used for a precedent on all future occasions.

To the third there is no other objection, but that it puts upon the claimant a proof which, if material, ought to be adduced by the captors. If, as they contend, the laws of France, which provide for neutral commerce, are a ground of condemnation, the proof of the existence of such law in reason rests with the captors.

As the French laws are explained to us, they provide against the introduction into that kingdom of any goods or merchandise, the manufacture or growth of any of the dominions of Britain. And it is therefore required that all goods carried there should be accompanied with certificates, showing of what country they are the manufacture or growth, and such certificates are to be verified by the commercial agent of France at the port of their shipment, or his deputy; these are called certificates of origin, and are indispensable.

With respect to the reduced duties, we understand that there has existed in France, (many years previous to the revolution,) a regulation which provided that the exporters of goods from her colonies, by paying certain duties at the place of export, would be allowed an abatement on the duties, to which they would otherwise be liable on their introduction into France. When that law was decreed, French subjects only could export the products of her colonies to the mother country. Since the revolution the like provision has been extended to all persons exporting those products; but we are informed that it is embarrassed with so many provisions and difficulties that the abatement in France is seldom claimed, and much seldomer obtained. Some imperfect notices, extracted from letters found on board those ships, has probably suggested this inquiry, and not any certain knowledge of the law, or its effect on the goods in question.

To the latter part of the third proof required, it can be established that no condition is exacted from the exporters of goods from France to any neutral country.

In the present state of our commerce, the principles to which we have referred cannot be viewed by the merchants and underwriters of this city without extreme anxiety. Relying on the decisions which formerly took place in the British courts, the merchants of this country have risked property to an immense amount, much of which is now at hazard, and depending on the establishment of the principles which are the subject of this communication.

The time limited for exhibiting our proofs at Halifax expires on the 8th February. If you shall deem it necessary to favor us with any communication on the subject, it may be in time, and will be used in such way as you may advise.

We are, &c.

HALIFAX, November 8, 1805.

DEAR SIR:

As the interlocutory decree of the court of vice-admiralty in the cases of the Enterprise, Eugenia, Zulema, and Hamilton, will necessarily affect all the other ships engaged in the same trade; and as it is a decree which may lead to a final decision of infinite importance, I have thought it fit, for the information of our American friends, to trouble you with a few lines on the subject of it. These several ships, and their respective cargoes, were charged generally in the allegation of the King's advocate, to be enemy's property, and various grounds were adopted in support of the allegation. Among the number was a point of national law, which the counsel for the captors thought fit to raise, upon very loose information, afforded by letters found on board the ships, of a late decree of the Government of France respecting the importation of British goods or manufacture. It appeared, by a number of those letters, that certificates of origin, as they were termed, had been carried to France by these several ships, for the purpose of proving the growth and manufacture of their outward cargoes. It appeared, also, that unless these certificates had been produced at Bordeaux, the vessels and their cargoes would, in all probability, have been condemned by the French Government under the decree before mentioned; and it further appeared, that the produce of the French colonies, of which the outward cargoes of these ships chiefly consisted, was exempted from duties on the production of the certificates. Upon these facts, it was contended, on the part of the captors, that a trade carried on to France by neutrals, under the decree in question, was an unusual course of trade, submitted to for the advantage of the enemy; that the certificate of origin was obtained conformably to that decree, and favored the views of the enemy, by rejecting all goods of British growth and manufacture, and by entitling the neutral to the same exemption, or reduction of duties, that would be granted to a Frenchman; and that such commerce was unneutral, upon the general ground of avowed partiality to the known enemy of Great Britain.

On the part of the claimants it was answered by their advocates, that the information afforded of the decree, as well as of the certificate of origin, and the duties in question, was extremely garbled and incorrect; that taking the facts, however, for granted, it did not appear that the course of trade was any other than that to which neutrals had been entitled by the law of nations for ages past; that the French Government had a right to impose any restriction whatever upon its own trade, and to admit neutrals to a participation of it, upon such terms as a regard for its own interest would naturally dictate; that the decree which directed the certificate of origin was of late date, and it was impossible yet to ascertain what would be the conduct of neutrals with respect to it, but if they should still continue to carry on their commerce with France, under the restrictions imposed by that decree, they would have a complete right, by the law of nations, so to do, and would by no means be guilty of that gross partiality which amounts to unneutral conduct. At all events, supposing the greatest mischiefs to result to the British Government from such commerce, it was a subject for the consideration of the ministry, and could not be a ground of legal argument in a court of vice-admiralty.

The judge, however, was very much inclined to adopt, in his decree, the arguments of the King's advocate, and laid much stress upon the course of trade being unusual, and upon its having been resorted to by the enemy, in consequence of our naval superiority. He admitted that the certificate of origin would not, of itself, have been sufficient cause of condemnation, and that a decision to this effect had been given by our courts at the close of the last war; but he observed, that the decree in question might impose certain restrictions and limitations, which, if complied with, would create a breach of neutrality; that if neutrals, who were favoring the commerce of France, were allowed the same privileges with Frenchmen, by an exemption from duties, or otherwise, he could not but consider them in the same light with the subjects of France, and on that account he was desirous of ascertaining in what respect the course of trade now carried on with French ports, in the mother country, differed from the former and customary line of commerce. He, therefore, directed further proofs to be produced, to the following points: 1. Of what colony, or country, the outward cargoes were the growth, produce, or manufacture? 2. Under what certificates were the same admitted to entry into the ports of France, and whether liable to foreign or reduced duties? 3. What are the French laws upon this subject, and what limitations are imposed on return cargoes?

I should imagine that further proof might be obtained to these several points, by an application to the French minister in America for the law on the subject, and by applying to the custom house for the history of the outward cargoes. The judge, concerning the different interests in the cargoes, observed, that he should require from every claimant a notarial copy of the original letter, or order, by virtue of which the goods from France were shipped on neutral account, and that all letters of correspondence, bills of lading and invoices which concern each shipment, or notarial copies of them, must be produced to the court, verified by the attestation of clerks or other indifferent persons. This proof should be accompanied by the test affidavit, as it is called, of the party himself, swearing to his national character, and fully stating his right to the property claimed by him, and the funds by which he acquired it. It should conclude with the usual avowment, that no enemy of Great Britain has any concern in the goods; that they were, at the time they were shipped, and at the time of the capture, and would now be, if restored, the sole and exclusive property of the claimant. The judgments of professional gentlemen in the States, can supply any further directions that will be necessary upon the point of property. You will, no doubt, write to your several correspondents by this opportunity, and I have only to request that you will assure those gentlemen of the best having been done for them, and that they shall have a continuance of my exertions.

I am, &c.

JAMES STEWART.

JOHN BLACK, Esq. of the house of Forsyth, Smith, & Co. Halifax.

NEWPORT, R. I. December 7, 1805.

SIR:

Subjoined you have a list of American vessels insured by the Rhode Island Insurance Company, established at this place, which have been captured by some of the powers at war, and in consequence thereof abandoned to said company.

Schooner Polly of Newport: Owners John Bigley and Charles Cezzens, both of said Newport, burden of vessel about one hundred tons.

Circumstances of the capture:—On the 18th of June, 1803, she sailed from New York, bound on a voyage to Jamaica, and thence back to New York, with a cargo of lumber and provisions; vessel and cargo of the value of about five thousand dollars. On the 13th day of July following, on her outward passage, lat. 20° 20′ north, she was captured by a French privateer called the two friends, commanded by ——— Beson, if his name be rightly recollected. The master with his papers was taken and detained on board the privateer; the mate and crew put on board a boat and compelled to leave the schooner and provide for their safety as they might; fortunately they arrived safe to land. Captain Bigley was put on shore at Miaguiagua, S. W. part of Porto Rico, being first stripped of his papers, and the property about him.

The prize-master and men put on board the schooner, conducted her to Samana, in the island of Hispaniola. Vessel and cargo, according to information, were sold there by order of Government, and the proceeds deposited in the public treasury, to be paid over to the concern. The amount of these proceeds is not known; but report makes it a trifle compared to the value of the property. What or whether any process was instituted against her by the captors is not known, or whether they had any commission; it is supposed they had none. Owing to the difficulty and infrequency of the communication, it has not yet been in the power of the concern to obtain the proceeds.

Brig Orange, of Newport: owner, Thomas Dennis, of Newport; master, Stephen A. Wanton, of ditto; burden of the vessel about —— tons.

Circumstances of capture, &c.—On the 15th day of June, 1804, she sailed from Newport, bound on a voyage to Jamaica, and from thence back to Newport, with a cargo of dry and pickled fish, &c. valued at about eight thousand dollars. On the —— day of August, 1804, she was captured by a French privateer, called the ——— commanded by ——— and carried into Baracoa, and there disposed of by the captors, but in what manner is not known.

Schooner Sea Flower, of Newport: owner, John Clarke, of Newport; master, the same John Clarke; burden of the vessel about ninety-three tons.

Circumstances of capture.—On the 26th day of December, 1804, within one mile of the shore of the island of Cuba, and in sight of the Moro Castle, and bound to Havana, she was captured by a French privateer, called the Napoleon, and commanded by ——— master. Captain Clarke petitioned the Government at the Havana to have the property liberated, as being captured within that jurisdiction. Pending this petition, to avoid delay and expense, Captain Clarke made a compromise with the captors, by which he agreed to pay them nine hundred dollars, and they agreed to release the property: he paid the nine hundred dollars, and they executed the release, and the prize-master and Frenchmen quitted the vessel. Clarke then informed the Government of what had been done, produced the release, and requested the Spanish guard on board the Sea Flower might be withdrawn. The Spanish Government demurred from day to day, on one pretence and another, till at length one of the officers of the privateer presented a new petition, claiming the prize anew. Thereupon the Government immediately decreed, that the property should be delivered to the captors, upon their giving bonds to abide the decree of the French Government at St. Domingo. The agent of Clarke offered to take the property and deposit in court twenty-four thousand dollars to abide the decree at St. Domingo. This was refused, and bond of the captors was accepted for only eighteen thousand dollars; and the only security required to this bond was a mortgage of some land in a distant part of the island of Cuba. Whether any decree at St. Domingo has since been passed, we have not ascertained; but from the best information, we presume a decree has been passed; the information is contradictory. One report states that the vessel was acquitted, and the cargo condemned, another that both were condemned.

Schooner Ann and Harriott, of Newport: owners, Robert Stevens and Robert Rogers, of Newport; master, William Shearman, of Newport; burden of the vessel about ninety-three tons.

Circumstances of the capture, &c.—On the 17th of June, 1805, she was captured by a French privateer, called the Lucerne, on her passage to Jamaica; afterwards on the —— day of ——— 1805, she was recaptured by an English frigate of war, called the Diana, and commanded by —— Molony, and was sent into Jamaica, where vessel and cargo were libelled and sold for salvage: value of vessel and cargo about ten thousand dollars.

Brig Mary, of Newport: owner, Thomas Dennis, of Newport; master, John Davis, of ditto; burden of the vessel about one hundred tons.

Circumstances of the capture, &c.—On the 8th day of April, 1805, she sailed from Newport for Jamaica loaded with codfish, provisions, &c. that the 26th same month, she was captured by a French armed boat, whether commissioned or not unknown. The crew of the brig were forced into a boat, with some provisions, and driven off to seek their safety as they could. They got to one of the Bahama islands, the master was afterwards put on shore at one of the Bahama islands. The brig and cargo were carried to Baracoa, in the island of Cuba. No process whatever was instituted against the property, by the captors; they there embezzled the cargo and sold the vessel. The loss is about ten thousand dollars.

The office has an interest in the brig Rowena, Robinson Potter, master, condemned in England in the course of the summer past, but the circumstances of that case are not here detailed, as other offices, who have a greater interest in the same vessel, have already, or will represent them. The vouchers, in proof of the foregoing statements, will be forwarded, if necessary, with perfect confidence that these lawless depredations on our commerce will be properly felt and noticed by our Government. I am, &c.

SAMUEL VERNON, Jun. President.

Honorable James Madison, Secretary of State.

To the honorable James Madison, Esq. Secretary of State, for the United States.

Sir: Newport, R. I. December 11, 1805.

The Newport Insurance Company deem it their duty to exhibit to the Government, a statement of the losses they have sustained during the present war, by the depredations of the belligerent powers. Compared with its limited capital and enterprise, it is presumed there are few offices in the United States that have suffered more.

From the instances mentioned in the sequel, it may be collected, that since the 23d day of July, 1804, the aggregate of loss to the merchants and the country, by lawless captures, exceeds fifty-seven thousand dollars, and that the part thereof that falls to the share of this company exceeds thirty thousand dollars. The company conceive themselves to be justified in stating, that these losses arose from contingencies which no commercial intelligence could foresee, and upon which no commercial prudence was bound to calculate.

The losses they have to enumerate was sustained in the course of a legal accustomed and honestly neutral commerce, carried on by native American citizens, with American capitals, in American bottoms.

These losses may be arranged under two heads:

1st. Captures in the West Indies by piratical privateers, with real or pretended French commissions. The property plundered by these privateers has been uniformly taken into the ports of the island of Cuba, and there, with the connivance or under the protection of the Spanish Government, without any form of trial or pretence for legal condemnation, has been sold and distributed.

2d. Captures in the British channel by British armed vessels, in consequence of the new principle lately anounced by the courts of admiralty, viz: that in case a vessel has brought goods from the colony of a belligerent, although she brings them to the United States, and the owners there unlade them, pay the importation duties, finish the concerns of the old voyage, and select and undertake another, with the same vessel and goods, it shall not be deemed evidence of a new voyage, but, on the contrary, conclusive evidence of a continued and uninterrupted voyage from the colony of the belligerent.

Under the first head have occured the following cases:

No. 1. Brig Orange, S. A. Wanton, master; Thomas Dennis, of Newport, Rhode Island, merchant, owner, laden with fish and provisions, bound from Newport to Jamaica; vessel and cargo valued at $10,000, insured by the Newport Insurance Company, $4,000 on cargo.

Circumstances of capture, &c.—The Orange was taken on the 21st July, 1804, by the French privateer Voltigeuse, Captain Moisson, about six leagues from the island of St. Domingo. The officers and men were stripped of every thing, even to the clothes on their backs, and left entirely destitute. The property was taken to Baracoa, in the island of Cuba; no form of trial or condemnation was had. The cargo was distributed by the captors in their own way, and the vessel, it is believed, burnt.

No. 2. Brig Sally, Stephen Chase, master; Seth Hoard, owner, bound from Jamaica to the United States; vessel and cargo estimated at $4,000; insured by the Newport Insurance Company, $2,700.

Circumstances of capture, &c.—The captain, in his protest, declares that after being detained by an embargo at Falmouth, in Jamaica, he sailed from thence for Montego bay on the 28th of April, 1805; that he had been out about four hours when he was captured by a felucca within a mile of the shore. The captain of the felucca informed captain Chase he was a good prize, and that he had orders to capture all American vessels on the coast of Jamaica. The Sally was taken to Cape Coure, in the island of Cuba; no condemnation or form of trial was had, and Captain Chase, and three out of six of his men, after being stripped of their clothes, were ordered to take to their boat. They did so, and fortunately arrived at Montego bay on the 29th of the same month.

No. 3. Schooner American Lady, Enoch Toby, master: owned by Bowen and Ennis, of Newport, merchants, and others, cargo rum, &c. bound from Jamaica to the United States: value of vessel and cargo $4,000, insured by the Newport Insurance Company, $2,950.

Circumstances of capture, &c.—This vessel sailed on the 16th February, 1805, from Morant bay, south side of Jamaica, bound for Camden, State of North Carolina. On the 20th of the same month, being about five leagues distant from the Isle of Pines, she was brought to by a small privateer under French colors, mounting one swivel gun, and manned with about fifteen men, principally Spaniards. The vessel was taken possession of, carried to the Isle of Pines, the captain and men plundered and abused, and left on shore at this desert island without any means of subsistence except a dozen of biscuits and a bottle of rum. They would have perished there had it not been for the compassion of a Spaniard, the only inhabitant of the island. The captain and crew remained at this place until another French privateer arrived there, when they were taken at the request of Captain Toby, near Savannah La Mar, on the south side of Cuba, from whence they travelled to the Havana. The captain noted his protest with the American consul, who attended him to the Governor. Captain Toby explained to the Governor the ill treatment he had encountered; demanded a restoration of his vessel, which was now within the Governor's jurisdiction and the release of Moses Henly, a free black, one of his crew, who had left a wife and family in the United States, and who was in the greatest distress, as the captors were determined to sell him a slave for life. The Governor made little or no reply to Captain Toby's remonstrances or petitions. After waiting some time, finding himself unable to obtain redress, he was compelled to abandon the property, and return to the United States.

No. 4. Schooner Ann and Harriet, William Shearman, master, vessel and cargo valued at $10,400: vessel owned by Robert Rogers and Robert Stevens, and the cargo by John Mein, all of Newport, merchants, bound from the United States to Jamaica; $5,000 was insured by the Newport Insurance Company.

Circumstances of capture, &c.—This vessel was captured on the eighth of May last, by a French privateer, off Cape Maire, in the island of Cuba, and was ordered for St. Jago de Cuba, but upon being chased by the English ship of war Diana, she was run on shore by the prize-master. After considerable exertions, and throwing overboard a great part of her cargo, she was got off by the English re-captors, and taken by them to Kingston, Jamaica, where the vessel and the remainder of her cargo were sold under the process of the court of vice-admiralty there. The salvage of one eighth, which was awarded the re-captors, the destruction of part of the cargo, and the disadvantages under which the residue was sold, render this little less than a total loss.

These are the principal losses sustained by this company, arising from the piratical depredations of privateers in the West Indies.

In all these cases abandonments have been made to, and the sums insured paid by, this company.

Under the second head of loss, the two following important cases have occurred:

No. 1. The brig Rowena, Robinson Potter, master, voyage from Newport to Antwerp: vessel and cargo valued at $26,735, owned by Christopher Grant Champlin, Esq. for himself, in his own right, and as administrator of Christopher Champlin, Esq. deceased; sum insured by the Newport Insurance Company $15,000.

Circumstances of capture, grounds of condemnation, &c.—The owners of the Rowena had imported in her from Martinique a cargo of sugar and coffee. This cargo was legally landed, and the duties payable to the United States secured. The owners finding no advantageous domestic market for their coffee and sugar, made general inquiries into the state of the European market. They began to comtemplate generally an exportation; but whether that exportation would be to Copenhagen, Amsterdam, or Antwerp, or whether it was to be totally abandoned, was a matter in deliberation, and to be determined by the result of their inquiries. After a delay of some weeks it was ultimately decided to send the sugar and coffee to Antwerp. For this purpose a new voyage was concerted, a new crew hired, and a quantity of staves, the growth of our country, (and so expressly and minutely certified by the brig's papers,) was added to the original cargo. On the 6th of May last, the Rowena sailed from Newport, and on the 16th of June was captured off Ostend, by His Britannic Majesty's hired armed cutter the Griffin, commanded by Lieutenant Forbes. The alleged pretence of capture was a suspicion that the Rowena intended to violate the blockade of Ostend.

This pretence, however, totally unsupported by facts or by appearances, was speedily abandoned, and the sole question, at the trial, in the court of admiralty, was, whether the voyage was to be treated upon the footing, of one continued voyage from Martinique to Antwerp, i. e. from the colony of the enemy to the mother country. The judge, Sir William Scott, without entering into any discussion of the above question, or detailing at all the particular facts of this case, referred to his decision in a case immediately preceding, viz. the Enoch, Doane, master, and declared, as he did not see sufficient reasons to distinguish this from the case of the Enoch, it must meet the same fate. The case of the Enoch is, without doubt, in the possession of Government, and although, therefore, comment is unnecessary, and may be even deemed improper, yet we cannot forbear to remark, that the case of the Enoch is distinguishable from that of the Rowena in a very important particular. The Enoch, as Sir William Scott states, was under a charter party before she quitted Boston, to perform the voyage she did perform. Admitting a moment, for the purposes of argument, (what can never be admitted in fact, without the prostration of neutral rights, and the destruction of the commerce of the country,) that the newly announced principle of Great Britain is one deducible from the law of nations, and that its application was correct in the case of the Enoch, it by no means follows that its application was likewise correct in the case of the Rowena. There was no charter party in the latter case; there was nothing indicating a primary and preconceived intention, viz: at the outset, to go to Europe with the cargo procured in the West Indies. There existed nothing of which the case was first to be cleared, for the claimants to be entitled to the benefit of the rules of evidence, as laid down by the British courts. There was nothing, to speak in the language of those courts, to shift the burden of proof. But waiving any observations on a difference so obvious, it does seem somewhat extraordinary, that the sentence in the case of the Rowena should have been, in reality, one of more severity than the sentence in the preceding case; in that the property put on board at Boston was favorably considered and restored. In the case of the Rowena, staves of the growth of the United States, and put on board at Newport, were not restored, but included in the undistinguishing clause of condemnation, which, in its style of absurd formality, pronounces the ship and cargo to have belonged, at the time of the capture and seizure thereof, to enemies of the crown of Great Britain, and as such, or otherwise, liable to confiscation.

Besides the total loss, the company have paid $556, their proportion of $876, being the law costs attending the claim.

No. 2. Ship Hope, Robert Robinson, master; owners, George Champlin, Esq. Christopher Grant Champlin, Esq. as administrator of Christopher Champlin, Esq. and the master: voyage, from Newport to Amsterdam, value of ship and cargo, $108,631, insured by the Newport Insurance Company, $15,000.

Circumstances of the case, capture, &c.—The voyage in which this ship was engaged, previous to the one in which she was captured, was from Newport to Batavia. She sailed from Newport in February, 1804, and arrived at Batavia in the following May. Owing to the scarcity of produce, and the number of ships endeavoring to procure it, after selling a small quantity of iron, which made a part of her cargo, the captain proceeded wtih his ship and specie to Manilla; he there purchased a cargo of sugar and indigo, and sailed about the 20th of November, 1804, for Newport, where he arrived on the 12th of May, 1805. The cargo was landed and delivered, and the importation duties secured to be paid. After a lapse of about six weeks, the owners, not finding a sufficiently favorable market at home, concluded on a new voyage, to Amsterdam, for the purpose of re-exporting their sugar and indigo. The ship was, consequently, partially repaired, a new crew hired, and the sugar and indigo taken from warehouses and re-shipped. This ship sailed for Amsterdam on the 30th June, and was captured by His Britannic Majesty's hired armed cutter Swan, Lieutenant Cameron, and brought into Yarmouth, where, in consequence of the recess of the admiralty court, she was detained until the 12th of September, 1805, when, upon trial, the ship and cargo was restored, but without costs or damages. The condemnation was pressed, on the part of the captors, on the ground of its being a cargo taken in at an enemy's colony, and after touching at America, having been brought on to the enemy's country in Europe, without breaking the continuity of the voyage by any act done. And in respect of this question, the judge declared there was no evidence that the continuity of the voyage was interrupted. The cargo of the Hope was purchased in Manilla, in time of profound peace between England and Spain. The ship sailed from Manilla three weeks before the declaration of war, by Spain, against Great Britain, which took place the 14th December, 1804, and about seven weeks before reprisals, on the part of Great Britain, yet still it was urged by the captors, that the cargo was purchased in contemplation of war, and the judge agreed, that, if that had been proved, it would have operated exactly the same effect as if actual hostilities had taken place; but, he said, as no proof appeared, and the fact being that war did not commence till after the vessel sailed, he thought it unlikely that Americans would speculate upon the subject. But supposing, says he, that it was an importation from Manilla to Amsterdam, at this period, it would have been an importation perfectly legal, and all transactions in America may be laid out of the question; yet, for being engaged in a voyage perfectly legal, after having had that voyage ruined by an illegal capture, the owners of the Hope were denied indemnity for damages sustained, and compelled to pay costs, expenses, and law charges, to the amount of two hundred and sixty pounds sterling, about forty pounds of which were exactions for light money, and Ramsgate and Dover harbor dues.

Such is the statement which this company, at the present juncture, has to make to the Government of the United States. The various protests, decrees, and other documentary evidence, confirmatory of this statement, shall be forwarded, when deemed necessary by Government.

The Newport Insurance Company have a hope and confidence, that the General Government, whose right it is to regulate, would feel it their duty to protect commerce; that means will be found, in the wisdom and energy of Government, to procure speedy compensation to the sufferers, and redress to the nation for its violated rights and dignity.

With sentiments of high respect, I remain, on behalf of said company, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL ELAM, President.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 5, 1806.

The committee to whom was referred, on the 15th of January last, that part of the President's message which relates to the spoliation of our commerce on the high seas, and informs us of the new principles assumed by the British courts of admiralty, as a pretext for the condemnation of our vessels in their prize courts, respectfully report, for the consideration of the Senate, the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the capture and condemnation, under the orders of the British Government, and adjudication of their courts of admiralty, of American vessels and their cargoes, on the pretext of their being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace, is an unprovoked aggression upon the property of the citizens of these United States, a violation of their neutral rights, and an encroachment upon their national independence.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace, and upon the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations, and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit by law the importation into the United States of any of the following goods, wares, or merchandise, being the growth, produce, or manufactures of the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, or the dependencies thereof, that is to say, woollens, linens, hats, nails, looking-glasses, rum, hard-wares, slate, salt, coal, boots, shoes, ribbons, silks, and plated and glass-wares. The said prohibition to commence from the —— day of ——, unless previously thereto equitable arrangements shall be made between the two Governments on the differences subsisting between them, and to continue until such arrangements shall be agreed upon and settled.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 195. [1st SESSION.

DENMARK—PETER LANDAIS.

REPORTED ON FEBRUARY 11, 1806.

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Peter Landais, together with the report of the Secretary of State thereon, submit the following report:

Facts are detailed in the report of the Secretary of State, which, if they had been communicated to the Committee of Claims, when this case was under their consideration, at the last session of Congress, might have varied their decision. Your committee concur in opinion with the Secretary that the Government of Denmark must be liable to make restitution in the manner and upon the principles suggested in his report; and that it will be disposed to do so may be expected, not only from its love of justice, but also from its desire to emulate the equitable conduct of our own Government in relation to the subjects of that kingdom.

Claims to a large amount are exhibited against the United States by the accredited agents of Denmark, in favor of individuals of that nation, founded upon the alleged misconduct of our armed vessels. Without comparing these claims with the one now under consideration, it is sufficient to observe, that the Government of Denmark itself, and not its subordinate agents, directed those proceedings which form the ground of the present application. Complete satisfaction for the injury sustained by the memorialist ought in the opinion of your committee, to be obtained through the interference of the Executive authority; and the propriety and necessity of such an interference are enforced by the consideration that the United States have an immediate interest in the question, inasmuch as it appears, from authentic documents, that the crew of the frigate Alliance, on their return to America, mutinied against their commander; in consequence of which, the prize-money, to which they would otherwise have been entitled, amounting to a large sum, became exclusively the property of the United States. The attention of our Government, it is presumed, will be speedily turned towards this object; and as the claim of the memorialist is thus identified with that of the nation, he may confidently hope it will not be disregarded in any adjustment of mutual claims which may be the subject of negotiation between the two Governments.

To furnish an opportunity for such measures as the Executive may think proper to adopt in relation to the premises, your committee are of opinion that it is not expedient for Congress to act conclusively upon the subject at this time; but that legislative interposition should be withheld until the effect of negotiation can be fully ascertained. The following resolution is therefore respectfully offered to the House:

Resolved, That the further consideration of the memorial of Peter Landais, and the report of the Secretary of State thereon, be postponed indefinitely.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 196. [1st SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 5, 1806.

MARCH 5, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the request of the Senate, expressed in their resolution of the 3d instant, I now transmit the extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, the answer to that letter, and two letters from Henry Waddell, a citizen of the United States, relative to the interference of the said minister in the case of the ship New Jersey, and to the principles alleged to have been laid down by him on that occasion.

There are in the office of the Department of State several printed memorials in this case, by the agent of those interested in the ship, which are voluminous, and in French. If these be within the scope of the request of the Senate, the printed copies can be sent in immediately; but, if translations be necessary, some considerable time will be requisite for their execution. On this subject any further desire which the Senate shall think proper to express, shall be complied with.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 25, 1805.

SIR:

It is represented by the parties interested in the ship New Jersey and cargo, for which indemnity is claimed under the late convention with France, that a disallowance of the claim is likely to proceed from an idea that insurers do not in such cases take the place of the insured.

As the convention has provided for its own exposition and execution, it has been thought best that these should be left, as much as possible, to their own course; and an interposition, of any kind, in the present instance, would be the rather declined as it cannot be guided by communications from yourself relative to the nature of the difficulties which have arisen. Yet, as the interest which the parties have at stake renders them particularly anxious and urgent on the occasion, and as it cannot be injurious, and may be agreeable, to yourself to know the sentiments of the President on the question whether the title of the insurers accrues to the insured, if that naked question be indeed the source of the difficulties, I am authorized to suggest, for your information, that he considers the general principle on which the question turns as supporting the claims of the American underwriters to the benefit of the convention where they have paid the loss of the original owners, citizens of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JOHN ARMSTRONG, Esq., &c. &c.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 26, 1805.

I had the honor, within the last week, of receiving your letter of the 25th of August, expressing the solicitude of the parties interested in the ship New Jersey and cargo, "lest their claims should be rejected on the idea that the rights of the insured did not pass to the insurers;" and communicating, also, the opinion of the President, that "American underwriters, who had paid the loss to the original owners, citizens of the United States, were entitled to the benefits of the treaty of 1803."

In my next despatches I shall furnish you with documents from which you will see that the difficulties in this case have, in no stage of it, arisen from the causes to which they have been ascribed; that its admission by the American Board was long suspended under Colonel Mercer's objections, that "no evidence has been produced of the insolvency of the captors;" that its rejection by the Council General of Liquidations proceeded from the belief, that the "ship and cargo were partially or altogether British property, and from certain other causes." And that when this belief concerning the national character of the property was done away by the production of certain policies of insurance, which had been effected in different parts of the United States, (but which till then had been carefully kept out of sight,) the claim, so far from being opposed on the principle, that "the rights of the insured did not vest in the insurers," or, indeed, on any other principle, was, on my suggestion, sent back to the council, relieved from the first, and apparently, the principal objection; and left subject only to the "other causes," mentioned in the rejecting arrêt of the 28th of Frumaire. These "other causes" are fully exhibited in the report of the director of the fourth division, dated on the 15th Germinal, and may be digested into the following heads:

1st. That the judgment of the 17th Prairial, year 6, pronouncing the confiscation of the New Jersey and cargo is still subsisting; inasmuch as it has not been annulled by the decree of the Council of Prizes, which directs only the restitution of the sum deposited by the owners with General Haudeville.

2d. That the claimants have neglected to prosecute their appeal within six years after the captures were precluded, by the laws of France, from a right of appealing.

3d. That the New Jersey not having a rôle d'équipage, as provided by the treaty of 1778, was excluded from the provisions of the fourth article of the treaty of 1800.

4th. That the captain and agent of the privateer, not having been heard in their defence, nor even summoned to appear before the tribunal, the decree of the Council of Prizes was illegal.

5th. That no evidence having been produced of the abandonment of the ship and cargo to the underwriters, and the agents having even denied the right of either Government to question them with regard to an abandonment of the property; and having besides, acknowledged, that the original owners, or a part of them, had acquired the New Jersey by a new title; by yielding to the underwriters "un droit convenable de reprise dans le dépôt," it may be fairly inferred that the loss never was paid by the insurers, and that the receipts (which, by the way, do not correspond in number with the policies,) are merely fictitious.

6th. That were it in proof that the owners had abandoned, and that the underwriters had paid, still the claim of the latter could not be admitted; inasmuch, as it could not now be liquidated under the rules prescribed by the treaty, the American Commissioners having no longer an existence.

You will readily perceive that, in all this, there is not a single syllable pointed at the rights of insurers "who have paid the loss to the original owners." It only remains for me, therefore, to show that, in no after act, either of the council or of M. Marbois and myself, was the broad principle, which has given so much alarm to our underwriting citizens, or even the qualified one, to be found, in the President's opinion, adopted or applied to the case of the New Jersey. The report, of which I have already given you the substance, not having been agreed to by all the members of the council, and the liquidator general not choosing to decide the difference, transmitted the case a second time to the treasury, with a wish that M. Marbois and myself might determine it. We complied with this wish: we did determine it, and admitted it for its full proportion of the marginal fund. It is true that M. Marbois and I differed somewhat concerning this proportion. He would have given three hundred and thirty-three thousand francs, whereas, I thought that three hundred thousand were quite as many as fell to its share; and that you will think as I did, I have no doubt, when I inform you that there are claims amounting to more than three millions, as sound in point of principle, less objectionable in point of form, and better recommended by the pecuniary circumstances of the claimants, for which I have not yet got a single sous.

Copy of a letter from Henry Waddell to Messrs. Nicklin and Griffith, dated

PHILADELPHIA, February 24, 1806.

Agreeably to my promise, I now state in writing some circumstances with my ideas relative to the case of the New Jersey; at the same time, in substance, the observations made by me on the subject since my return to America; in the course of which, I submit to your candor how far they may appear hostile to you or your claim. As yet you have only the memoir of your agent in France, the object of which, no doubt, was to induce a belief on your part that the rejection of the claim was owing to the interference of the American minister, and thereby entitle you to a demand against the American Government; this, however, on an impartial consideration of the subject, will, I think, appear otherwise; and, I believe, you only require a correct statement of facts to remove the impressions made by that memoir.

No doubt can arise on the illegality of the capture, but it is supposed the arrangement made between your agent, Dr. Stephens, and General de Haudeville, materially changed the ground on which you originally stood, and much prejudiced your claim against the captors. It is also to be lamented, that you suffered the time limited by law to pass over without prosecuting the appeal, or complying with the formalities always considered indispensable in such cases; for in vain might M. Dupont say, that the law of the 4th Prairial, 6th year, corresponding to May, 1798, did not extend to the French colonies; with the same propriety you might have been referred by the French Government to the colony, where the capture and arrangement with General de Haudeville was made for payment. These facts I mention in no other view than to show that, where appeals are made and other legal formalities complied with, not only in prize causes but in every other, always have a preference, and on that ground was there no other; the American and French ministers might suppose they have granted you a large proportion in allowing your claim out of the Louisiana fund, three hundred thousand francs; and your agents must also have thought so, or I presume they would not have given a receipt in full, thereby debarring you from any further demand.

I am of opinion, nay, I speak with confidence, that our Government wished to give a preference to prize causes; but by the convention of 1803, the appropriations are left entirely to the French Government, who have generally preferred such claims as were embraced by the convention, for supplies made them by American merchants; this arrangement left a balance of the Louisiana fund, but not sufficient to satisfy all the prize causes; for, there are now on the dockets of the tribunal of prizes, many cases, although not positively decided on, the formalities relative to which, so far as they go, have at least been legally complied with; and it is a fact which ought not to escape attention, the New Jersey has been preferred and obtained judgment, when the others with more form have not.

The American minister has had a most difficult task to execute, for when he arrived in France there were not fourteen hundred thousand francs unappropriated, with demands against that sum for many millions; he, therefore, proposed that all cases should be liquidated by being placed on the same footing; but the French Government, by the convention, having reserved to itself the right of distributing the fund appropriated for the payment of American claims, he could only act in conjunction with the French minister of the public treasury, both of whom have invariably aimed at impartiality, in disposing of this small balance among the different claimants.

It is a very singular assertion of M. Dupont, that the French Government would have admitted the claim for the whole amount, for, had he supposed so, why not have returned, as he could, and had a right to the bureau of liquidation for a revision of the claim? but no, his doubts of receiving any thing are evident, from his own statement, particularly as the minister of the public treasury only thought of paying one-third, but afterwards, on reconsideration, was of opinion with General Armstrong, that three hundred thousand francs was a more equal proportion; and the sum has been paid under the impression only, that no sort of discrimination should be made between the owner and the underwriter; and, on this occasion, I take it upon myself to assert that General Armstrong acted under no other idea.

The letter said to be written by General Armstrong, I have understood, was communicated confidentially to your agents after having written a second, placing the claim on a better footing than it was originally; and as to the effect to which M. Dupont attaches so much importance, it never produced any; but, had any effect been produced by it, this was completely done away before your agents knew of its existence, therefore the publication of this letter in M. Dupont's pamphlet is too palpable not to be understood by every man who judges without prejudice. But let us suppose, for a moment, the French Government even contemplated paying the whole amount of your claim out of the Louisiana fund, which does not appear to have been the case, General Armstrong would have been extremely represensible had he assented to it, for it must have been almost to the entire exclusion of every other claimant.

When I left Paris, General Armstrong had been confined to his bed for some weeks, which accounts for his not taking notice of the publication in question; and although I disapproved of the letter, I am very certain it never did, in the slightest degree, injure your claim.

You have now, gentlemen, the impressions of my mind entirely free from prejudice, and I beg to avail myself of this opportunity of assuring you that, so far from ever discovering any thing hostile or unfriendly towards you, that I have uniformly, as often as your house has been the subject of conversation, spoken of it as among the most respectable of our country.

Henry Waddell to James Madison, Esq.

PHILADELPHIA, February 26, 1806.

SIR:

When in Washington, I mentioned to your excellency that my view of the case of the New Jersey was very different from the general representations on that subject, and since my arrival here, having given my opinion very freely to the same effect, Messrs. Nicklin and Griffith requested me to state, in writing, my ideas on the subject. I accordingly wrote them a letter, of which I enclose your excellency a copy. In so doing, I have, nor can have any other intention than to state facts which have been withheld or mutilated; but as I know the abuse I should incur by its publication, I merely enclose it for your excellency's satisfaction, until you receive more complete information on the subject from France.

I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

HENRY WADDELL.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 197. [1st SESSION.

AMERICAN SEAMEN IMPRESSED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 8, 1806.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 5, 1806.

The Secretary of State, in compliance with the order of the House of Representatives of the 6th of January, directing him to lay before it "a return of the number of American seamen who have been impressed or detained by the ships of war or privateers of Great Britain, whose names have been reported to the Department of State since the statement was made to the House at the last session of Congress; mentioning the names of the persons impressed, with the names of the ships or vessels by which they were impressed, and the time of the impressment; together with any facts and circumstances, in relation to the same, which may have been reported to him; stating, also, the whole number of American seamen impressed, from the commencement of the present war in Europe, and including, in a separate column, the number of passengers, if any, who may have been taken out of the American vessels coming to the United States from Europe," has the honor to transmit, herewith, the names of nine hundred and thirteen persons who appear to have been impressed from American vessels, and whose names have been reported to the Department of State since the last statement was made to Congress; together with a discrimination in the particulars required by the order, except as hereafter mentioned.

The aggregate number of impressments into the British service, since the commencement of the present war in Europe, is found to be two thousand two hundred and seventy-three.

It is not easy to distinguish with accuracy how many of these persons were really not citizens of the United States; but the column of remarks, added to the list in lieu of this discrimination, will exhibit some ground for judging of the fact.

It has not been deemed necessary to make a separate column for impressed passengers, as this description of persons have been reported to be impressed but in the few cases subjoined.

It is proper to observe, that a small part only of the period since the last statement there was an agent for seamen for the Leeward islands at Jamaica; the gentleman who then held the charge having resigned it, and another who had been appointed to succeed him having declined accepting it. The agent appointed for Antigua having been absent from that island since his appointment in May last, no returns have been received from the Windward islands. From these circumstances, it is very probable that many impressments have been made in the West Indian seas, which, though of a recent date, are not included in the present report.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 198. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 20, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: MARCH 19, 1806.

It was reasonably expected that, while the limits between the territories of the United States and of Spain were unsettled, neither party would have innovated on the existing state of their respective positions. Some time since, however, we learned that the Spanish authorities were advancing into the disputed country to occupy new posts and make new settlements. Unwilling to take any measure which might preclude a peaceable accommodation of differences, the officers of the United States were ordered to confine themselves within the country on this side of the Sabine river, which, by delivery of its principal post, Natchitoches, was understood to have been itself delivered up by Spain; and, at the same time, to permit no adverse post to be taken, nor armed men to remain within it. In consequence of these orders, the commanding officer at Natchitoches, learning that a party of Spanish troops had crossed the Sabine river, and were posting themselves on this side the Adies, sent a detachment of his force to require them to withdraw to the other side of the Sabine, which they accordingly did.

I have thought it proper to communicate to Congress the letters detailing this incident, that they may fully understand the state of things in that quarter, and be enabled to make such provision for its security as, in their wisdom, they shall deem sufficient.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from Major Porter to the Secretary of War, dated

NATCHITOCHES, February 8, 1806.

SIR:

Your letter of the 20th November was received on the 24th ultimo, and the request therein mentioned was, without loss of time, forwarded to the commandant at Nacogdoches, from whom I received, on the 4th instant, an answer, in which he refused to give the assurance required.

Deeming this reply decisive, I immediately detached Captain Turner, with sixty men, to remove a party of Spaniards that had, a few days before, passed and taken post on this side of the Adies, and to patrol the country between this post and the river Sabine; the former he easily accomplished, and is now performing the latter.

The report of preparations, making by our Spanish neighbors, for war, are various, but generally agree that considerable numbers of troops are progressing from the interior to the eastward; that near three hundred of them were, a few weeks since, at the great crossing of the Trinity, where there were near two hundred beeves, five hundred horses, and a considerable magazine of flour; that they have ten guns now mounting at Nacogdoches, where most of them have been lately received; and that, immediately after Lieutenant Piatt, the bearer of my letter to the commandant of Nacogdoches, left that place on his return, a Spanish officer was despatched to Bayou aux Pierre to impress on the minds of the inhabitants of that settlement the allegiance that they owed to His Catholic Majesty; ordered them to join his standard whenever required; and informed them that the Red river would be the boundary line between the Spanish country and the United States.

NATCHITOCHES, February 1, 1806.

SIR:

You are immediately to proceed with the detachment now under your command to the neighborhood of Adies, where, if you should fall in with a stationary party of armed Spaniards, you will command them, or any other armed party of foreigners which you may discover, to withdraw beyond the Sabine river. In case of their refusing to comply, you are to treat them agreeably to the orders of the Secretary of War, (a certified extract of which accompanies these instructions,) as far as relates to the pursuit, capture, and detention, of invaders or aggressors, and avoiding the spilling of blood, but when these orders cannot otherwise be executed. You are to patrol, if practicable, the country between this and Sabine. Be on your guard against surprise, and communicate to me, by express, from time to time, any occurrence worthy of note.

M. PORTER,
Major Artillerists, Commanding.

Captain EDWARD D. TURNER, Second Regiment Infantry.

ADIES, February 6, 1806.

SIR:

After a tedious march we arrived in front of the Spanish post yesterday morning about half past eleven o'clock; found the Dons in some confusion, in consequence of their patrol having discovered us an hour before, (owing to our pilot bringing us in sight of the road.) I took a position which would have carried their camp, if there had been ten times their number, which was twenty. They saddled, mounted, and formed. At the Bayou le Glese, their patrol or picket halted our vanguard, and demanded the reason we were violating or invading His Majesty's territory. I requested him to withdraw with his guard inside his camp, where I would presently be, and inform his officer of my business. He implicitly obeyed. Upon my arrival at my position, I sent Mr. Duforest to tell the officer I wished a conference. Mr. Duforest was informed, in consequence of some information the corporal of the advanced guard had given, the officer had gone down the road to meet me. I waited some time his return, but not seeing him, I suspected he had purposely put himself out of the way to gain time. I, therefore, after sending another message to the camp, formed my men, and marched through the thicket within forty yards, where I halted, and told the non-commissioned officer commanding that I should wait fifteen minutes for his officer, provided he made no movements in the interim. The officer soon after appeared, when I delivered him my commands. He readily agreed to abandon his position, but he said he could go no further than a creek San Jose. After a good deal of altercation, he consented to move to the other side of the Sabine, and I gave him three hours to prepare to march. He begged I would not insist upon his crossing the Sabine within five days, alleging that, in the miserable condition of his horses, it would be impossible without losing them, and requested that he might be allowed to look up some that were missing. I replied that, after reaching the other side the Sabine, he might send in two or three of his men without arms to hunt them; and that he must get them as soon as possible. He replied he would, but it would necessarily take him four or five days. This morning I commenced my march for La Nan, and fell in with him in three miles. I signifying my surprise at his being no further, he made the old excuse of the impossibility of his horses to travel faster; and observed that he had been detained in trying to find some of his horses, two of which he had got, and four were yet missing. Not thinking it proper to rely exactly on his word, after again falling in with him, I made him subscribe to the enclosed terms, (which I hope may meet your approbation,) and shall follow his footsteps till my provisions are out.

Respectfully yours, &c.

E. D. TURNER.

Major MOSES PORTER.

AT THE ADIES, February 6, 1806.

I, Joseph Maria Gonzalez, ensign, commandant of His Most Catholic Majesty's troops on this side of the river Sabinas, hereby have agreed with Captain Edward D. Turner, captain in the United States army, to return all said troops of His Catholic Majesty to the other side of the said river Sabinas, as soon as my horses will permit it, or in five days, or, at furthest, six, and to take my march this day; and I also oblige myself not to send any patroles on this side of the river Sabinas.

JOSEPH MARIA GONZALEZ, Ensign.

Witness: JOHN V. DUFOREST.

TUNIS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 14, 1806.

APRIL 14, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

During the blockade of Tripoli by the squadron of the United States, a small cruiser, under the flag of Tunis, with two prizes, (all of trifling value) attempted to enter Tripoli, was turned back, warned; and attempting again to enter, was taken, and detained as prize by the squadron. Her restitution was claimed by the Bey of Tunis, with a threat of war in terms so serious, that, on withdrawing from the blockade of Tripoli, the commanding officer of the squadron thought it his duty to repair to Tunis with his squadron, and to require a categorical declaration whether peace or war was intended. The Bey preferred explaining himself by an ambassador to the United States, who, on his arrival, renewed the request that the vessel and her prizes should be restored. It was deemed proper to give this proof of friendship to the Bey; and the ambassador was informed the vessels would be restored. Afterwards he made a requisition of naval stores, to be sent to the Bey, in order to secure a peace for the term of three years, with a threat of war if refused. It has been refused, and the ambassador is about to depart without receding from his threat or demand.

Under these circumstances, and considering that the several provisions of the act of March 25, 1804, will cease in consequence of the ratification of the treaty of peace with Tripoli, now advised and consented to by the Senate, I have thought it my duty to communicate these facts, in order that Congress may consider the expediency of continuing the same provisions for a limited time, or making others equivalent.

TH: JEFFERSON.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 200. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN—IRA ALLEN.

REPORTED APRIL 17, 1806.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1806.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the memorial of Ira Allen, has the honor to make the following report to the Senate:

That the Executive of the United States, with a view to promote the justice claimed by the memorialists, has heretofore interposed in his behalf with the British Government; but that a decree of restitution of the captured property was not pronounced by the court of appeals, until the month of February, 1804, though the capture was made towards the close of the year 1796; that it appears, that in this interval, the sureties of the memorialists on the return of the arms, and to whom he mortgaged and was compelled to deliver them as a counter security, failed, after having sold them; whereby the memorialist is deprived of the effect of the sentence, of the restitution. That on the application of the memorialist, his case was again recommended to the attention of the ministers of the United States, in London, by a letter from the Department of State, dated on the 15th March, 1805, in order that due compensation for the loss might be sought from the British Government, so far as the circumstances of the case (some of which are very peculiar) rendered them responsible; but owing probably to the absence of that minister in Spain, and to other occurrences of a more pressing nature since his return, he has not reported any proceedings under those instructions.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

To the President of the United States, the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives, convened in Washington. The memorial of Ira Allen, late of Colchester in Vermont, now of Philadelphia, humbly showeth:

That in consequence of a scarcity of arms in Vermont, and after repeated legislative inquiries, and measures taken by the late Thomas Chittenden, Esquire, Governor of said State, to purchase arms to supply the militia of said State; and arms not being to be purchased in the United States, or borrowed from the Government thereof, to supply the militia aforesaid; that, in 1795, the late Thomas Chittenden, Esquire, then Governor of Vermont, gave written instructions under his signature, that of the secretary, and seal of State, to your memorialist, to purchase arms, for the supply of said militia, in Europe. Your memorialist proceeded to Great Britain, and inquired the price of arms and terms of purchase there, when he was informed that the price of arms was thirty-two shillings sterling per gun and bayonet, without any credit; he then proceeded to France, and in Paris completed a written contract with the then French Minister at War, for twenty thousand stand of arms furnished with bayonets, and twenty-four brass four pound field-pieces, with utensils for their use; which contracts were more than fifty thousand dollars better in Paris than the terms of purchase proposed in England, with the advantage of seven years credit, at five per cent. interest, for four-fifths of the purchase money. This contract in France, was equally consistent with the laws of nations and treaties, as if it had been made in England. The advantage in the contracts determined the place of purchase.

Your memorialist further states, that, on his way for New York, with a cargo of said cannon and arms, he was captured by an English seventy-four gun ship, and carried to England, where a tedious litigation took place in the high court of admiralty; and notwithstanding the most unquestionable evidence was exhibited in every stage of the cause, supported by the executive, Senators and Representatives of Vermont in Congress, Executive of the United States at different periods, and ministers thereof in London; and though your memorialist often urged a final decision of his cause, on the evidence and arguments before the court, yet the court of appeal restored the property on bail, and required further proofs on the part of your memorialist from France. This order necessitated your memorialist to consign his property to British merchants to procure them as bail, and to go to France for such proofs, where he experienced many evils, too lengthy to state, for which, and copies of proofs, he refers to the second volume of the book concerning the case of the Olive Branch.

That the capture and proceedings in the court of admiralty, are, in many particulars, a violation of the laws of nations and treaty of 1794, and a flagrant insult on the Government of the United States, in not respecting the interference of the Executive thereof; and an insult on the Government of Vermont, for the British Government to attempt to deprive the militia thereof of military stores, because the State was bounded on British America, and because her sons were active in the revolution of the United States. And these assertions were the more extraordinary, because Judge Marriott had in 1797 condemned said cargo, suggesting that it was destined to arm the rebels of Ireland.

That continuing this cause near eight years, without one syllable of evidence in court in support of the captors until the bail (to whom your memorialist was necessitated to consign his cargo,) became bankrupts, and then to decide the cause in favor of your memorialist, on the evidence that had been some years before the court, and on which the court declined to act until in 1804, is acknowledging the justice of the claim, without compensation for losses and injuries received.

Your memorialist, therefore, claims justice of the British Government for all his losses, both at home and abroad, and injuries that were in consequence of said capture and detention in Europe; that, in addition to justice under the laws of nations and treaty of 1794, a precedent has been established by the convention under said treaty in the United States, stipulating to pay to British creditors six hundred thousand pounds sterling, in consequence of legal obstructions to their collecting debts in the United States, until their debtors were bankrupts.

Your memorialist submits that his claims are much better founded than that of said British creditors; for his capture and detention has been by the immediate order of the British Government, its courts, officers, or agents.

Your memorialist, therefore, solicits the interference of the Government of the United States, to sequester the remaining two hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable to British merchants as aforesaid, that it may be paid over to your memorialist in compensation for the immense losses and evils experienced, in consequence of the capture aforesaid, or take such other measures as may be most consistent with the wisdom of Government to obtain justice for your memorialist of the British Government.

Your memorialist, &c.

IRA ALLEN.

PHILADELPHIA, February 22, 1805.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 201. [2d SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED DECEMBER 2, 1806,

With the annual message at the commencement of the session.

NATCHITOCHES, August 5, 1806.

SIR:

It has been reported to me, for several days past, that a large body of the troops of the King of Spain had assembled near the Sabine, and were about to cross that river, and I am just informed that this body has crossed the said river, and taken post within the territory of the United States; it has therefore become my duty to address you on this subject, to demand an explicit avowal of the object of this movement, to insist on this body of troops being immediately withdrawn, and to warn you of the consequences which may result from its continuance within the territory of the United States.

It is well known that the Government of the United States and the King of Spain are at this moment negotiating on the subject of the boundaries of Louisiana, and there cannot be a doubt but an amicable adjustment of existing differences will soon take place.

The reinforcements which have lately reached this post are only intended as a security to the territory actually surrendered to us, and which we consider as extending to the Sabine. There is no disposition on the part of the United States to commit hostilities on the troops or possessions of Spain; but we cannot suffer aggressions on our territory, and should you persist in making them, you will be justly chargeable with all the consequences which such conduct is calculated to produce. I have only to add, that, if you should think proper to remove the Spanish troops to the west side of the Sabine, and continue them there, no attempt will be made, on the part of the United States, to interrupt that friendship and harmony which ought to subsist between neighboring nations. But if you should attempt to continue these troops within the territory of the United States after this explicit and friendly warning, it will be my duty to consider you as an invader of our territory, and to act accordingly.

This letter will be handed to you by Major Moses Porter, of the artillerists of the United States, who will wait a reasonable time for your reply; which, if convenient, I hope may be accompanied by an English or French translation, to enable me to ascertain its contents with greater certainty. The Major will be attended by one non-commissioned officer, and one private soldier, of the army of the United States.

I avail myself of this opportunity of tendering my best wishes for your health, happiness, and honor, and am, sir, with respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

T. H. CUSHING,
Colonel commanding a detachment of the army of the United States.

To Col. HERRERA, or Officer commanding the troops of the King of Spain on the east side of the Sabine.

PLANTATION OF MR. PRUDHOMME, August 6, 1806.

SIR:

With all possible respect I answer your excellency's letter which was delivered to me, at this place, by Moses Porter, Major of Artillery of the United States.

It is true that I have crossed the Sabine river with a detachment of troops belonging to the King with orders from the Captain General (by whom I am governed) to keep this territory from all hostile attempts, as belonging, from time immemorial, to the King, and which is a dependence of the province of Texas. The inhabitants still acknowledge obedience to our Government, notwithstanding the violence committed on a small detachment of our troops by those of the United States.

From this moment I hold myself responsible to the real letter of the orders that govern me, which are, by no pretext whatsoever, to interrupt or break the good intelligence which subsists between His Majesty and the United States; but I cannot permit, without violating my duty, any usurpation upon the land he possesses. If your excellency makes any infringement, you, alone, will be answerable to the two courts, and may interrupt the amicable convention, perhaps, now on foot, but of which I have no knowledge.

I did not send a translation of this in French or English, not having any person capable of translating, with purity, a thing of so serious a nature.

I felicitate myself of this opportunity in offering my best services. Your very humble servant,

SIMON DE HERRERA.

Senor Don THOMAS CUSHING,
Commander of a detachment of the army of the United States.

NATCHITOCHES, August 26, 1806.

SIR:

On my arrival at this post, I learned, with certainty, that a considerable Spanish force had crossed the Sabine, and advanced within the territory claimed by the United States. It was hoped, sir, that, pending the negotiations between our respective Governments for an amicable adjustment of the limits of Louisiana, no additional settlements would be formed, or new military positions assumed, by either Power within the disputed territory; a policy which a conciliatory disposition would have suggested, and justice sanctioned; but, since a contrary conduct has been observed on the part of certain officers of His Catholic Majesty, they alone will be answerable for the consequences which may ensue.

The above proceeding, sir, is not the only evidence of an unfriendly disposition which certain officers of Spain have afforded. I have to complain of the outrage lately committed by a detachment of Spanish troops, acting under your instructions, towards Mr. Freeman and his party, who were ascending the Red river under the orders of the President of the United States. Mr. Freeman and his associates were navigating waters which pass through the territory ceded by France to the United States; they were navigating a river on which the French had formerly made settlements far beyond the place where they were arrested; a fact of great notoriety, and in support of which the testimony of several citizens, residing at and near the post of Natchitoches, can be adduced.

But, nevertheless, Mr. Freeman and his party were assailed by a battalion of Spanish troops, and commanded to return: a proceeding the more exceptionable, since the objects of Mr. Freeman were merely scientific, having in view nothing hostile to Spain; objects which were long since communicated by me to his excellency the Marquis of Casa Calvo, and which, through him, I presume, must have been made known to the Governor General of the province of Texas.

This detachment of Spanish troops, whose movements, I learn, are directed by your excellency, did, on their march, commit another outrage towards the United States, and of which it is my duty to ask an explanation. In the Caddo nation of Indians the flag of the United States was displayed, and commanded from the chief and warriors all the respectful veneration to which it is entitled; but your troops are stated to have cut down the staff on which the pavilion waved, and to have menaced the peace and safety of the Caddos should they continue their respect for the American Government, or their friendly intercourse with the citizens of the United States.

I experience the more difficulty in accounting for this transaction, since it cannot be unknown to your excellency, that while Louisiana appertained to France, that the Caddo Indians were under the protection of the French Government, and that a French garrison was actually established in one of their villages: hence, it follows, sir, that the cession of Louisiana to the United States, "with the same extent which it had when France possessed it," is sufficient authority for the display of the American flag in the Caddo village, and that the disrespect which that flag has experienced, subjects your excellency to a serious responsibility.

I am unwilling to render this communication unnecessarily lengthy, but I must complain of another outrage, which has been committed under the eyes of your excellency. Three citizens of the United States, of the names of Shaw, Irvine, and Brewster, were seized by Spanish soldiers, within twelve miles of Natchitoches, and have been sent prisoners to Nacogdoches. I cannot suppose that this proceeding is unknown to your excellency, and I should be wanting in duty, did I not avail myself of the present occasion to demand information as to the cause of their arrest and detention. There is still another subject on which I must address your excellency. It is reported to me, that several slaves, the property of citizens of the United States, have lately escaped from the service of their masters, and sought and found an asylum at Nacogdoches. I have seen the correspondence between your excellency and Judge Turner upon this subject, and I learn your determination to await the orders of the Governor General of the province of Texas. I will forbear, therefore, for the present, to press their immediate delivery to the orders of their masters; but I must urge your excellency to discourage, for the future, the escape of slaves from this to your territory, and I request that such as may repair to the bounds of your command may be forthwith returned. Your excellency will readily perceive the cause of my solicitude on this subject. If fugitive slaves are to receive the protection of the Spanish authorities, the property of the citizens of this territory is indeed insecure, and a good understanding between our two Governments ought not, and cannot, be preserved. During the last year, I had a correspondence with his excellency the Marquis of Casa Calvo, (who was then at New Orleans,) relative to some negroes who had escaped to Nacogdoches; and, in consequence of the interference of the Marquis, I am led to believe that they were restored. I was since officially informed by the Marquis, that his conduct on the occasion was approved by His Catholic Majesty, and I consequently concluded that the mischief was at an end. It cannot, I presume, be unknown to the officers of His Catholic Majesty, that ministers from the United States have repaired to Spain for the avowed purpose of amicably adjusting the existing differences. I should greatly regret, therefore, if any occurrences in this quarter should prevent that amicable arrangement which the interest of each nation would advise. But if the officers of Spain should persist in their acts of aggression, your excellency will readily anticipate the consequences, and if the sword must be drawn, let those be responsible whose unfriendly conduct has rendered it indispensable.

Colonel Henry Hopkins, the Adjutant General of the militia of this territory, will have the honor to deliver to your excellency this communication, and to await your answer.

I tender to your excellency the assurances of my great respect and high consideration.

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

His Excellency Governor HERRERA,
or the Officer commanding a detachment of Spanish troops at or near the settlement of Bayou Pierre.

SPANISH CAMP, August 28, 1806.

SIR:

The troops of the King my master, which I have the honor to command on this side of the Sabine, have no other object but to maintain good harmony between the United States and His Majesty, and to preserve inviolate the territory which belongs to him.

Major Freeman was navigating the Red river, on that part of the territory which never belonged to the province of Lousiana, now appertaining to the United States; for which reason he was notified by the commandant of the troops to retrograde as far back as the country that did belong to them. I agree with your excellency, that all the territory which His Catholic Majesty ceded to France belongs to the United States, but the Caddo Indians are not on that land, but at a great distance from it, and live now on the territory of Spain. For which reason it was notified to them, that if they chose to live under the Government of the United States, they must go to the territory under their jurisdiction; but if they desired to remain where they were, it was required of them to take down the American flag. They consented not to abandon their village; but being more tardy than was conceived they might have been in pulling down the flag, they (the Spaniards) were obliged to do it by force.

The reason why I detained the three citizens of the United States, was because they were found twice, and on different days, observing our positions and movements; and three several times that I questioned them, I observed they did not agree as to the motives of their visiting the place; but, finally, one of them told me they wished to establish themselves under the Government of the King at St. Antoine, which determined me to send them to the Governor of the province with an escort, as well on account of the distance of the road, as for having rendered themselves suspected persons. The detention of the runaway negroes of Louisiana at Nacogdoches, is an affair in suspense before the Captain General of this province, who likewise will have knowledge of the motives why these were sent back whom your excellency cited. And for the better security of the matter, I shall send your letter which I received by Colonel Hopkins, and who likewise will be the bearer of this.

The troops of the King, neither from disposition nor character, will ever co-operate directly or indirectly in encouraging the emigration of negro slaves. For my part, I assure your excellency that those I command will commit no hostility which can frustrate the negotiations now pending between our courts; but if I am provoked to it I shall endeavor to preserve the honor of my troops, and to fulfil the obligations with which I am invested; a duty which my character and that of my subalterns demands.

I avail myself of this opportunity to offer your excellency my respect and consideration.

SIMON M. HERRERA.

His Excellency Governor WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

NATCHITOCHES, August 31, 1806.

SIR:

By the return of Colonel Hopkins I am honored with your excellency's reply to my communication of the 28th instant. I continue of opinion that the advance of Spanish troops within a territory claimed by the United States, is evidence of an unfriendly disposition; nor can I perceive any thing in your excellency's letter which can justify or extenuate the offensive conduct observed towards Mr. Freeman and his associates, or the indignity offered in the Caddo nation to the American flag.

You have not denied, sir, that the French, when in possession of Louisiana, had established a garrison on Red river, far beyond the place where Mr. Freeman and his associates were arrested on their voyage, or that the Caddo Indians were formerly considered as under the protection of the French Government. The silence of your excellency on these points proceeds probably from a knowledge, on your part, of the correctness of my statements. I shall, however, touch no further on these transactions, in my correspondence with your excellency, but will hasten to lay the same before the President of the United States, who will know what measures to direct when wrongs are offered to the American nation. I cannot, however, refrain from expressing my displeasure at the arrest and detention, under your excellency's orders, of three citizens of the United States, Shaw, Irvin, and Brewster; they are charged with no offence that would warrant imprisonment and transportation to St. Antonio. A state of actual war between our two nations could not have justified your conduct towards those unoffending citizens. I can venture to assert, that the suspicions of your excellency as to the objects of Shaw, Irvine, and Brewster, are unfounded.

They certainly would have no particular inducements to notice the positions or movements of your troops. The fact, I believe, is, that these men were desirous of gratifying their curiosity, and wished your excellency's passports to visit St. Antonio. Under this impression, and from the circumstance that they were within the territory claimed by the United States, I deem it my duty to demand their release and speedy restoration to their country. It cannot be supposed that the distance to St. Antonio, or their personal convenience, occasioned the escort which attended them. They appear, on the contrary, to have been treated by your excellency as State prisoners, and as such, I have information of their having passed through Nacogdoches under a strong guard. Your excellency will recollect that the subjects of His Catholic Majesty are daily in the habit of visiting the post of Natchitoches, and cannot but observe the positions and movements of the American troops. They, however, are permitted to pass without molestation. A friendly and innocent intercourse between the citizens of the one, and the subjects of the other Power, has not, as yet, been interdicted by this Government. I am persuaded, therefore, that your excellency will see that the arrest of Shaw, Irvine, and Brewster, was premature, and that their detention is highly improper. I have no personal knowledge of these three men; they are American citizens, and, of course, under the protection of the Government of the United States. In the name of that Government, therefore, I do now demand their release, and that they be restored to their country as soon as possible.

Pending the negotiations between our respective Governments, I could wish that hostilities should not commence in this quarter; but, if provoked to it, by the unjust aggressions of the forces of His Catholic Majesty, the troops of the United States will endeavor to maintain their own and their country's honor.

Lieutenant Duforest, of the American army, is charged with the delivery of this letter to your excellency, and to bear me such answer as you may think proper to return.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my respectful consideration.

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

His Excellency Governor HERRERA.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, NATCHITOCHES, October 4, 1806.

I yesterday morning received Governor Cordero's answer to my address of the 24th ultimo, copies of which you have under cover.

The varied style of this letter, when contrasted with those of Governor Herrera to Colonel Cushing and Governor Claiborne, combined with the circumstance of the Spanish troops having recrossed the Sabine to a man, has induced me, on the ground of economy and of expediency, also, to discharge the militia who had reached this place, and to countermand those under march, excepting about one hundred dragoons and mounted infantry, whom I shall retain in service (until I am apprised of the determination of the Captain General Salcedo,) to watch the movements of our neighbors.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
NATCHITOCHES, September 24, 1806.

SIR:

After the recent communications which have passed between his Excellency Governor Herrera, Colonel Cushing, and Governor Claiborne, and his reiterated repulsion of their reasonable and rightful demands, I will confess to your excellency, that naught but the very high and solemn obligations which I owe to humanity, could vanquish the repugnance with which I now have the honor to address you, on a topic profoundly interesting to our respective nations, inasmuch as it may involve a question of peace or war.

The differences of opinion which have prevailed concerning the contested limits of Louisiana, having been submitted to amicable negotiation by our respective sovereigns, the appeal to rational inquiry is an admission of the dubiosity of the right, and therefore should prevent any change of military positions posterior to the delivery of the province of Louisiana to the United States.

The Government of the American Union, founded in right and conducted by reason, has been instructed by the history of other times how to value the blessings of peace, and being unambitious of conquest or military fame, is desirous to preserve a fair and friendly understanding with all the Powers of the earth.

Thus circumstanced, and under daily expectation of a favorable issue to the depending negotiations, it would mark a sanguinary spirit, and be a most ungracious and unwarrantable deed, were the military officers of either Government, by an act of precipitancy, to frustrate the benevolent views of a pacific discussion, and make way for the commencement of hostilities, whose final issue may baffle human foresight, but whose probable consequences would be scenes of revolution and bloodshed, offensive to humanity, and subversive of the general policy of nations.

In this state of things, I am ready to pledge myself that, pending the negotiations of the two countries, nothing shall be attempted against His Catholic Majesty's subjects or territories by the troops under my command, unless his officers should attempt, as they have already done, to innovate the "statu quo" at the surrender of the province, by occupying new ground, or erecting new posts, or unless they should trespass on the rights of the citizens, or violate the sovereignty of these States: the former conduct will compel counter movements and occupancies, and the latter will not only justify recrimination, but will infallibly excite it, and thus hostilities may be produced, notwithstanding the peaceful dispositions of the high Powers to whom we are respectively accountable.

When the troops of the United States took possession of this post, the Spanish commandant from whom it was received, did not define the limits of his jurisdiction; yet it was notorious that Nacogdoches formed the barrier post of the approximate province of Texas. It was known also that controversies had existed between France and Spain, respecting the western limits of Louisiana, and we had been assured by Monsieur Laussatt, the French commissioner who delivered the province to the United States, that the pretensions of France went as far west as the Rio del Norte; but we were not informed that any line of demarcation had ever been traced to partition these provinces.

Whether such a line of territorial jurisdiction had ever been established or not between the provinces of Louisiana and Texas, one had been rendered indispensable, by the sale of the former to the United States, for the administration of justice, the security of property, and the prevention of hostile collisions; and these States, with pretensions far more extensive, adopted the Sabine river as the most obvious, most convenient, most natural, and least exceptionable, temporary boundary.

I am, therefore, sir, commanded by the President of the United States to inform you "that the actual quiet possession of the country by the United States, east of the river Sabine, ought and will be considered as fully within the limits of the country surrendered to the United States on taking possession of this place; and, therefore, any attempt on the part of His Catholic Majesty's officers, to disturb the existing state of things, by endeavoring to occupy any new post east of the Sabine, or westward or northward of the former boundaries, of what has been called West Florida, must be considered by the Government of the United States as an actual invasion of their territorial rights, and will be resisted accordingly." And while I submit these commands to your grave consideration, in the hope they may have due weight, it becomes my duty to demand from you the withdrawal of the troops of Spain to the west of the Sabine.

My sense of the high respect which is due from one old soldier to another, prohibits the idea of menace; but, as our honor forbids stratagem or deception before our swords have been drawn; I owe it to my own fame, and to the national character, to warn you, that the ultimate decision of the competent authority has been taken; that my orders are absolute, and my determination fixed, to assert, and, under God, to sustain the jurisdiction of the United States to the Sabine river against any force which may be opposed to me.

Retire then, sir, I conjure you, the troops of your command from the ground in controversy, and spare the effusion of human blood, without prejudicing your own honor, or the substantial interest of His Majesty your Royal master.

Colonel Thomas H. Cushing, chef-des-etats-major of the army of the United States, has my orders to deliver this letter to you, and to wait a reasonable time for your answer.

I pray God to keep your Excellency in his holy protection for many years, and have the honor to be your most obedient and humble servant.

JAMES WILKINSON.

His Excellency GOVERNOR CORDERO,
Chief in command of the troops of Spain on the western frontier of the province of Texas.

NACOGDOCHES CAMP, September 29, 1806.

EXCELLENT SIR:

By the hands of Colonel Thomas Cushing, chief of the General Staff of the United States army, I have had the honor, yesterday, to receive your excellency's letter, written from your head quarters at Natchitoches.

Being authorized to enter into a discussion of the serious and interesting matters on which you treat, I hope your excellency will excuse me, for transmitting your letter, with the utmost celerity, to the hands of the Captain General Brigadier Nimesio Salcedo, under whose orders I act, and I shall transmit to your excellency his answer in the same manner by the hands of an officer of my staff.

While thus acting I have the honor to offer to your excellency my respects and consideration, praying God to keep you alive many years.

I am, sir, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

ANTONIO CORDERO.

His Excellency Don JAMES WILKINSON, Governor of Louisiana, and General of the army of the United States of America.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

NATCHITOCHES, October 21, 1806.

Accidental causes having detained the bearer, I am enabled to transmit you under cover the answer of Governor Cordero to my note of the 4th instant, of which a copy has been forwarded, and a duplicate will accompany this.

I send you a literal copy of the Governor's letter, in place of a very imperfect translation, which, however, serves to remove all doubts of the continued pretensions of the Spaniards to extend their jurisdiction to the Arroya Fonda, within seven miles of this post, and confirms my determination to advance to the Sabine, for which point, my arrangements being completed, I shall march to-morrow morning; but agreeably to the idea expressed in a former letter, I intend to propose to the Spanish commander the withdrawal of our troops, respectively, to the points of occupancy at the period of the surrender of the province to the United States, and in case of his refusal I shall be governed by circumstances.

I am informed the Captain General Salcedo was to be at Nacogdoches on the 22d proximo.

HEAD QUARTERS, NATCHITOCHES, October 4, 1806.

SIR:

I have had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 29th ultimo, by Colonel Cushing, and shall expect the answer of his excellency the Captain General Salcedo with solicitude.

In the mean time I shall move forward towards the Sabine, and, to prevent the misinterpretation of my motives I consider it proper to apprize you, that this movement is made solely to demonstrate the pretensions of the United States to the territory east of that river, and with no hostile intentions against the troops or realms of Spain.

This step has been rendered essential to the honor of the United States, by the late movements and occupancy of his excellency Governor Herrera, and it is also justified by the position which the troops of your excellency's command have recently taken, immediately on the western bank of the Sabine, sixty miles advanced of Nacogdoches.

I avail myself of a casual but certain conveyance to transmit this letter to your excellency, and I pray God to keep you in his holy protection for many years.

JAMES WILKINSON.

His Excellency ANTONIO CORDERO,
Commander in chief of the troops of Spain on the eastern frontier of the province of Texas.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 202. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 3, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the negotiation depending between the United States and the Government of Great Britain, is proceeding in a spirit of friendship and accommodation which promises a result of mutual advantage: delays, indeed, have taken place, occasioned by the long illness and subsequent death of the British minister charged with that duty. But the commissioners appointed by that Government to resume the negotiation have shown every disposition to hasten its progress. It, is however, a work of time; as many arrangements are necessary to place our future harmony on stable grounds. In the mean time, we find, by the communications of our plenipotentiaries, that a temporary suspension of the act of the last session, prohibiting certain importations, would, as a mark of candid disposition on our part and of confidence in the temper and views with which they have been met, have a happy effect on its course. A step so friendly will afford further evidence that all our proceedings have flowed from views of justice and conciliation; and that we give them willingly that form which may best meet corresponding dispositions.

Add to this that the same motives which produced the postponement of the act till the 15th of November last, are in favor of its further suspension: and as we have reason to hope that it may soon yield to arrangements of mutual consent and convenience, justice seems to require that the same measure may be dealt out to the few cases which may fall within its short course, as to all others preceding and following it. I cannot therefore but recommend the suspension of this act for a reasonable time, on considerations of justice, amity, and the public interests.

TH: JEFFERSON.

9th CONGRESS.] No. 203. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 19TH OF FEBRUARY, 1807.

FEBRUARY 19, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a letter from our ministers plenipotentiary at London, informing us that they have agreed with the British commissioners to conclude a treaty, on all the points which had formed the object of their negotiation, and on terms which they trusted we would approve.

Also a letter from our minister plenipotentiary at Paris, covering one to him from the Minister of Marine of that Government, assuring him that the imperial decree lately passed was not to affect our commerce, which would still be governed by the rules of the treaty established between the two countries.

TH: JEFFERSON.

LONDON, December 27, 1806.

SIR:

We have the pleasure to acquaint you that we have this day agreed with the British commissioners to conclude a treaty on all the points which have formed the object of our negotiation, and on terms which, we trust, our Government will approve. It will require only a few days to reduce it to form. When that is done, we shall transmit it to you by a special messenger. We hasten to communicate to you this interesting intelligence, for the information and guidance of our Government, in such measures as may have reference to the subject.

We have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, Washington.

PARIS, December 24, 1806.

SIR:

I have the honor of transmitting the copy enclosed of a letter from His Majesty's Minister of Marine and Colonies, in answer to mine of the 10th instant, on the subject of the imperial arrêt of the 21st of November, 1806.

An additional explanation which it may be well to communicate is, that neutral vessels coming from England or her colonies into the ports of France, &c. since the date of the aforesaid arrêt, will not be received; and that if any person or persons, charged with the ship, or other vessel, and cargo, shall be detected in evading this regulation, by means of false declarations, they shall forfeit the said ship, or other vessel, and cargo.

I am, sir, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Mr. MADISON, Washington.

General Armstrong to the Minister of Marine and Colonies.

PARIS, December 10, 1806.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America has the honor of demanding from his excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies the official explanation which may have been given to the imperial decree of the 21st November, 1806, so far as that decree involves the rights of neutral nations.

The undersigned would more particularly wish to be informed, whether by "British islands," mentioned in article one, are to be understood all islands in the possession of His Britannic Majesty, and islands merely, or, whether the rule will be so construed as to extend the blockade to the continental possessions also of his said Majesty?

Whether it be meant that the arrêt shall operate from its date, and that seizures made under it, before notice shall have been given, shall be considered legal?

Whether American vessels, navigating the high or narrow seas, shall be liable to seizure, on evidence only that they are going to, or returning from, a port or ports of His Britannic Majesty?

And whether the articles two and five shall operate only as domestic regulations, or whether their injunctions shall extend to citizens of foreign and independent nations?

His excellency the Minister of Marine is sufficiently aware of the interest of the United States in the interpretation which shall be given to those articles, and will readily and justly appreciate the motives of the undersigned, in requesting that his excellency's answer may be given as promptly as possible.

The undersigned has the honor of renewing, &c. &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Minister of Marine and Colonies to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

PARIS, December 24, 1806.

Mr. MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY:

I hasten to answer the note you did me the honor to address to me on the 10th of this month.

I consider the imperial decree of the 21st of November last as, thus far, conveying no modification of the regulations at present observed in France, with regard to neutral navigators, nor consequently of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, (8th Vendemiaire, 9th year,) with the United States of America.

But although, by this answer, the four questions upon which your excellency has desired to know my opinion have been implicitly resolved, I think I can add,

1st. That the declaration expressed by the first article of the decree of the 21st November, not at all changing the present French laws concerning maritime captures, there is no reason for inquiring what interpretation, or restriction, or extension, may be given to this article.

2d. That seizures, contrary to the present regulations concerning cruising, shall not be allowed to the captors.

3d. That an American vessel cannot be taken at sea, for the mere reason that she is going to a port in England, or is returning from one; because, conformably with the seventh article of the said decree, we are limited in France not to admit vessels coming from England or the English colonies.

4th. That the provisions of articles second and fifth of the said decree, naturally apply to foreign citizens domiciliated in France, or in the countries occupied by the troops of His Majesty the Emperor and King, inasmuch as they have the character of a general law; but, that it will be proper that your excellency should communicate with the Minister of Exterior Relations as to what concerns the correspondence of the citizens of the United States of America with England.

I pray your excellency, Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary, to receive the assurance of my high consideration.

The Minister of Marine and of the Colonies,

DECRES.

It will not escape General Armstrong, that my answers cannot have the development which they would receive from the Minister of Exterior Relations, and that it is naturally to him that he ought to address himself for these explanations, which I am very happy to give him, because he wishes them, but upon which I have much less positive information than the Prince of Benevento.

DECRES.

[TRANSLATION.]

Imperial Decree of the 21st November, 1806.

ART. 1. The British islands are declared in a state of blockade.

ART. 2. All commerce and correspondence with the British islands are prohibited. In consequence, letters or packets, addressed either to England, to an Englishman, or in the English language, shall not pass through the post office, and shall be seized.

ART. 3. Every subject of England, of whatever rank and condition soever, who shall be found in the countries occupied by our troops, or by those of our allies, shall be made a prisoner of war.

ART. 4. All magazines, merchandise, or property, whatever, belonging to a subject of England, shall be declared lawful prize.

ART. 5. The trade in English merchandise is forbidden; all merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, is declared lawful prize.

ART. 6. One half the proceeds of the confiscation of the merchandise and property, declared good prize by the preceding articles, shall be applied to indemnify the merchants for the losses which they have suffered by the capture of merchant vessels by English cruisers.

ART. 7. No vessel coming directly from England, or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the present decree, shall be received into any port.

ART. 8. Every vessel contravening the above clause, by means of a false declaration, shall be seized, and the vessel and cargo confiscated, as if they were English property.

ART. 9. Our Tribunal of Prizes at Paris is charged with the definitive adjudication of all the controversies which may arise within our empire, or in the countries occupied by the French army, relative to the execution of the present decree. Our Tribunal of Prizes at Milan shall be charged with the definitive adjudication of the said controversies, which may arise within the extent of our kingdom of Italy.

ART. 10. The present decree shall be communicated, by our Minister of Exterior Relations, to the Kings of Spain, of Naples, of Holland, and of Etruria, and to our allies, whose subjects, like ours, are the victims of the injustice and the barbarism of the English maritime laws. Our Ministers of Exterior Relations, of War, of Marine, of Finances, of Police, and our Postmasters General, are charged, each in what concerns him, with the execution of the present decree.
